London : Stamford-street Chapel.—There has just been brought to a close the ninth season of the Monday popular concerts, which are so much appreciated in Blackfriars. Each week throughout the winter a programme of good music, vocal and instrumental, is arranged, sometimes by friends from various London churches, who are generally accompanied by their own minister as chairman, and occasionally by orchestral societies, &c. Nineteen concerts have been given during the season under the able direction of Mr. George Ling, large numbers being present on each occasion.

South Shields.—Anniversary services were held at Unity Church on Easter Sunday, the preacher in the morning being the Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A., of Newcastle-on-Tyne, and in the evening the Rev. T. P. Spedding. On Easter Tuesday the annual meeting was held, and proved one of the most successful that has been held in recent years. Mr. T. F. Bolam presided, in the absence of Mr. A. Robinson. He dwelt specially on the fact that although the church is without a minister, the Sunday evening services had been maintained regularly with the help of lay preachers.

Ulster Unitarian Christian Association.—The annual meeting of the Ulster Unitarian Christian Association was held in the Central Hall, Rosemary-street, Belfast, on Monday, April 1. The chair was taken by the Rev. Thomas Dunkerley, and among those present were the Revs. Alex. Gordon, J. A. Kelly, J. D. Davies, G. J. Slipper, S. E. Bawen, G. I. Phelps, H. M'Gowan, J. Worthington, A. O. Ashworth, M. Watkins, F. Woolley, and W. Weatherall; Messrs. Gawn Orr, M.D., J. S. M'Tear, R. M'Giffin, C. J. M'Kisack, W. T. Hamilton, J. Davidson (Windsor), E. Gordon, W. M'Ninch, W. Hewitt, R. Kennedy, T. Wallis, A. Hunter, J. Macleanahan, J. M'William, R. M'Crum, J. Steel, W. Roberts, C. M. Cunningham, and Robert Dickson. The Rev. J. A. Kelly, one of the hon. secretaries, read the report. One satisfactory feature of the work of the Association during the past year had been the increased number of applications for literature expository of the principles of Unitarian Christianity. The Committee appealed for increased subscriptions to enable them to carry on the work of the Association effectively. The report referred with deep regret to the death of the Rev. William Napier, the doyen of their ministry in Ireland, and a founder as well as a member of the Committee from the beginning of the Society; Mr. Richard Patterson, J.P., of Holywood, the first treasurer of the Association; Mr. W. Sinclair Boyd, Mr. Thomas M'Ervel, Mr. William Martin, and Mr. J. R. Miniss, J.P. Mr. M'Kisack, the hon. treasurer, presented the statement of accounts. The receipts totalled £321 6s. 5d., and included £193 1s. 8d., balance from 1910, and subscriptions amounting to £54 15s. During the year £161 had been invested, and there remained a balance in hand of £24 9s. 1d. The adoption of the report was moved by the Chairman, and seconded by Mr. C. M. Cunningham, who remarked that, being a mere recruit in Unitarianism, he could speak as one who had studied the faith from outside. They must not reckon their strength or their success by the numbers that attended their churches. There were things infinitely more valuable than mere numbers. A good, a powerful, a wholesome influence was better than a merely crowded attendance. If the congregations in Unitarian churches were small those churches were great as regarded influence. The speaker dwelt on the danger attending any slackening of energy, and expressed pleasure that their report was so satisfactory from a business point of view. The adoption of the report was carried, and a resolution welcoming the Rev. Alexander Gordon, and expressing the thanks of the meeting for his able and impressive sermons in aid of the Association, was proposed by Mr. James Davidson, seconded by Mr. W. G. Hamilton, and carried with much cordiality. A resolution was then moved by the Rev. J. Worthington, seconded by the Rev. M. Watkins, expressing adhesion to the principles and objects of the Association, and commending them to the increased and earnest support of their friends. This was also carried, and the meeting closed with a vote of thanks to the chairman.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A VISIT TO RODIN.

A writer in the Manchester Guardian has described a visit which he paid to Rodin in the Hotel Biron, once the well-known Convent of the Sacré-Cœur, where the great sculptor is to be found every afternoon, and where he receives his Paris friends. Contrary to his expectations he found a simple mannered, affectionate, warm-hearted old gentleman of whom humility and charity of judgment seemed to be the most striking characteristics. There was nothing of the arrogant Master to whom all must pay homage. Rodin even deprecates the notion that he has founded a great school and won many disciples. "No! No!" he cries; "I may have had an influence. I hope I have been an influence. I am nothing more." He speaks smilingly of the English people, who appreciate and understand the ancient buildings and statuary which he himself loves so much, and of the influence that Ruskin's teaching had in this connection. He refers, however, with an expression of pain to the way in which some of the architectural glories of France are being destroyed at the present time. "From the smallest landowner to the highest Government official, each one thinks himself at liberty to pull down and cart away the most precious treasures of ancient architecture, to destroy all our old landmarks. They don't know what they do; they don't understand. They are utterly ignorant of the value of the fine buildings they demolish, blind to their beauty. An old building is in their way, interferes with some puerile scheme, is inconveniently situated. Without more ado they pull it down. It is pitiful, pitiful! Tell people; write—explain—do whatever you can to stop this destruction!"

"Few know, perhaps," the writer of the article adds, "that had Rodin been less impecunious as a boy the world might have gained a great painter and lost an incomparable sculptor. Canvas and colours were too expensive for the lad; he could only afford rough paper and charcoal. Provided with these, he spent all his leisure in the lower galleries of the Louvre sketching the statues, studying the ancient marbles. And when at length able to buy the painting materials he had previously longed for, he had become wedded to sculpture."

CO-PARTNERSHIP IN COAL-MINING.

Mr. E. P. Greening, the editor of the "One and All" Gardening books, recently dealt with one of the "failures" in the Co-partnership movement in an article in the Agricultural Economist and Horticultural Review. The "failure" was that of Messrs. Henry Briggs, Sons & Co., of the Whitwood Collieries, Yorkshire, which has been mentioned lately in two well-known daily papers as an argument against the extension of the principle of co-partnership. The scheme was, as a matter of fact, a remarkable success, and the dividend ran up to 12 per cent. in the very first year, when over £2,000 was divided among the workers. Ten years later, when the dividend had risen to 15 per cent. and the annual bonuses to workers to over £5,000, there came a crisis in the coal trade which resulted in a quick rise of prices, and sent up the profits of the company very rapidly. In three years a new colliery was bought out of the profits, the share capital was doubled, and the shareholders were startled to find what huge sums they had to allot to the workers under the co-partnership contract.

* * *

This was their temptation, and they met the position by perpetrating an act of grave unfaith, voting a large sum into reserve which ought to have been divided, and then voting it out of reserve as a further division on capital. It must be remembered that at that time co-partnership bonuses were regarded as charity, or, to use Mr. Greening's words, "at all events as gifts which might be rightfully varied or withheld as circumstances suggested. Such an act of unfaith could not occur to-day in any co-partnership without raising a storm of public protest." The effect upon many fair-minded people, and upon the workmen themselves, is described by Mr. Greening, who shows how it brought about its own retribution, and destroyed the company after its most brilliant period of prosperity. He concludes, "I think I may fairly add that the co-partnership unquestionably brought industrial peace during its ten years, and contributed essentially to the great prosperity enjoyed while it lasted."

MOSLEMS AND BUDDHISTS.

In an article on "Moslems and Buddhists," in the current Nineteenth Century, Professor Vambéry gives some interesting facts in regard to the growing friendship between the followers of different Oriental religions which opens up a vast field of speculation as to the future. This rapprochement he maintains is due to the growing disposition of the nations of the East to regard the European as their common enemy. The relations between China and Islam are certainly becoming more sympathetic, and it is clear that they are prepared, if need be, to take the field together against the aggressive interference of Europe. "The more the power and authority of the West gains ground in the Old World," says Professor Vambéry, "the stronger becomes the bond of unity and mutual interest between the separate factions of Asiatics, and the deeper burns the fanatical hatred against Europe." At present we have no cause for serious alarm, but he questions the wisdom of nipping in the bud "the work of modern culture which is now going on in Asia." Yet may not the advantages of "modern culture," bestowed so aggressively on the Asiatic, and apparently received so unwillingly by him, be outweighed by the loss of moral prestige which a nation risks in enforcing Western ideas at the point of the bayonet?

THE TEACHINGS OF BAHÁ'U'LLAH.

Abdul-Baha Abbas, the present leader of the Bahai movement, has summed up the teachings of Baha'u'llah under nine heads, of which the following are the first three:—"First, he lays stress on the search for Truth. People are too easily led by tradition. For this reason they are often against one another and dislike one another. But the manifesting of Truth becomes the cause of the Unity of Faith and Belief. Racial, patriotic, religious, and class prejudice has been the cause of the misery of humanity. Secondly, Baha'u'llah taught the oneness of humanity. All the children of men are the sons of one God. Therefore, all nations and peoples must consider themselves brethren. They are the branches, leaves, flowers, and fruits of one Tree. They are pearls from one Shell; but they are in need of education and civilisation, and require to be polished till they become bright and shining. Man and woman should both be educated equally, and equally regarded. Thirdly, Baha'u'llah taught that Religion is the chief foundation of Love and Unity. If a religion becomes the cause of hatred and disharmony, it would be better for it not to exist than to exist."

ESPERANTO IN THE FAR EAST.

The study of Esperanto ought to be encouraged by lovers of peace in every land, for it affords a practical means of overcoming that barrier of language which plays such an important part in misunderstandings between people of different countries that frequently lead to war. It is interesting to learn that this international auxiliary language has taken root in the Far East. There are now 300 Esperanto students in Mukden, the capital of Manchuria, and a local theatrical company is reported to be giving daily performances in aid of the funds. Eighty-two of the students have joined the Universal Esperanto Association. A Russian Esperantist Directory has recently been published at Moscow, which reports that Esperantists are to be found in 532 towns and villages in Russia, including 57 in Russia in Asia, and 23 in Turkestan.

ECONOMICAL COOKERY.

The National Food Reform Association has sent us a little book containing recipes of nourishing, economical, and tasty dishes which has been found useful by social workers all over the country, and may prove helpful in the efforts that are being made to relieve the grave and widespread distress. The estimated cost of each dish (at "store prices") for a family of six persons ranges from 4½d. to 7½d. Large numbers could be fed at a greatly reduced rate, particularly as some of the ingredients are not indispensable. The Committee would be happy as a slight token of their sympathy to forward a copy of the book to anyone engaged in social work on receipt of a stamped addressed envelope, sent to the Secretary, 178, St. Stephen's House, Westminster.

JOHN TREVOR,

Photographic Artist.

Studio: 82, High St., Hampstead, N.W.

Mr. TREVOR does all kinds of photographic work at moderate charges. He makes a speciality of photographing people in their own homes. This gives greater ease and naturalness to the sitter and produces more characteristic portraits. Appointments should be made for interviews and sittings. Price list and specimens on application.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. | Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
Miss ORME. | HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

COMMENCEMENT OF A NEW VOLUME!

Now is the time to start subscribing to

The Sunday School Quarterly.

Edited by J. ARTHUR PEARSON.

CONTENTS, APRIL, 1912.

Heroes of Faith.—John Wesley, Theophilus Lindsey, Albert Thornhill, M.A.
Children and the Cinematograph. Florence H. Ellis.
The Evolution Theory. H. Waterworth.
The Theory and Practice of Sunday School Teaching. A. Stephen Noel.
Dickens and his Message. R. K. Davis, B.A.
The Women's League Fellowship Section. Grace Mitchell.
Notes for Teachers.—I.—XV.
T. F. M. Brockway.
D. A. S. E.
F. J. Gould.
H. Fisher Short.
Lillyblush. E. C. Higgins.
Philip Fincher's First Sermon. A Lay Preacher.
Shelley's 'To-Night.' W. Lawrence Schroeder, M.A.
A Training School for Sunday School Workers. Clara By the Way. [T. Guild.

Threepence net, Postage 1d.

London:

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION,
Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing. —WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCs.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z., INQUIRER OFFICE, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, AYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

LADY living alone, wishes to receive Lady, elderly or otherwise, or Invalid Gentleman with nurse or attendant. No others taken. Every comfort and attention. Very good cookery.—Address, M. M., Clark's Library, 8, Finchley-road, Golders' Green.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED

WHITE

& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

BLAIN & HANKINSON,
Pharmaceutical Chemists,
69, Market Street, MANCHESTER.
Continuing WOOLLEY'S Dispensing and Retail Establishment.

REAL NAVY SERGE direct from Portsmouth. As used Royal Navy, 1/3½, 1/6½. Patterns free. Carriage paid.—JAMES BUCKLE, Serge Contractor, Portsmouth.

REMNANTS! REMNANTS!—
Genuine White Art Irish Linen; pieces measuring from half to one yard, suitable for Teacloths, Traycloths, &c. Per bundle, 2s. 6d. Postage 4d. Catalogue FREE.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

WRITE FOR FREE PARCEL, containing over 200 Patterns of charming new Irish Linen Spring Costume Fabric, "Flaxzella." Washable, durable, makes up admirably, wide range smart designs.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale) JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, April 13, 1912.

* Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

[ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.]

No. 3643.
NEW SERIES, No. 747.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 20, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.]

HANDBOOKS OF RELIGION

Cr. 8vo, 150 pp. 2s. net.

THE JEWISH RELIGION IN THE TIME OF JESUS

By Dr. G. HOLLMANN, of Halle.

Cr. 8vo, 176 pp. 2s. net.

THE SOURCES OF OUR KNOWLEDGE OF THE LIFE OF JESUS

By Prof. PAUL WERNLE, D.Th., of Basle.

Cr. 8vo, 200 pp. 2s. net.

PAUL: Study of His Life and Thought

By Prof. Dr. W. WREDE.

Cr. 8vo, 144 pp. 2s. net.

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

By Prof. E. VON DOBSCHUTZ, of Strasburg.

Cr. 8vo, 160 pp. 2s. net.

CHRIST: The Beginnings of Dogma

By Prof. JOHANNES WEISS, of Heidelberg.

BOOK ROOM, Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

THE ETHICAL CHURCH,

48, QUEEN'S ROAD, BAYSWATER, W.

Sunday, April 21, at 11 a.m.

Mr. G. E. O'DELL.

"Aristotle on the Ethics of Friendship."

" at 7 p.m.

Mr. HERBERT BURROWS.

"Pessimism and the Book of Job."

Wednesday, April 24, at 8.30 p.m.

Mr. ALBERT C. F. MORGAN.

"Gymnastics for the Mind."

Friday, April 26, at 5.30 p.m.

Mr. G. E. O'DELL.

"St. Paul's Conception of Christ."

ALL SEATS FREE.

EUSTACE GORDON

(Manager for the Ulster Unitarian Christian Association),

BOOKSELLER, BOOKBINDER,
:: and STATIONER, etc. ::

Printing Well and Cheaply Executed.
Bookbinding orders carefully dealt with.
Second-hand Books searched for and reported free.

Orders received by post receive prompt attention.

35, ROSEMARY STREET, BELFAST.

London District Unitarian Society.

THE Young People's Meeting

will be held at

ESSEX HALL, ESSEX STREET, W.C.

ON

Saturday, April 27, 1912.

Speakers :

Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., President ;
Mrs. Classon Drummond ; Rev. W. H.
Rose ; Mr. C. A. Wing, and others.

Tea and Coffee, 7 p.m.

Chair to be taken at 7.30 p.m.

J. ARTHUR PEARSON,
4, Ella-road, Crouch Hill, N.

UNIVERSITY HALL,

Gordon Square, W.C.

(Between Russell Square and Euston Square.)

Service at 11.15 and 7.

PREACHERS (both Services):

April 21, Rev. JOHN WORSLEY AUSTIN, M.A., of Birmingham.

" 28, Rev. DR. STANLEY A. MELLOR, of Warrington.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by Christian Scientists.

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical,
Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.

BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 135, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL. NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors :

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster :

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEAD-
MASTER ; or to the Clerk to the Governors,
Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.
—An Open Scholarship of £20 per annum will be offered for competition in July.
Candidates must be under 14 years of age on September 20, 1912. For particulars of the Examination apply to the HEADMASTER.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL,
AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress : Miss
LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation. Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.
—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected.
Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff.
Entire charge of pupils from abroad.
Principal : J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon).
Head of Junior School : Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

TAN - Y - BRYN, LLANDUDNO.—
PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

Sound Education under best conditions of health. Next term begins May 1.

For Prospectus and information apply to
C. J. MONTGOMERY, M.A., Head Master.

PEARL ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices : London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000
Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHERRILL, } Directors.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, April 21.

LONDON.

Aoton, Cressfield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. M. HOLDEN.
Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.
Child's Hill, All Souls', Weech-road, Finchley-road, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. E. DAPLYN.
Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D. Ph.D.
Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11 and 7, Rev. F. K. FREESTON.
Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11, Rev. T. P. SPENDING; 6.30, Rev. GEORGE CRITCHLEY, B.A.
Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Mr. W. R. HOLLOWAY; 6.30, Rev. JOHN ELLIS.
Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15 and 7, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, M.A.
Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. H. GOW, B.A.
Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. WING.
Ilford, High-road, 11 and 7, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Rev. Dr. TUDOR JONES.
Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11, Rev. F. HANKINSON; 7, Rev. J. A. PEARSON.
Kilburn, Quex-road, 11, Rev. C. ROPER, B.A.; 7, BABA BHARATI on "Christening in India."
Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS.
Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. W. ROBSON, B.D.
Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 and 7, Dr. F. W. G. FOAT, Litt.D., M.A.
Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLOR.
Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Rev. JOHN ELLIS; 6.30, Rev. F. HANKINSON.
University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C., 11.15, and 7, Rev. J. WORSLEY AUSTIN, M.A.
Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
Wimbledon, 27b, Merton-road, 7, Mr. WM. LEE, B.A.
Wood Green Unity Church, 11 and 7, Rev. JOSEPH WILSON.
Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. FRED. BROCKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30, Supply.
BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. WOOD.
BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.
BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30.
BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45, Scholars Service; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.

BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. V. D. DAVIS.
BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, M.A.
BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.
BURY ST. EDMUNDS, (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. GEORGE WARD.
BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street, 6.30, Mr. E. R. FYSON.
CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BECKH.
{ DEAN ROW, 10.45 and
{ STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS.
DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
GEE CROSS, 11, Rev. H. E. DOWSON; 6.30, Rev. J. S. BURGESS.
HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS and Rev. H. W. KING.
HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. Dr. S. M. CROTHERS.
LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11, Rev. E. I. FRIPP; 6.30, Rev. T. J. JENKINS of Hinckley.
LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. T. ILOYD JONES; 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH ANDERTON.
LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. D. ROBERTS.
LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 and 6.30, Rev. GERTRUDE VON PETZOLD, M.A.
MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, Rusholme, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WHITTAKER.
MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. DOUGLAS WALMSLEY, B.A., of Windermere.
MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. ALEXANDER FARQUHARSON.
NEW BRIGHTON and LISCAED, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.
NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. ALFRED HALL, M.A.
NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Mr. H. E. B. SPEIGHT, M.A.
PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVERS.
SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.
SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. W. FOX, M.A. School Sermons.
SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. NICOL CROSS.
SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.
TORQUAY, Unitarian Church, Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.
TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. CHARLES LOOSMORE, M.A., of Hinchhead.
WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

BIRTH.

TAYLOR.—On April 16, at Holly Hill, Lostock, Bolton, to Mr. and Mrs. Edgar M. Taylor a daughter.

DEATHS.

HOLLAND.—On April 13, at 35, Duke-street, Southport, after a brief illness, Rebecca, widow of Rev. Thomas Holland, B.A., in her 80th year.

SCOTT.—On March 28, at Zabern (Alsace-Lorraine), very suddenly, James Robert Scott, only son of the late J. C. Addyes Scott, J.P., in his 48th year. Buried at Radlinghope, April 3, 1912.

TAPLIN.—On April 14, at 69, Wordsworth-road, Small Heath, Birmingham, Sarah Jane, youngest daughter of the late Rev. James Taplin, of Kingswood Parsonage Hollywood.

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY."—Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda. Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 1½d.—1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to EDITOR, "Dove-stone," Denton-road, Gorton, Manchester.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.
Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.
Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.
Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.
Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	243	Jacquine of the Hut	252	Reports Presented to the Conference :
THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT :—		The Home University Library	252	The Sustentation Fund	257
Fulfilment	245	Publications Received	253	Guilds' Union	257
NATIONAL CONFERENCE PAPERS :—		FOR THE CHILDREN	253	Union for Social Service	258
The Significance of Jesus for His own Age	248	MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES :—		National Conference Guilds' Union	258
The Significance of Jesus for Our own Age	248	The National Conference of Unitarian and		British and Foreign Unitarian Association	261
BOOKS AND REVIEWS :—		Liberal Christian Congregations	254	Doncaster Free Christian Church	262
A Challenge to Liberals	251			NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	262
				NOTES AND JOTTINGS	263

NOTICE.

A Special National Conference Supplement will be issued with THE INQUIRER next week. The contents will include important Papers by Professor G. Dawes Hicks, the Rev. L. P. Jacks, Canon Lilley, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, and Dr. S. H. Mellone. Orders for extra copies should be sent in at once.

 All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

EVERY other event of the week has been dwarfed and overshadowed by the terrible disaster to the Titanic. Man's proud boast of his conquest of Nature has received a rude shock, and, as always happens in the deepest moments of human helplessness, the cry of need has gone up to God out of the heart of trouble. "Out of the depths have I cried unto thee, O Lord. Lord, hear my voice."

If we must try to put feeling into words at a time when silence seems the truest reverence, we cannot do better than accept as our own the few sentences spoken by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on Tuesday.

"I am afraid we must brace ourselves," he said, "to confront one of those terrible events in the order of Providence which baffle foresight, which appal the imagination, and which make us feel the inadequacy of words to do justice to what we feel. I cannot say more at this moment than to give a necessarily imperfect expression to our sense of admiration that the best traditions of the sea seemed to have been observed in the willing sacrifices which were offered to give the first chance of safety to those who were least able to help themselves, and to the warm and heartfelt sympathy of the whole nation to those who find themselves suddenly bereaved of their nearest and dearest in their desolated homes."

* * *

MR. W. T. STEAD was among the passengers on the Titanic, and there seems to be little ground for hope that he has survived the catastrophe. In him we lose one of the best known and most characteristic of modern journalists. For six years he was editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, but he achieved his most striking personal success in the Review of Reviews, which will be always associated with his name. With a shrewd instinct for popular methods he combined some of the virtues of the crusader. He did signal public service in the cause of social purity, and to the movement for international peace he dedicated the best energies of his later years. But his strong self-confidence and an element of the erratic and the bizarre in his judgment caused him to be looked upon with suspicion by many good people. It was impossible always to take him quite seriously, or to accord to his opinions the high value which he was accustomed to claim for them; but behind the pose of the clever and successful journalist, who thrived on interviews with the great ones of the earth, there was a sterling integrity of purpose and a chivalrous devotion to the service of his fellow-men.

* * *

ONE of the pleasant ceremonies which help to cement international friendship took place last week when a statue of King Edward was unveiled at Cannes. In the course of a speech full of generous feeling towards this country, the French Prime Minister, M. Poincaré, spoke of King Edward's wish to associate in a common desire for peace the two nations of Europe which were the richest in economic and financial resources, the most renowned in respect of their history, the freest by virtue of their political institutions; and of the great encouragement which he had given to the steady growth in masses of the population of a habit of mutual understanding.

* * *

MR. GEORGE B. WILSON, the secretary of the United Kingdom Alliance, has issued his annual statement on the National Drink Bill for 1911. Unfortunately there has been a distinct increase of consumption, attributed partly to the abnormally hot summer and partly to the long spell of good trade. The increase amounts to over £5,000,000 on a total expenditure of over £162,000,000. In 1911 the average expenditure per head of the population was £3 11s. 10½d. as compared with £3 9s. 3½d. in 1910.

* * *

MR. WILSON points out that the result of the temporary closing of the public-houses in Liverpool at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, during part of August, afforded striking evidence that reduced facilities for sale are followed by reduced consumption and drunkenness. The actual arrests for drunkenness were reduced by 67 per cent. But the social results of this early closing were not limited to its effect upon public drunkenness. The Saturday night hospital cases almost ceased. The shopkeepers in the strike-affected areas reported that, notwithstanding the scarcity of money, they did more business than usual. The industrial insurance collectors had fewer arrears, and savings banks showed increased deposits. The Committee of Liverpool Justices appointed to report on the matter found, "after considering all the circumstances, that the closing of licensed premises at 2 p.m. had a very marked and real effect in the diminution of drunkenness and resulting offences. This conclusion," they continue, "is also borne out by the testimony of inspectors for the corporation and other bodies, nurses, and workers for religious and philanthropic societies, whose duties continually take them into the areas of the city which are chiefly affected. Their observations all go to show that not only were people more orderly and sober, but that the women attended more regularly to their household duties, children were kept cleaner, and the households retired to rest at a very much earlier hour."

* * *

THE Bishop of Oxford with characteristic directness and courage has pleaded in the columns of The Times for the need of some principle of economic reconstruction, by which we may hope to avoid revolution and to satisfy our sense of social justice. He finds this basis of reconstruction in the principle that "the adequate payment of the labourer is the first charge upon an industry." It is in the natural order of things that he should be taken to task by Canon Hensley Henson and other writers for a rash invasion of the economic sphere. To this he replies that the extension of the principle of the minimum or living wage is, in his belief, the true line of advance, and that underpaid labour is bad economy for the nation. The weight of opinion in favour of this position is, he adds, too great to be suppressed by denunciation or sarcasm.

* * *

AN important Biblical discovery has just been given to the world. It consists of a papyrus volume containing the greater part of the Book of Deuteronomy, the whole of Jonah, and nearly all the Acts of the Apostles. It is written in the dialect of Upper Egypt and was acquired recently by the Trustees of the British Museum. After careful examination of the script, Dr. Kenyon assigns it to a date not later than the middle of the fourth century. Further indications make it probable that it must have come into existence before the end of the third century, and it may be older. Dr. Wallis Budge agrees with this conclusion. He thinks that it was not used as a service book in a church, but was written for private use.

* * *

THE historical and textual value of this discovery may be summarised in the words of an excellent descriptive article which was published in The Times on Monday. "There is . . . every reason for believing that when St. Anthony heard the Scriptures read in his village church, he heard them read in his native tongue, and that the earliest monks in the deserts of Nitria, the Red Sea, and Upper Egypt, learnt to repeat the Psalms and whole books of the Bible by heart from Coptic and not Greek MSS. The evidence afforded by this papyrus confirms early monastic traditions concerning the spread of Christianity in Egypt. The codex is the oldest known copy of any translation of any considerable portion of the Greek Bible. Indeed, it is probably as early as any copy now in existence of any substantial part of the Bible."

* * *

FOR the wider public the chief interest of the Conference of Unitarian and Liberal Christian Churches, which has been held in Birmingham this week will consist in the series of able and stimulating papers which have been contributed by well-known writers on religious subjects, like Mr. Jacks, Canon A. L. Lilley, Mr. C. G. Montefiore, and Dr. Mellone. Mr. Jacks' paper on Bergson on Wednesday morning contained more personal confession than reasoned exposition, and was all the more stimulating on that account. He would admit doubtless that it is possible to find intellectual salvation by following other paths, and possibly that for a large number of minds Christian theism has always acted as a preservative against mechanical theories of the universe, the over-emphasis of logical theory at the expense of vital experience, and the sterile cul-de-sacs of thought. If we understand Mr. Jacks aright his claim for Professor Bergson is chiefly this, that he is one of the creative influences in the renaissance of Wonder over the whole area of the intellectual and spiritual life.

* * *

"SUPPOSE," he said, "that men in general should follow Bergson in believing that Intuition, and not Intellect, is the organ of spiritual discernment. The effect of this, I imagine, would be to make the mind of the age more open-eyed, more receptive of new impressions, more alive on the side of spiritual imagination. In regard to all that concerns the nature of man and his destiny there would be less intellectual cocksureness than there is at present. The number of superior persons would diminish. The word of the spirit would be less impeded by obstinate foregone conclusions. Dogmatism would become more difficult for everybody. Bergson's teaching, unless I am mistaken, tends towards wonder, towards a deepened sense of the mystery of one's own being, towards intellectual humility in presence of the marvellous works of God. What it loses on the side of finality it gains on the side of expectation."

* * *

"SUPPOSE in the next place," Mr. Jacks went on, "that our age begins to look favourably on the doctrine that Life wherever it is found is a continuous creation and not the rehearsal of a programme. One result of that would be, I imagine, that people would begin to read their Bibles more sympathetically. They would understand better what St. Paul meant when he said that in Christ neither circumcision nor uncircumcision availeth anything, but a new creation. They would be nearer to the writer of the 139th Psalm. They would recover some of that wholesome astonishment which men felt when they first listened to the words of Christ." In a word Bergson's teaching would not provide religion with a fixed ground-plan or an impregnable core of truth, but it might provide a favourable atmosphere and a soil likely to respond to cultivation.

* * *

CANON LILLEY's paper on "Christianity and the Moral Ideal" was deeply suggestive on the lines of a reconciliation between the claims of the individual and society in terms of religion. "On the one hand," he said, in summing up his argument, "there are the various philosophies of will whose ethical result is a justification and even glorification of mere force. On the other hand there is the social reaction against these philosophies which has issued in a belief in social organisation as adequate to the production and maintenance of the moral life. Life itself cannot be permanently satisfied with either of these conceptions. It is itself at all times an effort to transcend the antithesis they present. Religion is the sufficing principle and power of this instinctive effort of life. And Christianity, the revelation of the personal Christ, is the clearest manifestation of the religious principle and the fullest manifestation of religious power. For it insists on what the Johannine writings describe by the great inclusive name of love, the interpenetration of spirits, as the supreme category of life. And that is the reason of the supreme need and value of religion to life to-day."

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT

FULFILMENT.*

BY THE REV. H. GOW, B.A.

"For indeed we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened; not that we would be unclothed, but that we would be clothed upon, that what is mortal in us may be swallowed up of life."—2 Cor. v. 4.

THESE words of St. Paul are usually supposed to express his desire for a physical immortality. He longed, not that the old fleshly vesture of the tabernacle should be dissolved, but that it should be purified and made perfect; not that the spirit should be set free from all with which it was connected, but that what was mortal in him should be swallowed up of life.

We are, I believe, unduly limiting the thought of St. Paul if we confine the meaning of these words to the expression of a longing for the physical resurrection of a glorified body free from all sin and stain.

He had been brought up in the strictest sect of the Pharisees: he had appropriated all that was best and noblest in their traditions and their thoughts. He had learnt to love the Old Testament with a deep and tender reverence. From his childhood upwards he had set himself to obey the laws, to practise the ceremonies, to follow after the ideals of orthodox Judaism. The great words of psalmists and prophets had found an echo in his heart. He loved the Church, the creeds, the traditions, the history of his people; they were a part of himself, the clothing of his soul, the tabernacle in which he lived. But the time arrived when under the influence of the new thought and life which came to him through Christ, this Jewish vesture became a burden to him. He groaned, being burdened. He perceived that the closed system of doctrines and ceremonies which made up the body of his faith was a hindrance to his life. It contained mortal, transitory elements: it was not all pure, eternal truth. The problem which pressed upon him was the question whether he should cut himself altogether adrift from the old forms and thought which he had so loved and revered, or whether he should seek that what was mortal in it should be swallowed up of life. Was Christianity a new religion, independent of the past, or a reinterpretation of the past, a taking up into itself all that was best in the past? Should he throw aside all the old as outworn and useless, preaching a new gospel without relation to the past, or was the gospel which had been revealed to him a new light on old truths, and a closer bond of union with all that was good and great in days gone by? Had Jesus come to destroy or to fulfil? Was the revelation of God in Christ an unclothing, a casting aside, a rejection of the old, or was it a clothing upon, a fulfilment, a deeper understanding of God's working in the past and a more spiritual, intimate fellowship?

St. Paul's answer to that question is suggested in the words of my text. He did not conceive of Christianity as an entirely new and independent revelation; it had its roots in the past, it was prepared for by the past. He did not desire to be unclothed from the body of Judaic religion, but that what was mortal in it might be swallowed up of life.

This is one of the questions which presses on us Liberal Christians at the present day, and it is of this I want to speak to-night.

How are we related to the past, amidst the break up of orthodoxies, amidst the new science and criticism and the new social and personal ideals of our time?

There are three answers which men may give to that question. There is the old answer of orthodoxy, that everything essential has been already given, and that it is for us simply to understand, to appropriate, and to obey what has been once for all revealed. There is the answer of Rationalism or Individualism, which says that by reason and conscience, without reference to the past, we have a practically sufficient guide to life; and there is the answer of Modernism, that the past is not to be ignored or cast aside, that our strength and development lie in vital union with it, and that what is mortal in it must be swallowed up of life.

Let us examine these three answers more closely.

All orthodoxies are essentially closed systems. They affirm that certain principles or facts or theories are true and final. They admit no revision, no fundamental change. At particular moments in history certain truths have been revealed. Henceforward they must be accepted as eternal and unchangeable in form as well as substance.

There are two ways in which orthodoxy conceives this unchangeability of essence, this dependence on the past. They might be compared to the two theories in biology, the old theory of special creation, and the modern scientific theory of evolution in its crudest form. For the older orthodoxy all doctrines essential to life have been given in full and perfect form, through special revelations, at particular periods in history. The truth about God, the truth about Christ, the truth about immortality, the truth about conduct, all has been handed down to us from the past. We can discover nothing more. Our part is to appropriate what has been given once for all, to defend it, to use it, to build up our lives upon it. In such a theory there is no room for change or for development. The doctrines of the Church are final and absolute. Our business as religious men and women is to understand them and obey.

There is a second more modern and more attractive form of this theory which is connected with the name of Cardinal Newman, a man for whom this city of Birmingham ought always to feel a special honour and reverence, remembering with pride and gratitude his long sojourn in its midst. Some of us may have been reading the recently published history of his life in the Roman Catholic Church, spent mostly at the Oratory in this city. It will not attract us to Roman Catholicism, showing as it does the ignorance, the jealousy, the distrust and suppression which he encountered from the leaders in that Church. For one who had been the bright particular star of Anglicanism, so appealing, so influential, so surrounded with friends, the misunderstandings, the hindrances, the intrigues and suspicions with which he met in the Roman Catholic Church were a constant misery and pain. His life as a Catholic, says Mr. Ward, his biographer, recalls the device inscribed at the beginning of a Benedictine Prayer Book, the word Pax, surrounded by a crown of thorns. Inwardly that restless spirit had found peace, but outwardly his life during the early years of his conversion was full of disappointment and weakness, and wasted efforts. He bore himself with dignity and quiet patience throughout that period, and at last we are glad to know he gained even from his own Church the affection and the recognition which his pure, devoted, noble life deserved.

He is sometimes described as the first of the Roman Catholic Modernists. I believe such a description is misleading, and that the Roman Catholic Church was right in finally recognising him as essentially and truly orthodox. His theory of the development of dogma is a kind of Hegelian theory of evolution. All truth is given in the Bible implicitly. It exists there in germ. Nothing really new can ever be discovered. The work of the Church under the guidance of the Holy Spirit has been, and always will be, to render explicit what was implicit from the first. The growth of dogma is a necessary, inevitable, God-guided unfolding. It is the acorn growing according to prearranged divine laws into the oak. A man endowed with perfect knowledge would have been able to foretell the end from the beginning. Everything into which Roman Catholicism has unfolded—the Eucharist, the Trinity, the doctrine of Papal Infallibility, the Immaculate Conception of the Mother of God—exists as a germ in the Bible. The Church has simply expanded and developed, in accordance with the fixed plans of God, what was settled and ordained from the beginning. There are no new elements in any Church dogma, no new discoveries. They are only an explicit statement of an implicit idea.

That is in religion what monistic idealism is in philosophy. No mistakes, no accidents, no discoveries are admitted. The course of the unfolding of the Universe has been predetermined with absolute logical fixity from the beginning. It was given by divine revelation in germ. Nothing has happened since then except unfolding. It is the theory expressed in the well-known lines:

"With earth's first clay they did the last man knead,
And then of the last harvest sowed the seed.
On the first morning of Creation wrote
What the last doom of reckoning shall read."

That hard, fixed theory of everything having been given, and of the present being the necessary outcome of the past, leaves no room for real growth and discovery. It has become to a large extent discredited in our science and our philosophy and life to-day. All I am concerned with now is to insist that it is a thoroughly orthodox theory of religion. It is not Modernism. It leaves us with a closed system. The system was not worked out in all its details from the first, but it existed from the first. It was there in full perfection, every particle of it, only so small and obscure that men failed to observe it in its earliest stages. Evolution is simply the microcosm becoming the macrocosm. It is only a matter of size. The little becomes the large, the obscure becomes the clear, the hidden becomes manifest, the wrapped up becomes the unwrapped.

* Preached before the National Conference of Unitarian and Liberal Christian Congregations at Birmingham, on Tuesday, April 16, 1912.

There is a great deal of orthodoxy outside the Roman Catholic Church to-day which holds this theory of development with more or less logical consistency. Everything has been given in the past, and especially in the life and teachings of Christ. Nothing which is not the inevitable unfolding of his thought, the rendering explicit what was implicit in his teachings, can make any claim to religious or moral truth. Everything was given by God in him. Our part consists merely in understanding and applying and developing what is contained in his thought and life.

That attitude of mind is what I mean by orthodoxy. It does not matter whether you believe that the doctrines were given in full from the first or only in germ, whether you believe in special creation at monumental moments, or in a slow inevitable development and unfolding. The essential thing is that in both cases truth lies in essence all behind; there can be no real advance, no discovery, no rejection of anything, no reinterpretation. The past carries in it the present and the future. There is no escape from its complete and absolute domination.

In sharp contrast with that domination of the past, we have to-day a great uprising of what might be called Independency or Rationalism. It is not a mere individualistic isolation. It is not the cold Rationalism of the eighteenth century. It is a philanthropic Rationalism. It is Rationalism fired by sympathy.

Few ages in history have been so marked by a growing feeling of fellowship. Never was there a time when men felt more strongly that they were members one of another. Our ethics, our politics, our religion are all moulded by our social feelings, and by our sense of mutual responsibility and interaction. We criticise old institutions, old principles, old customs, not, for the most part, from the point of view of our own happiness and comfort, but from the point of view of the welfare of all living men and women. Never was there a time which was more religious in this sense of feeling a mystic and divine relationship, uniting us to one another, claiming us for the service of each other. Behind the most mordant criticisms, within the most bitter denunciations and irreverent revilings of the past, I see not mere angry selfishness and arrogant isolations, but a passionate desire for the common weal. The best modern rationalists are true mystics so far as this present world is concerned, and they have all the self-confidence and readiness for sacrifice of the mystics. They are filled with splendid hopes and infinite desires. They see a new heaven and a new earth. They are socialists so far as this present society is concerned. They are violent Individualists in their attitude towards history. They unite with their zealous desire for reform, fierce intellectual disdain and defiance of the past. They have no reverence for the old. They would like to shatter this sorry scheme of things to bits and then remould it nearer to the heart's desire. They are filled with a sense of the needs of the world, the sorrows of the world, the miseries of the world. They seem to themselves to be standing together with other living men and women, and for the sake of all other living men, in antagonism with the old. They despise instinct which is the product of the past, and they try to live by reason, but they have one instinct which they do not rationalise away—the instinct of sympathy. They are pathologists of the past. They insist on its corruptions, its mistakes, its false doctrines, its follies. They often miss in their critical diagnosis of its diseases the beauty of its life and the underlying truth of its thoughts. We know what a leading pathologist has said recently about women: all who have learnt reverence for women through love of wife or daughter, or sister or mother, repudiate that judgment with indignation as false and absurd. But there are tens of thousands of men, who recognise the incapacity of the pathologist in relation to womanhood, who are themselves playing the part of pathologists towards the Christian Church or the civilisation of former times.

That curious mystic sense of relation with the present, united with alienation and critical condemnation towards the past, is very characteristic of certain schools of thought to-day. It is marked by great intellectual ability and by deep social sympathies, but also by an amazing ignorance and a gross irreverence. Rationalism used to be content with criticising and pulling to pieces old Church dogmas. It retained its reverence for conscience which relates us to the past. Now, it is more often concerned with criticising and pulling to pieces old moral principles. It claims to judge all things without reference to racial experience. It desires that this generation should stand alone and should work out its problems and decide as to the right and truth of things by the light of reason in complete independence of the past. It has a strong feeling of comradeship with the living; it has little or no sense of comradeship or communion with the dead. These men are trying to deal with the present without any help from the past, nay, in a spirit of constant opposition and protest against the past. They welcome the strange and new. They distrust everything that comes before them in the form of an ancestor. Traditions, customs, conventions, old use and wont, ancient forms and creeds, and books and principles, tested by the experience and love of centuries, are treated by them as intruding senilities.

They are more tolerant of the last new theory, hatched yesterday, than they are of the teachings of Moses or of Christ. What is last for them is best. What is most unrelated to the old, most subversive of the old, is for them the truest and the wisest thought. To be advanced and emancipated is synonymous with being right. New religion, new morals, new manners and customs, new books, new teachers, superseding and supplanting the old, is what they most desire. They talk with withering contempt of any thought or book or principle which is more than fifty years old.

The Christian Church, with its long history of saints and martyrs, with its creeds and ceremonies and ideals, with its continuity of spiritual life seen through diversity of forms, means nothing great to them. It is a history of corruption, of ignorance, of superstition, of persecution. The political and social history of our own country is for them mainly a record of the oppression of the poor by the rich. They have little sense of the immense efforts and the great achievements of the past. As they look back they are filled with indignation. They have no feeling of gratitude. Nothing has been done; everything remains to do. They are what the Post-Impressionists or Futurists boast they are in art. They try to be apostles without ever having been disciples. I can imagine the spirits of the best and noblest of all ages looking down on this present generation, so self-confident, so wanting in reverence, so certain that it is right and all preceding ages wrong, and crying out in pain like King Lear:

"How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is To have a thankless child!"

I think it may be said that every great moral and social movement in history which has been really fruitful, and has marked an epoch in progress, has been as much inspired by reverent memories as by ideals and hopes. "Our finest hope is finest memory," as George Eliot says. It has been a reformation, a reinterpretation of the past, a return, a rediscovery. The great reformers have not merely reasoned and argued; they have said, in the words of St. Paul, "Behold, I put you in remembrance." They have found the living God in the old, they have not been content with seeing Him only in the new. Their life and ideals have had their roots in the old. They are not mere mushroom growths upon the surface. They are branches on that undying tree of life whose leaves are for the healing of the nations. They can say of the Christian Church, Thou art the vine, we are the branches.

Remember that the Renaissance was inspired by the rediscovery of Greek Art and Literature, that the Reformation was a rediscovery of the Bible, and that Christianity itself was in part a return to the spiritual and pure religion of the great Psalmists and Prophets, and that Jesus owed far more than we are always ready to admit to the teaching of great Rabbis and Pharisees who preceded him. None of these movements depended wholly on the past; none were without new elements of their own. They did not merely copy or imitate the past, any more than Virgil merely copied Homer or Dante Virgil. There was a spontaneous, individual, adventurous, remoulding life in them all. There was rejection of the false, as well as acceptance of the true. There was reinterpretation, revision, a something new discovered under the guidance of the ever-living God; but they did not break with the past, they did not try to stand alone, they were filled with a deep and sacred reverence for the best and noblest of the old.

This is the temper of what is called Modernism at the present day. The essence of Modernism is, strangely enough, that it is not merely modern, not merely concerned with the present. The essence of Modernism is a great reverence for the past, a mystic sense of the divine in the past. The Modernist is a man who has accepted without fear or hesitation the results of science and historical criticism. He is boldly rational; he is entirely outspoken. He makes without any attempt at concealment the most amazingly unorthodox statements. He recognises the rights of the intellect. There is no trimming, no timidity, no faltering with what he considers the proved results of reason. He aims, as Father Tyrrell said, at making Religion "a living truth for living minds." The Gospels, the history of the Church, the dogmas of orthodoxy, are treated with unflinching candour and absolute freedom. The Modernist stands side by side with the Rationalist in all his negative conclusions so far as he thinks them proved. But, at the same time, he is poles asunder from the mere Rationalist in his attitude towards the past. He says of Reason what Jesus said of Caesar: "Render to Reason the things that are Reason's, and to God the things that are God's." For the Rationalist, Reason and Sympathy are sufficient guides in all his work to-day. The past is for him a dead body to be dissected, not a living organism of which he forms a part. To the Modernist the past, in spite of its mistakes, its false dogmas, its corruptions, is full of the spirit of God. For him it is not dead, but alive. It does not lie rotting in a tomb, but is present with him as the risen Christ was felt to be present with his disciples. He belongs to it and it belongs to him. He will not allow himself to be cut adrift from the great Church tradition and the Christian life which he finds expressing itself in various ways throughout the ages. "Mankind," says Richter, "ever tends to decline if youth does not take its ways through the silent Temple of the mighty past into the market place of after life." And you remember the words of Dr. Martineau, which are of the very essence of Modernism, "I cannot rest contentedly upon the past, I cannot take one step towards the future without its support."

A deep yearning love, an inextinguishable love for the old, a desire to find truth in the midst of error, good in the welter of evil, and a confidence that God was there as well as here, and that our life and thought is only a moment in a long continuous revelation of the divine, this is the chief characteristic of his thought. He believes in the essential sanity and soundness of racial experience expressed in moral principles, and of the Christian consciousness expressed through the life of the Church. He sees living truths within the dogma of the Incarnation and Atonement, he sees symbols of lasting worth within the sacraments.

The past is not for him, as for orthodoxy, all true and right, a divinely ordained revelation, inevitable, necessary, unfolding exactly as God wills. It does not contain for him everything, and preclude the possibility of discovery and of advance. Nor, on the other hand, is the past merely accidental, haphazard, wayward, unconvincing, a tissue of fables and mistakes and falsehoods to be forgotten or condemned. The past, like the present, is creative, full of spontaneous life, inspired by God, expressing itself imperfectly, but containing divine elements and truths within its rigid forms.

The Modernist recognises to the full the presence of God in the world to-day, and the call to go forward into the unexplored regions of life and love. For him, life is romantic, adventurous, new at every turn. But romance, as opposed to realism, is essentially delight in the wonder and glory of the past. It springs out of a revived realisation of the greatness and beauty of former times. It is not adventurous in the sense in which the prodigal son was adventurous, going into a far country and there wasting his father's substance in riotous living. It is adventurous like Ulysses, carrying his Greek ideals and his Greek faith with him, feeling that

"All experience is an arch wherethrough Gleams that untravelled world whose margins fade,
For ever and for ever as we move."

It is adventurousness like Abraham "going out not knowing whither he went," but bearing with him wife and household, and his memories and his God. It is in vital connection with the old while pressing on joyously into the new.

The Modernist recognises that this present society of ours is an organism so that when one member suffers all the members suffer with it, but it is not for him an organism independent of the past. The word of the rationalist is self-expression, self-development. The word of the Modernist is self-denial, self-sacrifice. He is not content with saying, You and I depend on one another and must work out by reason the fullest expression of our common life. He is not trying to build up a State or a Church out of relation to the old. He talks less about rights than about duties. The Rationalist sees in the past a mass of hindering conventions, and foolish fashions and outworn dogmas; the Modernist sees in it behind its errors a revelation of God to humanity, a claim on his obedience, his gratitude, his reverence. He seeks to transmute and transfigure the past, not to escape from it.

It is significant that for the true Modernist the Communion Service is of great and lasting value. It is not for him a mere memorial service of thanksgiving for a good life which ended nearly two thousand years ago. It is essentially the recognition of a living fellowship and communion with the past. It is the feeling that the highest and the best in the ages that have gone are still with us in our sorrows and our bewilderments and efforts here to-day. It is communion, not commemoration, the sense that Jesus and all the good and great whom we have known are living and working with us still, that we without them cannot be made perfect, that their life is our life and their God our God. In the presence of that great cloud of witnesses we have to run our race and conquer our temptations.

We Liberal Christians belong to that great Modernist movement which is at work in all the Churches. There is no section of the Christian Church in which that movement should be so full and strong and unimpeded as in ours. We have passed through the period when criticism seemed the most important thing. We feel now that reverence and communion, in harmony with reason, are the most important things. We feel that we are in vital connection with the past, and that we are truly members of the Christian Church.

Our strength has lain in the fact that amid all the excesses of our critical faculties, we have always revered conscience as supreme, and conscience rightly understood is a link with the past; it is not a lonely God speaking to a lonely soul; it is not a single note struck by the hand of God within the heart. It is part of the great harmony which is expressed by all the noble and inspired men and women through the ages. It is full of solemn reverberations from racial experience under the guidance of God. Conscience as a mere sense of personal justification, for what seems desirable or right may lead, and often does lead, to wild unruliness: it is often another word for vitality and zeal and determination to get the thing we want and to justify our way of getting it. Conscience in the true sense finds no break between the living God to-day and the God who spoke in the Prophets and in Christ, and by whose guidance the great moral principles which call for our obedience have been revealed to men:—

"Unwritten laws, eternal in the heavens;
Not of to-day or yesterday are these,
But live from everlasting."

The fullest expression of that experience is given to us in the Cross and in the self-sacrifice of Christ.

It is the symbol of the spirit of God working in man through all the ages. It is the power of God unto salvation. The pains of the world, the sorrows of the world, the injustice of the world appeal to us for sympathy and for wisdom as they appealed to Christ. It is in his spirit that we must meet and conquer them. Our fathers, in their pilgrimage, walked by God's guidance and rested on His compassion. There is the same God for us as for our forefathers, and in the old time before them. With wondering, prayerful thoughts we look out into the abyss of unborn time. We know not what changes are coming, what leaders will be sent. It is a great and glorious adventure in which we are engaged. We belong to the army of the living God: "Part of the host have crossed the flood, and part are crossing now." We are but as little children in our knowledge; may we be as little children in our trust and reverence. Behind us, within us, and before us, there is always the love and guidance of our Father. We pray Him that the spirit of Jesus, the spirit of that love which suffereth long and is kind, which beareth all things, believeth all things, endureth all things, hopeth all things, may be ours, and that what is mortal in us may be swallowed up of life.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE PAPERS.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF JESUS FOR HIS OWN AGE.

By C. G. MONTEFIORE, M.A.

THE interesting and original paper by Mr. C. G. Montefiore on "The Significance of Jesus for His Own Age" will appear in full in the Hibbert Journal. We must accordingly be content with presenting the following synopsis of its contents. After pointing out that the religious results which Jesus achieved were partially due to causes which lay outside the actual religious teaching of Jesus himself, he affirmed that these would not have produced the results we know without something else. The death, the story of the resurrection, Paul, the non-Jewish religious environment and atmosphere, were all necessary, but they needed something upon which they could act. That something was Jesus himself. Because Jesus was such a man as he was therefore all the rest followed. The significance of Jesus for his age lay in this, that he caused fundamental beliefs of Judaism, and more especially fundamental religious relationships of the Jews to one another and to God, to flow over to and become the possession of the world at large. In other words, he brought about the diffusion and universalisation of some fundamental tenets of Judaism. This is not to deny that there are elements in the teaching of Jesus which are off the main Jewish line, or that there was nothing new and original in it. But when all this has been taken into account, the new sinks into insignificance in comparison with the old. What Judaism, or some Jews, had been trying to do on a small scale, always hindered by the barriers of race and nationality, was now to be done on a scale commensurate with the greatness of the object and the splendour of the goal.

If we take the teaching of Jesus about God and His Love for His human children, the doctrines of repentance, of chastity, and of humility, the love of father and mother, the care for the poor and the needy, the meaning of prayer, the resurrection of the body and the immortality of the soul, all these were Jewish teachings. They formed part and parcel of contemporary Judaism, and they outweigh the differences between Judaism as a whole and the total religious doctrine of Jesus. The contention is, as against the ordinary Christian view, that the improvements made by the historic Jesus upon Judaism as a whole are small in comparison with the agreements. If this is so, it is not surprising that the religious significance of Jesus for his own Jewish contemporaries was comparatively small. In comparison with what he had (after his death) to say to the Gentiles, he had (in his life) little to say to the Jews. Though the Jews could in other matters have appropriated many of his teachings with advantage, and consistency, they had the most important things already. They had God, the one God, His Righteousness, and His Loving-kindness; they had the reverence and the love of Him; they had His service, they had prayer and adoration, they had the love of their neighbour, a love which was more profound, far-reaching, and delicate than the outer world (almost always hostile or prejudiced) has cared or been able to discern. They had humility and chastity, they had repentance and the divine forgiveness, they had the study of the Law, they had alms-giving and charity, they had memories of the past and hopes for the future, they had the conviction of resurrection and immortality. It was a rich and yet wholesome religious fare, and upon the whole they could manage on it exceedingly well.

But the Jews were God's children because Abraham was their ancestor, and the transference of Judaism to the Gentiles upon any large and adequate scale was beset with difficulties. For a child of God to mean a believer in Jesus, the divine Saviour, implied much wider limits than for the same term to mean the descendants, even the spiritual descendant of Abraham; for all men could become believers in Jesus by an act of faith, his yoke demanded a circumcision of the heart, but not also the circumcision of the flesh. Thus the significance of Jesus lies in the fact that he started the movement which brought about the translation of Judaism into the Gentile world. He started the movement; not only his actual death and his supposed resurrection, not only Paul and the religious ideas of the heathen world, had a hand in it and brought it about, but Jesus himself, Jesus the living historic man, his character, his teaching, and his life. He did not theoretically or directly break down the wall of severance between the Jew and the Gentile, but his teaching paved the way for and could easily be fitted into the doctrine of a successor, who should find the bond of union not in race but in common attachment to the same Saviour and the same Lord. In these respects Jesus resembled the prophets in their moments of universalism, yet the prophets were more interested in the State, the national future, and the national glory than he. Herein he parted company from them. In another respect he joins on to them clearly and definitely.

He depreciated ceremonies and extolled justice and compassion as they had done. The saying stood, "There is nothing from without the man that going into him can defile him." He thus paved the way for breaking down the separating and nationalist trammels of the priestly and ceremonial law. What Jewish propagandist had never succeeded in doing even in their conscious efforts to win many proselytes, Jesus, without intending, accomplished.

A word must be added about the significant characteristics in Jesus which were either defects of qualities or which were qualities that, from a Jewish angle of vision, led to retrogression in his Church. The prophets believed in their cause, but only in that sense can they have been said to have believed in themselves. They strike no personal note, but Jesus strikes it. He does not merely speak in God's name, he speaks also in his own. Unlike the prophets he founds a society, for the Kingdom of God which he announces is not only God's Kingdom, it is also his Kingdom. In that Kingdom if God is the Sovereign, he, Jesus, is to be the Viceroy. If Jesus claimed to be or if he thought he would ere long become the predicted Messiah, then, however much he gave to the old term a new meaning, he did believe that he stood in some special relation of pre-eminence or dignity towards the divine Father. And if he felt like this, it was possible for him to have taken the great, the severing step—severing him, that is, from the purest Jewish tradition—and to have not only said "Believe in God," but also "Believe in me."

In this personal note struck by Jesus lies an immense feature of his peculiar significance. This new limitation of love is not without its ultimate basis in his own teaching, his own claim, his own faith. The worship of Jesus is mainly, indeed, due to other causes, but it is partly due to himself, for that doctrine of his deity, with all its implications, which both Jews and Unitarians reject, the historic Jesus is at least partially responsible. If he had not taught and said what he did, his death and his supposed resurrection, and Paul and the Pagan religious environment would not have sufficed to crown him with Godhood, or to have produced even after centuries of development and struggle the imposing Athanasian creed. The germ goes back to Jesus, and in that germ is contained a big chapter of his significance. His was not merely the teaching of a passing prophet. It was the teaching of a beloved and unique personality. There was indeed some shifting of emphasis, but this very shifting is in the last resort due to Jesus himself. The centre of the teaching of the historic Jesus is God. The centre of the teaching of his Church is he; and yet the centre is in a sense brought back again to where it was before, for the Son becomes at last to the Christian dogmatist of one substance and co-eternal with the Father.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF JESUS FOR OUR OWN AGE.

BY THE

REV. H. J. ROSSINGTON, M.A., B.D.

"HISTORICAL Christianity," Emerson once declared, "has fallen into the error that corrupts all attempts to communicate religion. As it appears to us, and as it has appeared for ages, it is not the doctrine of the soul, but an exaggeration of the personal, the positive, the ritual. It has dwelt, it dwells, with noxious exaggeration about the person of Jesus. . . The manner in which his name is surrounded with expressions, which were once sallies of admiration and love, but are now petrified into official titles, kills all generous sympathy and liking. All who hear me feel that the language that describes Christ to Europe and America is not the style of friendship and enthusiasm to a good and noble heart, but is appropriated and formal—paints a demigod as the Orientals or the Greeks would describe Osiris or Apollo." Uttered, as these words were, in the course of his "Address before the Divinity Class, Cambridge, 1838," it is not difficult to see what was then their true meaning and application. The speaker was far from seeking to belittle the historic Jesus or to minimise his spiritual significance for mankind. As if to guard against the possibility of such an interpretation, he had earlier laid weighty emphasis upon the supreme insight and power of Jesus. He saw with open eye the mystery of the soul. He alone in all history estimated the greatness of man. But, as Emerson points out, the spiritual character and appeal of Jesus had been concealed rather than revealed by the traditional way of describing him.

That of which Emerson thus complained was even then undergoing attack on the Continent, and was soon to yield place to a more natural and illuminating mode of treating the historic figure of Jesus. In the light of subsequent developments we can perceive that the year in which Emerson delivered his Address falls in a transitional period. The old methods were being discredited, the new had not won general recognition. Religious circles in Germany were at the time greatly agitated by controversies caused by the publication of Das Leben Jesu three years before. In Strauss' epoch-making work new historical methods that were destined to remove the appearance of unreality characterising the figure of the traditional Jesus were applied by a keen scholar and uncompromising critic to the records of his life. While it is true that their object and immediate effect in this particular case were destructive, and that Strauss was more occupied with the removal of the unreal than with revealing the actual aspect of the Synoptic Jesus, nevertheless his book helped to perform this positive and very necessary service: It made apparent the paths by which later scholarship had to proceed in order to obtain for the personality of Jesus greater reality, and regain for it that generous liking and sympathy it had lost. From that time forward three definite tasks were seen to need the earnest attention of the New Testament scholar:—

- (1) The literary criticism of the sources.
- (2) The investigation by sound historical methods of Judaism and early Christianity.
- (3) The critical examination of the representations of Jesus.

It is outside the scope of the present paper to dwell upon the manner in which those tasks were undertaken or to give in detail the remarkable results accruing. Nor can mention be made of the many distinguished men who have devoted great abilities to the cause of historical research—scholars representing many lands and varied types of religious experience who have laid us all under such a deep debt of gratitude. It must suffice to say that, differing as their conclusions may sometimes be, concerning the historical methods employed and the legitimacy of their application to the life of Jesus, there is now no serious question. As little is it open to question that the gains resulting from the rightful use of historical canons of criticism are acknowledged and welcomed by heterodox and orthodox scholars alike. Perhaps I may be permitted to indicate the striking character of the change, as it affects our present purpose, by quoting the words of one of the six Oxford tutors who contributed to Contentio Veritatis in 1902. Speaking of nineteenth century New Testament scholars and of what they had accomplished for our age, the Rev. H. L. Wild says: "It was their purpose, using the best historical methods available, and approaching the matter from a purely historical standpoint, to endeavour to determine who Jesus was, what He taught, what was the character of the age in which He lived. . . . And so the process has gone on—a constant process—with results upon the thought of the time analogous to the general results of scientific work in the world of nature. A new spirit is abroad: on all hands we are conscious of new interest and new life; the religious atmosphere has been freshened by the honest and straightforward impulse to endeavour to see things as they are, and to follow the argument hopefully whithersoever it may lead. The new interest alone might make these things worth while, but here as elsewhere new freedom and new power have followed upon new knowledge. The general result of the work has been to create the impression that in presence of this life of Jesus, as in presence of nature, we are still but as children gathering pebbles on the shore, but enough has been secured to assure us of the value of the quest, and the conviction has been steadily gaining ground that from here, if from anywhere, from this life more surely known and better understood, will come all true progress and all gain in power amid our difficulties" (Contentio Veritatis, pp. 108-109).

We may share that conviction, and have a like confidence in the possibilities of progress, yet it is essential to note that some of the special difficulties of our present age are the outcome of this new thought. Not without reason does the writer of that passage detect an analogy between the results of historical criticism and the results of scientific research. If in both those departments they have been remarkable and far-reaching, in both alike their tendency has been to create problems unknown before. All that need concern us here is to point out their interaction, together with their influence upon the popular thought of to-day, as they touch the important question we are considering. While the historian has been making more clear and convincing the picture of the past, the scientist has revealed the extent and character of our present world. With ever-growing interest and ardour modern minds have turned to the contemplation of natural beauty and to the mastering of Nature's secrets. Slowly but surely a new universe has been revealed to their gaze. In proportion as this has become increasingly valid for thought, so too it has given to life here and now a new meaning and value. Although it would be too much to say that other-worldliness has entirely disappeared, yet it is undoubtedly true that it has ceased to be the chief factor in determining human thought and act. No longer is the belief in a life hereafter mankind's main concern. It has become largely subordinated to more pressing and practical beliefs which find their common centre in the longing for the coming of God's kingdom upon earth. Not without a profound influence upon earlier conceptions has science thrown light upon an almost unlimited past. It has taught us not only to expect, but to prepare for, a practically unlimited future of our race in this present world. Perceiving the practical implications of this conception of the life that now is, we think of, and make plans for, the continuance of society if not in its present form at least in its present sphere. The end of much strenuous and unselfish service to-day is to make this earth better by removing its social evils and making possible that religion of the spirit which bad material conditions so seriously hamper.

Now for many who have thus come to look at life and its duties there is much that is alien if not actually disturbing in the recent presentations of the life and times of Jesus. Granted the fact of their greater clearness and consistency, all the more sharply defined is the contrast they suggest between his age and our own. How essentially different are the thoughts, the aims, the respective points of view! We are conscious of the greater fidelity of the portraiture, but what of that if it merely serve to reveal one who stands aloof from the hopes, the aspirations, the endeavours, that determine our dominant ideals! So far from sympathising with our social programmes and propaganda, the Jesus we are asked to see looks forward with confidence to the swift cessation of all earthly things, and bids his followers set all their hopes on things above. The words which he utters, the ideals of life which he offers for acceptance, presuppose conditions vastly differing from our own. Existence in his day seemed more simple, more easy, suggesting little of that acute economic stress and strain which enters so largely into many modern lives.

It was inevitable that this contrast should give rise to real difficulties and make imperative the answering of certain pertinent questions:—Can a religious faith which started under such different conditions, make an effective appeal to this progressive, scientific age of ours? Can its founder, with his unconcern for all temporal blessings, minister to the clamant needs of to-day? Slight is the satisfaction afforded by some recent writers to men for whom these are living questions. The eschatological point of view is the true historical view, so Professor Burkitt and others assure us. If that be so, then we need cherish no false hopes. This is our condition, as understood by Professor Burkitt in one of his most recent studies of the Synoptic Gospels:—"Let the children first be filled"; we must first of all think of our Lord in connection with the aspirations of his own time and his own country, and be ourselves content with the crumbs that have fallen down into our very different world. After all, the table was spread for the lost sheep of the House of Israel, not for us." ("The Earliest Sources for the Life of Jesus," p. 75.)

There is sufficient of truth in this telling statement to make apparent the difficulties inherent in a one-sided and too emphatic eschatological view. We have to face a situation which is likely to become increasingly difficult for liberal Christianity. If there is no reason to fear a complete "collapse" of the liberal Christian position, still the ethical foundation on which it has mainly relied will be wanting if the extreme eschatologists gain the victory.

It will then be essential to think of the teaching of Jesus, not as occasionally or accidentally coloured by the expectation of another world, but as completely determined by it, so that the purely ethical and universal note is scarcely discernible. For my part, I cannot accept this extreme view. On the contrary, I find in the Synoptic Gospels much that is as significant for life and its problems to-day as it was for those of earlier ages. Professor Burkitt himself unconsciously supports me in this. When dealing elsewhere with the teaching of Jesus he quotes with approval a number of moral precepts on which Justin Martyr relied when commending to the favourable consideration of a pagan emperor of the second century the characteristic ethical teaching of Christianity ("The Earliest Sources for the Life of Jesus," p. 44.). What more is needed to prove that then as now those who treasure the teaching of Jesus can use it for ethical purposes altogether apart from its first eschatology!

Still more important, however, is this further question: How far do the results of historical criticism affect our estimate of the person of Jesus and its significance for the faith of to-day? There probably never was a time when the interest in, and the affection for, the Jesus of the Gospels were so pronounced as at present. Here and elsewhere men who have abandoned all formal connection with organised religion still retain their respect and liking for him. The Social Democrat of Germany mentions his name with enthusiasm even when declaring his unconcern for the Christian religion, while an allusion to Jesus before an audience of English working men will win applause when a reference to the Church only calls forth marked disapproval. Doubtless this is partly due to the fact that Jesus is claimed as comrade and social reformer by those who thus regard him. Even more is it due to the fact that his personality appears more humanly convincing and attractive than in the earlier conventional treatments of it. From whatever cause it may spring, however, this favourable attitude to Jesus is of the greatest possible value and significance and needs to be allowed for in all modern attempts to reach the masses. But here the question arises: Can the personality of Jesus as depicted in its historical characteristics by recent criticism offer present help and personal communion to sinful and sorrowful hearts to-day? Can it be so realised in thought and feeling as to prove an actual dynamic power? In this respect the answer of the Christian Church is clear and unequivocal. It has claimed, and still claims, that the Jesus Christ of its adoration is at least as great an aid to faith as was Jesus in the days of his flesh.

Let me seek to do justice to the significance of such a claim, and illustrate its moral and spiritual values in present-day experience. No writer of recent times has more clearly revealed his veneration for Jesus, or shown more convincingly the potential power of his appeal, than the German novelist, Peter Rosegger, who belongs to the Liberal Catholic branch of the Christian Church. That veneration for his person, and that belief in his personal appeal, are fused together with striking effect in perhaps the best known of his works. The chief character, Konrad Ferleitner, having been sentenced to death, abandons himself to despair as he awaits the execution of his sentence. The thought of his approaching doom is with him night and day and almost drives him mad. In the hour of his deepest dejection Jesus appears to him in his cell, with astonishing effect. A sense of peace enters his soul, the thought of a settled purpose takes possession of his mind. I tell the rest in the language of the author, as rendered in the English translation of his work: "Something of which he had hardly been conscious suddenly became clear to him. He would take refuge in the Saviour. He would sink himself in Jesus, in whom everything was united that had formed and must form his happiness—his mother, his innocent childhood, his joy in God, his repose and hope, his immortal life. Now he knew, he would rely on his Saviour. He would write a book about Jesus. Not a proper literary work; he could not do that, he had no talent for it. But he would represent the Lord as He lived, he would inweave his whole soul with the being of his Saviour so that he might have a friend in his cell. . . And so he wrote and wrote. He did not ask if it was the Saviour of the books. It was the Saviour as he lived in him, the only Saviour who could redeem him. And so there was accomplished in this poor sinner on a small scale what was accomplished among the nations on a large scale; if it was not always the historical Jesus as Saviour, it was the Saviour in whom men believed become historical, since he affected the world's history through the hearts of men. He whom the books present may not be for all men. He who lives in men's hearts is for all. That is the secret of the Saviour's undying power. He is for each man just what that man needs. We read in the Gospels that Jesus appeared at different times and to different men in different forms. That should be a warning to us to let every man have his own Jesus. As long as it is the Jesus of love and trust, it is the right Jesus." ("I.N.R.I. A Prisoner's Story of the Cross," translated by Elizabeth Lee: Prologue.)

No one would surely venture to deny the reality of the experience which is here so beautifully told. It has been represented in countless Christian lives since the day of that nameless second-century writer who speaks of Christ being "new born every day over again in the hearts of believers." What could compensate us in our sins and sorrows to-day for the loss of the peace and power which enter the lives of those who consider they have realised the saving and consoling presence of Jesus? And yet, from the standpoint of historical criticism, our author's conclusion cannot be unconditionally accepted. If every man is thus at liberty to create his own Jesus, provided he be a Jesus whom he can love and trust, is there not a grave danger involved? At the very time we have come to appreciate historical truth and accuracy, and to rejoice in the reality they have given to the person of Jesus, must we be content to forego these in the interests of a present and personal Saviour? We are surely in sad plight if we have to make our choice between scientific certainty and the certitude of a spiritual experience like unto that portrayed by Rosegger. But who that values the things that are more excellent would hesitate in choosing? It is only right that historical criticism should be heard on this matter, and no one is more qualified to speak on its behalf than that great and uncompromising critic, Professor Schmiedel:—"If we now say 'Jesus is my life,' we are not referring to the historical Jesus, as including characteristics which to us are unacceptable, but we are referring to an ideal for which the historical Jesus has supplied only the essential features. . . In discussion with theologians, the truth must be most deeply emphasised that it is impossible to hold a real communion with Jesus as a man of the past; what appears to be such a communion consists entirely in self-identification with the mental attitude of Jesus, and in producing in oneself thoughts which are believed to be called into being by Jesus in a kind of conversation. Such a proceeding, however, is richly fraught with blessing to the soul, even though it involves an intellectual error. And naturally it leads to a lofty reverence such as is rendered to no other hero, however great, to no other benefactor of mankind, however eminent. To all these we look up with awe, with the feeling of littleness in comparison with them, with heartfelt gratitude for what we have received from them, and with the consciousness of still being by them helped forward on the path of victory. But towards none of them do men stand in relations of such intimate spiritual communion as towards Jesus, because the region in which they feel he is helping them is more central than the rest; and because from none else as from him do they receive so deep an impression that he has a heart of love for every human being who approaches him—thanks to his image as depicted in the gospels" ("Jesus or Christ?" The Hibbert Journal Supplement, pp. 78-79).

Although Professor Schmiedel makes a distinction between the language of theology and the language of religion, and, in accordance therewith, is careful at all times to speak of the Jesus of history as differentiated from the Christ of faith, it is apparent that in these words he is conscious of no religious difficulty in regarding Jesus as able to hold some form of spiritual converse with present believers. On the contrary, he explicitly states in the same connection that without the possibility of this kind of personal communion our religion would certainly lose something which is essential to its nature. The real and the ideal are not necessarily opposed but can be brought into harmony in the individual experience. Thus it is possible to conserve the spiritual values which present communion with the ideal Jesus affords without sacrificing the clearness and the certainty of the objective truths established by criticism. This, too, is the conviction expressed in the recent writings of critics like Johannes Weiss, Weinel, and Harnack. When the latter published his lectures on "Das Wesen des Christentums," one of the strongest objections which it called forth in Germany was to the effect that Harnack had found no proper place for the person of Jesus in the Christian Gospel. No such reproach can be brought against Harnack's more recent treatment of the subject. In that remarkable address on "The Double Gospel in the New Testament" which he delivered at the Berlin Congress, he claims consideration not only for the First Gospel of the Kingdom which Jesus proclaimed, but also for that Second Gospel which taught that "God had made Jesus of Nazareth Lord and Christ for Mankind, and that his work was God's work." History, he declares, has set its seal upon it. And hence Harnack strongly affirms that both the First and Second Gospel must be made significant for the Christian faith of to-day. The former contains the Truth, the latter the Way, and in both we find Life.

It is my own heartfelt conviction that such a view must increasingly determine our treatment of Jesus. May I crave indulgence if I seem to surrender the detachment of the observer for the dogmatism of the Christian believer? Brought up to think of Jesus as the second person in the Trinity it was chiefly due to the fact that I could not so regard him that I found my religious position amongst those who called themselves Unitarian. But if I could not accept the traditional orthodox view, neither could I give my whole-hearted assent to a conception of Jesus which, as it appeared to me, was entertained by some Unitarians. According to their view, Jesus was but one of the world's great moral and religious teachers, any one of whom might equally serve for example and inspiration. That position may be for some a perfectly legitimate one, and prove not incapable of affording real assistance. But it is not one which I can accept as truly Christian. It seems to me that for those who are members of the great Christian Church, sharers of its spiritual traditions, and owing allegiance to its illustrious founder, the name of Jesus stands high above every human name. We cannot leave him out of our appeal, or detract from the supreme beauty and strength of his personality, without serious loss in our religious work. I do not claim that he has for us, or can have, the religious value of God, but he is the one in whose word and work the power and reality of God in human lives were made most manifest.

If we believe that, as I myself do with increasing conviction, we must make that belief significant for other lives. And is it not supported by the Gospels even as read in the light of modern criticism? If we go to them, not so much to find a photograph reproducing every superficial trait which Jesus owed to his age, but with a single-hearted desire to behold a spiritual picture which may reveal clear evidence of those deep things of God which are peculiar to no age, how can we despair of success? Now, as at all times, when men would with earnest purpose see Jesus he is to be found, and, with him, those priceless things which make for fuller life:—

First, a conception of God as Father which makes Jesus' relation to the latter the most real thing in the world, a communion with God so intimate and so complete that he can say: "I and the Father are one."

Second, springing from this sense of God's value for his own soul, that deep desire of his nature to share with other lives the spiritual substance which is his, so that his own inner freedom of mind and his own serenity of soul may be theirs, to drive out distraction and to deliver from the anguish of unrest.

Third, the thought of a kingdom of God over which the Father shall hold living and loving rule and in which divine sonship, as Jesus knew and lived it, shall be not merely potential but actual for all the children of men—those in whom he had such profound faith, and for whom he deemed no sacrifice too great.

Have these things, with all their far-reaching implications, no significance for our own age? Does not he who gave them their first significance, and found in them his own abiding satisfaction, commend them still by the life he lived and by the death he was ready to die? Such a one still speaks with compelling and persuasive power. To the men and women of to-day engrossed in the pursuit of merely worldly blessings he says: "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own life?" To those who bear our modern burdens his message still goes forth: "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Those inspired by a lofty ideal of service who are actively concerned for sad and suffering humanity still receive this glad and gracious acknowledgment: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren ye have done it unto me."

Jesus, as thus understood and interpreted, will evince new power to help men in their difficulties and perplexities, and he will do this, not by centring their thoughts upon self, but by making plain to all that the way of salvation is the way of sacrifice, and that the paths of peace are for those in whose hearts God holds constant and complete communion. And, as he thus wins new and greater victories for truth and righteousness, many who have felt his power and been moved by his appeal will seem to hear this question put to them: "But who say ye that I am?" To that question the eager and earnest answer will not be wanting: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God."

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

A CHALLENGE TO LIBERALS.

Faith, Freedom, and the Future. By P. T. Forsyth, M.A., D.D. Hodder & Stoughton, 1912. 5s.

How far has Dr. Forsyth in his new book helped to solve the problem of the Churches? At any rate the position set forth so forcefully (and doughtily—let all bland Liberals be apprised of this!) is one that claims the most careful attention. It is not an eirenicon. Jacob did not offer an eirenicon when he wrestled with a Man till daybreak. It is something better. It is an attempt to throw athwart the standing divisions of present Church parties and confessions the light of an idea, which shall show the old facts in a new grouping, and so re-interpret the sects to themselves—with the result, one would suspect, of considerable astonishment to the sects.

The method adopted is partly historical; but it is history envisaged as the movement of certain grand ideas which are only now working out their full meaning. Dr. Forsyth finds that the whole of the Church's history illustrates the distinction between the Word and the Spirit, between a religion of fact and a religion of conscience. The Church's life was based upon certain overwhelming concrete experiences and revelations which formed the subject matter of the apostolic preaching, and this was the Word. But this preached Word had to be appropriated by those who heard it, and this could only happen if there was in the hearers an active spiritual experience which developed freely on its own lines. This latter is the Spirit as distinct from the Word. And there has been throughout the Church's history "the danger of the Spirit's becoming detached from the Word, and the Church's experience escaping from its creative facts"—witness movements like Montanism, Gnosticism, Mysticism, and Anabaptism. In all such movements there is vagary and caprice, because there is nothing to steady the individual seeker for truth, who in his reaction from orthodoxy runs into an "unchartered spiritualism," a religious subjectivity, such as that of the early Quakers and Levellers—in fact, "the Anabaptist element, with its supremacy of the inner light and of the direct note, of the unwritten word and the popular rule." And coming down to our own time, Dr. Forsyth uses all the powers of his smiting and provoking rhetoric to show how the illumination of the Quaker and the exaggerated spiritualism of the Anabaptist passed on, by successive lapses and degenerations, into the rationalism of the Aufklärung and the sentimentalism of modern Liberal Christianity. With boundless fertility of exposition this point is endlessly reiterated and enforced—the slide of the Free Churches into "popular subjectivism," and then by consequence into spiritual egoism, rational anarchy, and moral impotence.

What is the remedy? Dr. Forsyth replies that it is a renewed insistence on the Word. But the Word does not mean the Bible. There is no longer an infallible Bible for Dr. Forsyth. But there is "the final and ageless Word of the New Testament salvation." There is but one note of the true Church—the note of the Gospel of the grace of God to guilty man in the Redeemer. In order to secure a definite and authoritative statement of this central "Word," Dr. Forsyth proposes that the creed of the Free Churches shall consist of one short article only, and if it can be in Scriptural language so much the better, e.g., 2 Cor. v. 19, 21. This creed is to be declaratory only. That is, declaration does not mean subscription. "The confession of a unitary church does not involve uniformity in every member, so long as it is not openly challenged, renounced, or defied. It is but characteristic, and not coercive." Together with this it is pleasant to be able to quote: "One does not, of course, expect the great dogmatic content of the Church to be reproduced in the experience of every member of it. That is a fertile source of forced piety and hectic faith."

It seems to us that Dr. Forsyth's contention is in substance sound. Just as, in politics, men have gradually learnt during a hundred years that freedom is to be sought within society and not from society, and that an indefinite progressivism, interpreted as the progress of the individual in liberty, spells mere atomism and anarchy, so in religion progress must be within God's historical revelation of Himself and not away from it. In religion the parallel of social construction (as opposed to mere libertarian emancipation) is the discovery of a deeper and purified Gospel within the Christian faith (as opposed to the vagary of an imagined progress beyond Christianity). Unless we can get something absolute, somewhere, in religious history, our relativism of a lower ever passing into a higher, and that into a higher still, becomes the most miserable fiasco that ever travestied under the name of progressive religion ("a drear succession to a dizzy post"). To such futile relativism which has no present hold upon finality we may well apply the words Dr. Forsyth uses: "Spiritualism and idealism are but regulative, they are not creative and constitutive principles." In all this Dr. Forsyth is doing for the Christian faith what Mr. Wicksteed did some time ago in his Essex Hall lecture for the narrower Theistic faith, when he insisted that the "ever on and on" of a progress which has no present goal, deceives itself with the delusion of a life worth wooing but not worth winning.

In this slight and most inadequate notice of a timely and brilliant book no attempt can be made to appraise the many striking instances of historical insight and judgment upon which the writer builds his case. Unitarians will be glad to acknowledge certain important admissions which Dr. Forsyth makes with regard to the unfortunate developments in Nonconformity in the eighteenth century. "The elaborate Calvinism of many of our trust-deeds is a deposit of that century, and it is a record of that scholastic debasement to orthodoxy which is apt to mark an age which has come spent out of a great conquest. The Calvinism of that age is not the molten thought of the great age. It is Calvinism clotted, and sometimes soured. Many of the members of the churches, moreover, passed to Unitarianism (through Arianism) in one direction, and into Methodism in the other." A growing number of Unitarians are willing to admit that their body, both by origin and by development, bears upon itself some of the characteristics of schism and a carelessness about Gospel fundamentals. And if Dr. Forsyth and such as he will set their faces against the continuation of the ridiculous exclusiveness of the Free Church Councils (and we know that Dr. Forsyth has a fervent dislike of trust-deed tyranny), it will be the duty of all Liberals to try and see how far they can go to meet the new suggestions towards unity among the Free Churches.

W. WHITAKER.

JACQUINE OF THE HUT. By E. Gallienne Robin. London: Hurst & Blackett. 6s.

IN "Jacquine of the Hut" Miss Robin has given us a romantic tale of Sark in the old smuggling days. It is the story of a wild girl of the island, the daughter of a fisherman given to illicit practices, whose home is an isolated hut on the Eperquerie moorland facing the restless sea. She is a gipsy-like creature, with the beauty which is born of wind and wave and sun-litten foam—a child of the elements, unaccustomed to restraint, and yet with a loyal and loving woman's heart. Perhaps, from the moralist's point of view, it is a pity that so splendid a girl should waste her devotion on a swashbuckling, masterful Berserker like Ricart de Carteret, especially as she seems to have no objection to his failings, and no desire to "reform" him after the manner of more conventional heroines. But the moralist is apt to get sadly out of his depth when he is dealing with primitive human beings like these handsome islanders, and he will feel, if he follows the fortunes of Jacquine, that he is witnessing the triumph of that unreasoning love, "stronger than cruelty, stronger than death," which obeys a mysterious law of attraction, and often strangely ennobles those who come under its spell. Miss Robin describes the scenery of Sark, the old island customs, farm-house interiors, and eighteenth-century junketings in an extremely vivid manner, and every chapter has that "old sob of the sea" in it which finds so ready an echo in passionate and sorrowful hearts. Her characters are not mere lay-figures; even the doll-like Oriana, with her golden hair and her petty silk frocks from Paris, is alive, if her animation is only that of the butterfly; and Carteret himself is as virile and ruthless as an ancient Viking. We only hope that Jacquine cured him of his propensity to gamble, and drink, and smuggle kegs of brandy when she married him after the dance round the bonfire at the festival of les vîres.

Earth and Her Children (London: T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net) is the title of a little book full of interest and suggestiveness, not only to children, for whom it is mainly intended, but also to teachers and others who have to do with the training of the young. The author, Mr. H. M. Livens, is thoroughly conversant with child nature, and has written about the wonders of the natural world in a way that will arrest the attention and arouse the interest of intelligent boys and girls. Robert Louis Stevenson says somewhere that whatever we are to expect from children, it should not be any peddling exactitude about matters of fact. Facts and figures do not appeal to them, they dwell too much "among the mists and rainbows." This is a truth that Mr. Livens thoroughly understands, and he has adopted dialogue form, making his subjects very frequently speak for themselves. He clothes his teaching in easy poetical language, that appeals to the imagination of the learner and moves him to question and seek further knowledge, without at all realising that he is having a lesson. The chapters on The Wind and The Rainbow seem to us to be especially delightful. Others on trees, flowers, and insects give a wealth of information which will enter the memory to be stored up for future use when the grown man will wonder where he learnt it all. The author aims, we can see, at getting beyond the material and calling out that spirit of awe and wonder that is latent in every child, and which leads on to that love of nature in the profound Wordsworthian sense, that sees God everywhere and the world one great unending miracle. We hope Mr. Livens' book will attain the popularity which it deserves.

THE HOME UNIVERSITY LIBRARY.

TEN NEW VOLUMES NEXT WEEK.

BY way of celebrating the very successful first year of their "Home University Library of Modern Knowledge"—the remarkable series of shilling volumes edited by Professors Gilbert Murray, Herbert Fisher, J. A. Thomson, and W. T. Brewster—Messrs. Williams & Norgate announces that ten new volumes will be issued on Wednesday next, April 24, bringing the number of volumes now published up to fifty. Lord Hugh Cecil's manifesto on "Conservatism" is, perhaps, the book of the ten which will be seized upon with most curious interest.

The other volumes are by Prof. W. Somerville on "Agriculture," a simple statement of principles and practice; Prof. W. P. Ker on "Mediaeval English Literature"; Prof. J. G. McKendrick on "The Principles of Physiology"; Mr. L. Pearsall Smith on "The English Language"; Mr. F. Soddy, F.R.S., on "Matter and Energy"; Mrs. Rhys Davids on "Buddhism"; Prof. F. L. Paxson on "The American Civil War," of which a short popular account has long been wanted; Prof. W. McDougall on "Psychology," which he regards as "the study of behaviour"; and Principal Selbie on "Nonconformity: Its Origin and Progress."

We learn that arrangements are being made for the rapid extension of the Library, and that among the more interesting fixtures for future issues are:—"Ancient Greece," by Prof. Gilbert Murray; "Prehistoric Britain," by Dr. Robert Munro; "Germany of To-day," by Mr. Charles Tower; "The Navy and Sea Power," by Mr. David Hannay; "Napoleon," by Mr. Herbert Fisher; "London," by Sir Laurence Gomme; "The Victorian Age in Literature," by Mr. G. K. Chesterton; "A Study of Sex," by Professors Thomson and Geddes; "Great Inventions," by Prof. J. L. Myres; and "Warfare in England," by Mr. Hilaire Belloc. The names cited are sufficient evidence that the series is being kept up to the high level of its beginning.

"CONTEMPORARY FRENCH POETRY" is a new volume just added to the "Canterbury Poet" Series. Its author is Professor Jethro Bithell, M.A., who prepared the two companion volumes on Contemporary German and Belgian poetry. "Contemporary French Poetry" contains selections from the works of thirty-six recent poets, including Henry Bataille, Paul Fort, Charles Guérin, Francis Jammes, Laforgue, Mallarmé, Stuart Merrill, Moréas, the Countess de Noailles, de Régnier, and Viélé-Griffin. The translations are preceded by a lengthy essay dealing mainly with the origins and significance of symbolism and the present trend of French poetry under the influence of Bergson.

* * *

THE death is announced of M. Gabriel Monod, Professor of History at the Sorbonne. A member of one of the most highly respected French Protestant families, he had won a position of distinction as a scholar by a series of books based on wide research on the mediæval history of France. Among readers in this country he was perhaps best known for his volume of essays on Taine, Michelet and Renan, which was published in 1897.

* * *

MESSRS MAUNSEL & Co., LTD., of Dublin, the publishers of the works of J. M. Synge, and of other notable books by Irish writers, inform us that they are extending the scope of their business so as to include in their catalogue works by British and American authors generally, and that they have now opened London offices at Oakley House, Bloomsbury-street, W.C.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

MESSRS. T. & T. CLARK :—Types of English Piety: R. H. Coats, M.A., B.D. 4s. net.

MESSRS. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD. :—La Confession d'un Enfant: Alfred de Musset. 1s. net. Paroles d'un Croyant et Choix de Prédications: F. Lamennais. 1s. net.

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON :—The Ordinary Man and the Extraordinary Thing: Harold Begbie. 6s.

MESSRS. WM. RIDER & SONS, LTD. :—A Son of Perdition: Fergus Hume. 6s.

MESSRS. SHERRATT & HUGHES :—St. Luke, Evangelist and Historian: Herbert McLachlan M.A., B.D. 2s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Progress, Mind.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

SIR FRANCIS DRAKE.

1545-1595.

I.

'They that go down to the sea in ships, and occupy their business in great waters, these men see the works of the Lord and his wonders in the deep.'—Ps. cvii.

We have been studying the lives of great Englishmen, and I have told you about two poets, a king, a preacher, a martyr, a scholar and statesman, who was also a martyr, and when there was no one in English history to tell you of, we learnt about a French girl—Joan of Arc—perhaps the greatest of all. Also, I told you about a great and good Italian—do you remember his name?—to show you that there were good Roman Catholics just as there were good Protestants. Well, you see from this, England has had great poets, great kings, great preachers, great martyrs, great scholars; and now you must think of another kind of great man. England is a little country with the sea all round it. If we are to know anything of our neighbours we must have ships, and if we are to settle in other countries and discover new lands, we must have sailors. And it is about a sailor that I am going to tell you to-day.

Now look at the map, and see all the places that belong to England. If you think how much people have to fight against in going to sea—the winds and storms—you will see that it must have needed many hundred years and many brave sailors to make voyages to all these countries and take over English people there as settlers. And so it has. I daresay you have often heard it said that "Britannia rules the waves," but perhaps you have never thought how much courage it needed in some of the first sailors to put out to sea in their small ships (much smaller than what we have now) and sail away to discover new lands, not knowing if they would ever come back or not. But it is these first sailors that made England so powerful at sea, and one of the bravest and greatest of them, was Sir Francis Drake. He was the first Englishman who sailed all round the world, as you will see presently. He was born at Tavistock in Devonshire in 1545—just ten years after the death of Sir Thomas More, and in the reign of Henry VIII., who died when Drake was 5 years old, and after King Edward VI.'s and the Queen Mary's short reigns, Queen Elizabeth came to the throne—and a very great queen she was and very proud of having such a sailor as Drake, as she ought to have been.

Drake's father was a Protestant. He was persecuted by Queen Mary (she came to the throne in 1553, so how old would Francis Drake be?) so that he went and settled in Kent and made his living "among seamen in the King's navy," we are told, by reading prayers to them. Afterwards he went to Devonshire, a great place for sailors. As he was a poor man, he had to send little Francis Drake to earn his living very soon, and he apprenticed him to the master of a ship carrying merchandise into Zealand (a part of Holland) and France. So Francis was only 14 when he first went to sea, but he seems to have taken to it "like a duck to the water"—or perhaps it would be better to say a drake!—for we are told, in the strange-sounding old language of the time, that "the youth being painful (i.e. ready to take pains) and diligent, so pleased the old man by his industry, that, being a bachelor, he bequeathed his bark unto him by his last will."

You see, Francis Drake, like all great men, did some hard work when he was a boy. Going to sea was not all play by any means to him. Very likely he had often to take hard words from those over him; he had to do odd jobs, such as washing the decks and lending a hand with the cooking. But he had a head on his shoulders, and he made himself useful, and soon, you see, he became such a good sailor, that the old captain thought he was fit to have a ship of his own. But he was still quite a boy, and before he set sail on any voyages of his own, he was wise enough to serve for a time under Sir John Hawkins, a great seaman and a relation of his. Now, if you are to understand what follows, you must remember what I have told you before about the quarrels between Catholics and Protestants, and how these led to wars. Perhaps you may think that a sailor would not be mixed up in religious quarrels in this way. But England was just turning Protestant under Queen Elizabeth, and a great Catholic country, Spain, was an enemy of hers. Now, Christopher Columbus, who discovered America, was a Spaniard, and so it came about that the Spaniards first began building great ships—galleons they were called—to sail across the Atlantic and bring home the gold and silver and precious stones which were found in South America. Spain had a great navy, and as England had too (for those days) they were always meeting on the seas, and as they were enemies by religion, as England too wanted to have a share in all these riches that were found in South America, they were always fighting with each other. There were many English seamen—mostly from Devonshire—who loved adventure, and would fit out ships of their own, and go on board French ships, to fight these Spanish galleons and seize whatever they could of the wealth on board.

These adventurers were called "Sea-dogs," and some very famous sailors were among them. They did not serve under the Queen, but although they were pirates she did not punish them, for she felt that Spain was her enemy, and she hated King Philip, who had been the husband of Queen Mary (her sister) and had made her still more cruel to the Protestants than she would have been without him. This is how it was that Sir John Hawkins, who had been one of these sea-dogs, was a favourite of Queen Elizabeth, and she sent him on a voyage to the Gulf of Mexico to fight against the Spaniards there. He took young Francis Drake with him, and made him captain of one of the ships, the Judith; and he behaved so bravely in the fight that when he came back, the Queen gave him two ships to command, the Pasha and the Swan. He made his brother captain of the Swan, and with these two ships and only 73 men and boys on board he sailed to the West Indies. Here he took a town called Nombre de Dios, and landed on the Isthmus of Panama, the narrow piece of land that joins North and South America. From the top of some mountains here he saw the Pacific Ocean for the first time, and we are told in an old book that, "falling on his knees, he prayed that he might at some time or other sail there and make a perfect discovery of the same, and hereunto he bound himself with a vow." We shall see presently how well he kept this vow.

While he was cruising about here on the coast of South America he was helped by some Red Indians, who were enemies of the Spaniards too, to seize upon a large cargo of gold and silver that the Spaniards were carrying to one of their great ships. There was such a load of silver, that Drake only took the gold on board his vessels. He divided it fairly among his companions, and all through his life I want you to notice that he was a just man—that is to say, he never tried to grasp more than his proper share of all the wealth he took from the Spaniards, and he never cared about money on his own account, but only because it helped him to serve his Queen and country. When he got back from this voyage, the first thing he did with his money was to fit out three frigates (a kind of small battleship) and go to fight the Queen's wars in Ireland. After that, Queen Elizabeth sent for him and told him how much obliged to him she was, and she put him in command of five ships and told him to go and fight the Spaniards in the South Seas. But he made up his mind that he would do far more than that: he would keep his vow which he made on the top of the mountain of Panama, and be the first Englishman to sail across the Pacific Ocean, and right round the world. He had not made this vow, remember, without praying God that he might be able to carry it out, for, as the verse says which I have found for to-day, "They that go down to the sea in ships and occupy their business in great waters, these men see the works of the Lord and His wonders in the deep," and sailors know that only God can help them when there is a great storm and all their courage and skill is of no use.

So Drake set out from Plymouth harbour with his five ships, whose names were the Pelican, the Swan, the Marygold, the Elizabeth, and the Christopher, and his crew of gentlemen and sailors from the South country, where they are still great seafaring folks, and proud to be the great-great-grandchildren (or thereabouts) of these men who went out so bravely in their small ships to explore countries and seas where no Englishman had ever been before. I daresay Drake never thought he would be as long as two years and ten months before he got back to Plymouth again, but you won't wonder when you hear of all he did in the time. You ought to follow this voyage very carefully on the map, for it is one that all English people ought to know about and be proud of. Look at the Britannia side of a penny. There is Britannia "ruling the waves." If it had not been for Drake, and other great sailors like him, we should have had no right to put that on our money. Whenever you look at it, think of this great voyage of his. Well, he left Plymouth on December 13, 1577, and sailing down the Bay of Biscay and past the coast of Spain, the first place he touched at was the Coast of Barbary on December 25. On the 29th he was at Cape Verde, then he sailed on across this part of the Atlantic Ocean to South America, and reached the coast of Brazil on April 5. Here he went up the Rio de la Plata—Rio is Spanish for river—and stayed two months, from May 25 to July 25, at a port called St. Julian's, to lay in provisions. He parted with two of his ships here, it is not quite known why. From St. Julian's he sailed down the coast of South America to Magellan's Straits, which had never been explored by any Englishman, and are a difficult bit of steering. He left two more of his ships behind, before passing through these Straits, so that now he had only his own ship, the Pelican. It was August 20 when he entered the Straits, and he got through them by September 25, and was at last in the Pacific Ocean. On November 25 he reached a place called Macao, near to Chili. Chili and Peru were the rich countries where the Spaniards got their wealth, so that it was here that Drake began carrying out the Queen's orders and making war on them. With his own single ship he seized and plundered several of the great Spanish galleons and the places on shore, and he had on board his ship half a million's worth of riches when he got back—gold dust and silver, pearls, emeralds, and diamonds. After that he left the Spaniards in peace once more, and sailed away to the North—right up the West coast of North America to California, which had not been explored then, and which he called New Albion, or New England. Next week I will tell you more about his adventures, and how he got safely back to England.

DOROTHEA HOLLINS.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN AND LIBERAL CHRISTIAN CONGREGATIONS.

Meetings at Birmingham.

THE eleventh Triennial Conference of Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other Non-Subscribing or Kindred Congregations has been held in Birmingham during the past week. Admirable arrangements had been made by the local committee for the entertainment of their guests, and the elaborate organisation necessary worked with a smoothness which ensured the comfort and happiness of all. Thanks are specially due to Mr. W. Byng Kenrick the chairman, Mr. T. Oliver Lee the hon. treasurer, and the indefatigable hon. secretaries, upon whom the chief burden has fallen, the Rev. J. Worsley Austin and Mr. E. Ellis Townley. We are informed that 420 ministers and delegates attended in addition to numerous other friends.

The formal proceedings opened on Tuesday afternoon, when the President of the Conference, the Rev. H. E. Dowson, and Mrs. Dowson received the members in the Town Hall. Subsequently the President took the chair, and the following resolution was passed, the whole assembly standing in reverent silence:—"That this Conference has learned with profound grief of the terrible disaster that has befallen the Titanic, and desires to express their deep sympathy with the sufferers, and with those who are mourning the loss of their loved ones in so many homes in Europe and America." On the motion of the President, seconded by Mr. Charles Hawksley, a hearty welcome was extended to the foreign guests, the Rev. Dr. Crothers, of Boston, Mass., and Professor Eerdmans, of Leyden, the latter representing the Dutch Protestantbond. The first part of the business meeting was then taken, and a good deal of the more routine business was cleared out of the way in order to leave ample time for the important discussions of Wednesday afternoon. The reports of the Sustentation Fund, the Ministers' Pension Fund, the Union for Social Service, and the Guilds' Union were read. Mr. T. H. Russell also presented an interesting statement on behalf of the Ministers' Benevolent Society.

The new President, suggested by the Committee and carried by acclamation, is Mr. Hugh R. Rathbone, of Liverpool. Mr. John Harrison was elected treasurer in succession to Sir J. W. Scott, an appointment which also proved very popular. There were numerous expressions of deep concern and regret that Mr. Harrison was unable to be present owing to serious illness.

In the evening the Conference Sermon was preached in the Town Hall by the Rev. Henry Gow. It will be found in full on another page of our present issue. It was marked by all the preacher's fine moral earnestness and his strong personal loyalty to the noble historical traditions of Christian faith and worship characteristic of the churches united in the Conference. The service was conducted by the Rev. H. McLachlan, Warden of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester.

The proceedings of Wednesday began with a Communion Service in the Old Meeting Church, which looked singularly beautiful and solemn in the early morning light. The Rev. E. I. Fripp took part of the service, and the Rev. J. Wood gave an address of touching simplicity and power on Christ the Bread of Life. Afterwards the Conference reassembled in the Town Hall, when the Rev. H. E. Dowson delivered his presidential address, which is given in full below. The subsequent meeting was under the chairmanship of Professor G. Dawes Hicks. The chairman's introductory remarks proved to be a deeply interesting philosophical appreciation of some aspects of Bergson's philosophy. Mr. Jacks gave the first paper, full of fine flashes and aperçus on "Bergson," and he was followed by Canon A. L. Lilley, who had a very hearty reception, with a paper on "Christianity and the Moral Ideal." We hope to publish these papers next week.

The afternoon session was devoted to the two chief matters which the committee had prepared for consideration and acceptance by the Conference, viz., Ministerial Stipends and the Circuit System. On the proposal to raise an additional capital sum of £30,000 to be administered by the existing Sustentation Fund, there was a good deal of feeling that some control ought to be maintained by the Conference itself. Evidently there was some fear, justified by past experience, that the churches would soon cease to feel much concern in a fund which was to be handed over to a body of managers responsible only to a small and gradually diminishing body of subscribers. Ultimately the scheme, as proposed by the Committee, was carried unanimously, and a recommendation was added that the Managers of the Sustentation Fund be requested to accept some members directly representative of the Conference on their board. The President was able to announce that the Fund was already launched, and that £4,000 had been promised. Our full report of the proceedings is reserved for next week. In the evening a conversazione was held in the Town Hall, the guests being received by Mr. W. Byng Kenrick and Mrs. Kenrick.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

Mr. Wood's address at Bolton, three years ago, laid down the lines of two methods by which our Church life might be renewed and strengthened: first, the introduction of a circuit system among neighbouring congregations, binding them together in mutual co-operation, and creating a bond of fellowship in which they would hold out hands to each other, and holding common social gatherings arousing in them a new interest in each other's affairs; and, second, following in the steps of those two beloved and honoured leaders in this Conference, the late Mr. Harry Rawson and Dr. Estlin Carpenter, in taking up the cause of our ministry anew. As Mr. Rawson's efforts led to the establishment of the Sustentation Fund, and Dr. Carpenter founded the Minister's Pension and Insurance Fund, so, now, Mr. Wood's second great purpose has been to secure salaries for many of our ministers more in accordance alike with their deserts and their needs. To these two vital subjects the attention of the Committee has been continuously directed during their three years' tenure of the office to which they were appointed at Bolton. The result of their labour will be brought before you this afternoon, and I hope that the consideration you will be asked to give to their proposals may lead you to join in the endeavour to put them into practice. There has been one feature of our three years' counsels that has given me great and unalloyed satisfaction. It has been the cordial co-operation into which it has brought the Committee of the Conference with the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and with the Sustentation and Minister's Stipend Augmentation Funds. Apart from the issue of the prolonged consultations, the fact that these bodies have pulled together, and that they have come to a complete agreement upon questions vital to our Churches, is of bright omen. The Committee have owed much, in this, to the deliberations of the joint committee, originally of representatives of the National Conference and of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, but subsequently inviting to their counsels delegations from the Sustentation and Augmentation Funds. That these representatives of the four bodies came to see eye to eye in the proposals to increase stipends, since adopted by the Conference Committee on their unanimous recommendation, is of good augury for their effective working.

Returning, in the first place, to the Circuit System about to be proposed by the Committee for your adoption, it is a matter of constant regret to me that our churches are often so isolated in their life and interests. Their horizon is not seldom limited by their own congregational affairs; they are loyal to their own chapels, quite in earnest in supporting them, and doing their level best for them, but largely devoid of any wider outlook, and of any vital sense of union with our community of churches. This isolation in their own little Bethels robs them of the inspiring enthusiasm of belonging to something bigger than the narrow religious circles in which they move. It takes much to get many of our people to care about our National or even our District Associations. Quite a number of them have the vaguest knowledge of what this Conference is, if they know of its existence at all. This is in a degree true, even of the long established British and Foreign Unitarian Association. If it has interest for them, it has it rather as a society to be "milked" than supported, while, in my own immediate neighbourhood, I am sometimes even asked by our people, "What is the East Cheshire Christian Union," the missionary association at their own doors. This is the more so owing to the great change that is coming over our congregations. Our old families, descended from our Presbyterian ancestry, are dying out. They were familiar with our history; they knew our traditions; they took in our newspapers; they attended our national and local religious gatherings; they were in touch with our larger church life. It was a great strength to us, and they felt the obligation of supporting our national and district funds, and fulfilled it. Indeed, to-day we still look to those of them who happily remain in our communion to supply our greater financial needs. But it is urgent that the new comers into our midst, converts from other bodies, sympathisers growing apace, working people entering our churches through the door of our Sunday schools, should be enrolled as living members of our wider communion of churches, national and local. It is vital to their life that our congregations should have a share in a greater cause than that of their own conventicles. To illustrate this truth on a larger scale, what inspiration came to those of us who represented our churches two years ago at the International Conference in Germany. Of all my experiences as your President, none was so stimulating as that. I was, the while, enrolled in a world-wide Church of God, Christian and other, men of Oriental faiths breathing the spirit of the All-holy as truly as we who followed Christ. The Church Universal held me in its embrace. The inspiration of the All-Father made the hour like a Pentecost, and none spoke to me with more living power or with a truer voice from God than my brothers from India. I came home with a new link of spiritual life forged between my soul and a world-wide communion of children of God of like mind. The sublime and prophetic words rang in my ears with new power: "The hour cometh when neither in this mountain nor in Jerusalem shall ye worship the Father. But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth. For such doth the Father seek to be his worshippers." It is this enlargement of our religious interests, and this widening of our religious sympathies, that is needful to the very life of our churches. So, to my mind, from this large and far reaching point of view, as well as from that of organisation, it is very wise to take even the least step in this direction, as Mr. Wood has urged us to do, by knitting ourselves more closely with churches of our own communion hard by our doors. Let us once get out of our isolation and we breathe a larger air, and the thing will spread. That is one phase of the way in which the circuit system has an appeal for us all. Indeed, in some districts it is already partially at work, quite successfully in congregations holding joint religious and social gatherings from time to time. I attended one at Sheffield, and realised its quickening influences on the life of the churches who joined in it. It is now a sacred memory as I believe it was the last time I ever saw or heard that noble apostle of our broad and liberal faith, the late Rev. J. C. Street. But Mr. Wood's scheme, as presented for adoption by this Conference, goes much further in the most complete of its many alternative phases, for it is very elastic; it goes to joint pastorates and pooled finances, weaker churches gathering round a strong one, with its minister superintending the circuit, with pulpit exchanges, with lay helpers, so needful for the conduct of services where each church cannot fitly maintain a separate pastor, and with a circuit council. We have already in Manchester an experiment in that direction—still in the trial stage—but which, I hope, may encourage in the end to the further adoption of the scheme in its fullness. A hopeful symptom is the greater or smaller approval it has received from the District Missionary Associations of our churches in the majority of cases.

I pass now to the second of the schemes inaugurated under Mr. Wood's fertile initiative. It has been formulated by the joint committee of the various bodies whose report upon it has been adopted by the Conference Committee, and will be presented to the Conference to-day. This is a subject very near my heart. It has occupied a large place in my thoughts all these three years, and to see it reach fruition for the benefit of many of my brethren in the ministry is my great concern. It is the one thing above all others that I have determined to see converted into fact by the Conference over which I have the honour to preside to-day, if it can be any way accomplished as I mean it to be. The method we propose for carrying it out will, I am sanguine enough to hope, commend itself to you as it does not only to the joint committee of the delegates of the four bodies which drafted it, and to the Conference Committee which presents it to you, but to the four bodies who have all cordially accepted it themselves.

In this scheme thus powerfully backed already, and now only demanding your final imprimatur, we have followed the precedent of the course adopted in the foundations of the Sustentation and Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund. We recognise, as the Conference did in founding them, that in its own intention, so far as its past history has indicated it, it is a body to take counsel upon the needs of the churches which it represents, and out of that counsel to initiate new movements for their better life and organisation, to set them going and then leave them to walk alone. We have also been anxious to start our present scheme as effectively as was the case with the Sustentation and Insurance Funds, without trespassing on the preserves of bodies already on the ground. As adopting this method had been accompanied by complete success and efficiency in relation to those two previous creations of the Conference, we have been of opinion that so good an example was a thing to copy. It is in that spirit that we propose to carry out the project of further supplementing ministers' salaries, acting not through the National Conference itself, or through a new body created by it, but through the two great funds in existence for the same purpose, viz., the Sustentation and Augmentation Funds.

It is necessary that the respective functions of these two funds should be clearly understood. In one respect they act alike. Both of them confine their grants to ministers, rendering efficient service, and both have an eye to the congregations doing their own share in the maintenance of their ministry. Geographically they have hitherto divided the country between them, the Sustentation Fund operating in the South of England and in Wales, and the Augmentation Fund in the North of England. There is a different method, however, in their mode of making grants. The Sustentation Fund makes its grants to congregations and publishes them, while the Augmentation Fund makes grants to ministers themselves confidentially, and does not publish them.

The latter fund is forbidden by its trust to pay any sum by way of endowment, the grants having to be made afresh each year. The managers are not guided by the necessities of the case, but by the merits of the minister and the vitality of his congregation. In their trust they are instructed to consider his educational status. In their administration of their grants they exercise, moreover, a large discretion as to amount and also to the amount of the salaries they augment. They recognise that not the least important of their unctions is to offer to the ministry a more fitting recompense, graduated according to me it. They remember that the labourer is worthy of his hire, and that the best services are obtainable when the desert is paid. The two funds accordingly act not only in different areas but on different lines, and both are doing in their way an equally useful work, the one more necessary perhaps than the other, but not more beneficial. It is clearly desirable accordingly that both should be enabled to operate throughout the land; and the proposal now made and accepted with entire agreement by them both is that in future they should do so; that the Sustentation Fund should make its sustentation grants throughout England and Wales on its present lines, and that in order to enable it to take on the new area of the work it should be entrusted with the new fund that is to be raised, and that the minimum salary that should be secured by its assistance to deserving ministers should be £175 in large centres of population, diminishing to £150 in smaller towns, and to £120 in agricultural districts in England, and to £140 for towns to £110 for agricultural districts in Wales.

After careful and exhaustive inquiry into the sums required to effect this it is estimated at £35,000. It is, however, believed that £200 a year, equivalent to £5,000 of endowment, can be raised by the congregations, and accordingly £30,000 is the amount.

For this carefully thought out scheme we are indebted to a sub-committee consisting of Mr. Wood, Mr. Christopher Street, and Mr. C. F. Pearson. The two first have been the protagonists in this matter, and it has been a delight to me to see them working at it hand in hand.

To the Augmentation Fund, on the other hand, is left under this scheme the increased responsibility of raising whatever money may be required to enable it to cover the additional area of the entire South of England on its own lines, Wales not coming under the provisions of its trust. Its managers have cheerfully undertaken this task; and who that knows, as I do, the public-spirited liberality of our Liverpool friends will doubt their fulfilment of the undertaking, especially since we have one of the most distinguished of our Liverpool names represented in the chair of this Conference for the next three years. With confidence leaving that to them, I now turn to make to you the most fervent appeal for the new fund that is to be added to the capital of the Sustentation Fund. With the increased cost of the very necessities of life, my heart goes out in utmost concern for my brethren in the ministry who have to live, and support wives and families, and keep up what are called appearances, on the miserable stipends some receive. I have many means of knowing the result, on rare occasions disastrous in almost unavoidable debt, telling a tale of injury to their congregations, and of harrowing anxiety, if not of forfeiture of the respect so essential to themselves. If there is one occupation which calls for a mind harassed by no mean pecuniary worries, it is that of a minister. If he is to give of his best to his people, without a mind distraught, he must be released from the terrors of this res angusta domi. I make an appeal with all my soul in it, and plead for my brethren at the lower rung of the financial ladder, at the top of which I have been placed by no merit of my own. But I am the more concerned—for my own undeserved good fortune—to use this opportunity placed in my hands as your President to-day, to plead with you for the doing something to raise only the least bit higher the far too contracted means possessed by so many of my brethren. We ministers are very close to one another in sympathy; from the bottom of my soul I feel for my brothers, so often hard put to it, yet facing the world bravely with a bright face and a high courage. If I am permitted only to take a small part in laying the foundations of a better time for them, I shall thank God.

We must be ready to give time and labour in the cause. Dr. Carpenter set a fine example in his Insurance Fund, which is a challenge to us. Resolutions passed are nothing till they are carried out. If you pass this one this afternoon, we look to you to translate it into fact, and we will come to you in your various districts to seek your answer to our plea. To raise £30,000 is no light thing, but we have set our faces to see this thing through, and it must be done. Money, however, is not everything to a minister. God forbid.

The ministry is dearer to him than anything money can buy. It brings its own reward with it. I say so with a full and grateful heart in the closing years of mine. I have had in it a constantly increasing happiness; I have had joy in its opportunities of spending life in an activity that carries with it an interest and delight that never faint or fail. The task of holding intercourse with the great thoughts and inspiring souls of the best and noblest of mankind, of living in communion with high and holy things, and of being friend and pastor to my people, and of entering into all their joys and sorrows, is of deathless interest, and brings us into very close touch with the unseen eternity into which we often gaze with them in homes whence a loved spirit has flown.

Our own ministry is the most priceless of human callings in a church like ours, with the open door to truths whencesoever it comes and whithersoever it leads, and in pulpits where we speak just to deliver our souls, none making us afraid. In half a century I have had the inestimable privilege of standing in such pulpits. In them has breathed the spirit of my beloved Alma Mater that has been the passion of my life; and the words of the legend over its portals, "Truth, liberty, and religion," have been written on my heart. It is to this ministry that we want recruits from our best. We have our Ministry Supply Committee. We make an appeal through it to our churches to help forward, by their influence and their pecuniary aid, if need be, young men who hear a call to the ministry to enter our colleges and prepare for their sacred task. Dr. Carpenter, in an address at Gee Cross, spoke of the large proportion of our ministers drawn from other sources than our own, and made a powerful appeal to our own people to send the best of their sons into our ministry. With all the earnestness I can command, I would raise the same plea. At the end of my long ministerial life my eyes are straining into the future, when I shall be gone; that future of our churches is very dear to me. We are making an effort to raise the financial status of our ministers in that coming time, but more by far than finance is needed the manning of our ministry, the call to our youth of the Spirit of God and of Christ to take up this work. Let me say to young men who may be moved to enter the ranks in which I have done life-long service, and which I know so well and love so dearly, that I have found in that service a perennial joy, that I have thanked God every day of my life to have been permitted to give all those long years to it; that if there is any ministry in the land to which to belong is a privilege that is to be prized, it is ours. It knows no limit to its freedom in thought or speech. It stands for nothing less than the truths of God, always to be sought, but never to be found in its entirety upon earth. There is the constant joy of the movement onward and upward, and the light shining more and more to the perfect day.

One word more, and I have done. Ours is the religion of "the open door," and the door of our Conference is open wide to all who, in their search for a "truth, liberty, and religion" like our own, desire to cross its threshold. The long list of names in our title, concluding with the comprehensive word "kindred," is a notice to the world that all who are "akin" to us in the spirit can have a welcome. Ours is an open brotherhood and sisterhood. In an age of new theologies in many a church we hold out hands to grasp those extended to us by our spiritual "kindred" wherever they may be. "Let them all come" in Heaven's name, that we may together lay the first stones of the Church Universal, whose builder and maker is God, and plant thereby a tree whose leaves shall be for the healing of our divisions.

REPORTS PRESENTED TO THE CONFERENCE.

THE SUSTENTATION FUND.

THE following is the report presented at the Triennial Conference at Birmingham on April 16, 1912:—Since the report on the work of this Fund was presented at the Triennial Conference held at Bolton in 1909, very little of an unusual nature has happened in connection with the Fund.

By the resignation in 1909 of Mr. David Martineau, and the death in 1910 of the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, the Fund has lost two of its earliest supporters and Managers, both of whom had done much towards the establishment of the Fund and in maintaining its efficiency. The vacancies thus caused were filled by the election of the Rev. F. K. Freeston and Mr. John Harrison as Managers, who bring special knowledge of the needs of the ministry to the assistance of the Board.

The annual subscriptions show a slight falling off owing to the deaths of some of the older subscribers, but the income of the Fund has been practically maintained in consequence of the increased income from investments due to the investment of amounts recently received from legacies and donations. The Managers have therefore been able to maintain the grants as heretofore, and indeed to make some additions out of previous accumulations of income.

During the past three years the Managers have distributed grants amounting on an average to £1,280 4s. 2d. per annum to 54 congregations, such grants varying from £20 to £35 per congregation. Hardly a year passes without some new application being received from congregations that have not been able to provide a sufficient stipend for their ministers from their own resources, while it is unfortunately the case that for many years there has been no instance of a congregation ceasing to apply for a grant in consequence of its own better financial condition. The applications not renewed are usually the result of the financial condition of the congregation having been reduced to such a low ebb that it is unable to support a minister at all, or to such a limited extent that the Managers have not thought a grant from this Fund was justified.

In the report for the year 1909 it was stated that as a result of a conference on "Co-operation and Co-ordination in our Churches," held during the Whitsuntide meetings in London that year, a joint committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the National Conference had been appointed to consider the whole question of ministerial stipends and emoluments. During the last three years that committee has held frequent meetings and obtained a large amount of detailed and confidential information, with the result that they have reported that congregations generally cannot be relied upon to maintain an efficient ministry of our churches without help from outside. Such help has in the past been afforded by the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund and this Fund, and by grants from a number of other smaller funds, but the income from these sources has not been sufficient to provide a suitable remuneration for the ministers in charge of many of our churches.

It is obvious that the ministry cannot attract the best type of educated men if they cannot be assured of receiving a stipend sufficient to relieve them of the daily anxieties of a small and precarious income, nor is it desirable that such income should be made up by small grants from a number of funds. The Joint Committee have therefore reported that, in order to make satisfactory arrangements, one of the existing larger funds must be considerably increased and strengthened so that the means of providing at least a minimum remuneration may be derived from one source.

The Joint Committee has held conferences with representatives of the Augmentation and Sustentation Funds, and although at first the fundamental constitutions of these two funds were found to be so different that any joint co-operation presented great difficulties, yet, as the result of fuller consideration many of these seemed to be capable of solution, with the result that it is hoped an appeal, which will have the support of the National Conference, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the Augmentation and Sustentation Funds, will shortly be made to attain the desired end.

The recent election of Mr. B. P. Burroughs as a Manager of this Fund will no doubt help towards a more intimate working with the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund, as he is the secretary of that fund.

It is with very much regret that the Managers have to record that, on the ground of the increasing claim upon his time which public work is making, Mr. Edgar Chatfield Clarke has felt obliged to resign his duties as treasurer, which he has so faithfully discharged during the last seventeen years.

W. BYNG KENRICK,
President.

GUILDS' UNION.

THE following triennial report was read by the hon. secretary, the Rev. C. M. Wright, at the National Conference meeting on April 17:—

At the close of another triennial period the Council of the "National Conference Guilds' Union" has pleasure in presenting its report.

The number of guilds affiliated to the Union is twenty-six. While many of the guilds have shown great vigour and activity, for various reasons several societies have lapsed, and others are in a state of suspense. It should be added that several newly-formed guilds have joined the Union. The total number of members at present is about 1,400, although this, of course, does not represent the entire strength of the guild movement. There are other guilds and young people's societies of a similar character in many of our churches, although these have not so far joined the Union. Many of them have adopted and utilised the Guilds' Union ideas, and are working on similar lines. It would be a great help and encouragement to the Union if all these could see their way to affiliation.

It is often said that we have plenty of organisation, and that what we want is "more life." Nevertheless the Council holds that there is a place in our religious community for such an organisation as the Guilds' Union. Ministers and church workers are often in difficulties as to how to initiate institutions and societies likely to keep young people together. The Guilds' Union may be compared to a bureau of information, a "clearing-house" of ideas along these lines. The Council is always glad to assist any who seek information as to methods likely to prove successful in dealing with the young life of our churches.

The importance of retaining the interest of the young people after they have passed through the Sunday-school cannot be over-emphasised. The guild movement is a practical and successful attempt to deal with this acknowledged difficulty. The aim of a guild (the name "guild" is not insisted upon) is (1) to foster the religious life, (2) to inspire personal service. All who have the real welfare of our churches at heart will readily agree that one of the great needs of to-day is a renewal of the spiritual life. The guild aims at awakening and cultivating the religious instinct in young people's hearts.

At the same time the guild movement also includes within its scope all the activities in which young people are naturally interested. As a rule, therefore, the guild is the "governing body" which directs and controls the educational, social, and recreative agencies which are usually provided for the young people of the church and school. These take their due place of subordination to the main purpose for which the church and school exist. In these ways the various guilds during the past three years have accomplished among young people a considerable amount of useful work.

The Association is called "The National Conference Guilds' Union" because it originated at the Leicester Conference; and while managing and financing its own affairs, it has gladly maintained its original connection by making a report at the triennial meetings.

The Guild Council has tried to keep the Guild Idea before the churches. It sends out literature. Its officials willingly visit any school or church, and in other ways seek to help new efforts to organise the young people of any of our churches. The Union has also arranged many successful meetings with good results.

In conclusion, the Council again commends the guild movement to the churches. It earnestly hopes that the aims of the Union will meet with a wider response, and confidently expresses the conviction that thereby the strength of our churches would be greatly increased.

Signed on behalf of the Council,

C. M. WRIGHT,
Hon. Sec.

UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

It will be remembered by those interested in the Social Service Union that at the annual meeting at Bolton, in 1909, an alteration was made in the constitution by which the original large and somewhat unwieldy committee was replaced by a council, which elected a small executive that could be called together more easily and meet more frequently. This it has done, and the work of the officers has been simplified accordingly, but it is to be regretted that the interest is thereby limited to the few members attending. Circular letters have been sent to the council from time to time, calling their attention to certain possibilities and opportunities for work, but it is becoming increasingly evident that a national society such as this cannot realise its potentialities for usefulness without some one individual able to devote to it more time and energy than has been possible in the past. If, for instance, the Union had been in a position to follow the example of the Friends, who started their Union by securing the full time services of Mr. Percy Alden as organiser, the committee would have been able to present a very different report from the following one, and they are convinced that if this could be done now the result would prove of the greatest benefit to our churches. Otherwise, though the fields are white unto harvest, the fruits must be garnered by others.

Since the last triennial report two more summer schools have been held at Oxford, by the kind permission of the Trustees of Manchester College. Both reached a high standard of excellence, and were attended by about 100 members, besides a considerable number of visitors, among whom we were glad to welcome many students of Ruskin College.

In July, 1909, the members were received by the Rev. Dr. Drummond, and papers of great value and interest were contributed by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, Mr. Graham Wallas, Prof. E. J. Urwick, Mr. W. E. Martley, Mr. John Edwards, Mr. T. R. Marr, the Rev. E. I. Fripp, and Mr. Phipson Beale, K.C. A particularly gratifying feature of the proceedings was the presence of invited representatives from the Social Service Unions of other religious bodies; and during the informal talks in residence and quad—which are not the least delightful of summer school experiences—the idea arose of a possible interdenominational summer school, which should draw together the Social Service Unions of the various denominations with a view to co-operation and mutual stimulus.

With the desire of testing whether the time was ripe for such an attempt, some Birmingham Friends and the Wesleyan Unions summoned an informal conference of representatives of all the Unions at Woodbrooke in the following December. To this invitation eight churches responded. Mr. Seebohn Rowntree was voted into the chair, and friendly discussion took place on the methods and aims of the different Unions, and the possibility of joint action. All agreed that this should be attempted, and the Unions were asked to send properly accredited representatives to the next meeting, which was also held at Woodbrooke, in May, 1910. Resolutions were then passed urging the desirability of concerted local action, of the joint production of literature, of the formation of study circles, of organising a combined summer school.

A further step was taken at a meeting in February, 1911, held by the kind invitation of Bishop Gore, at Bishopsthorpe, where the name was adopted of "Conference of Social Service Unions," and the Bishop accepted the presidency. The subject recommended for study by the various Unions during the following winter was "The Housing and Town Planning Act."

The sub-committee appointed to consider the question of the summer school reported that the project appeared feasible, and they suggested a week at the end of June, 1912, and recommended that preliminary notices be issued. This was done, and an outline programme for the week was submitted to the next meeting held at Uffculme on October 31, 1911. The subject selected was "The Industrial Life of the Worker—as Child, as Adolescent, as Adult," and the place proposed a newly-erected hostel with extensive grounds near the village of Swanwick, in Derbyshire.

The complete programme was adopted at the last meeting of the Conference, which took place at Oxford on January 31 of this year, in the Senior Common Room of University College, by the kind arrangement of Dr. Carlyle, and copies of this programme may be had from the secretaries of the Social Service Union.

As the average attendance at our three summer schools has been close on 100, it is hoped that a large contingent of members of the National Conference will find it possible to take part in this interesting and unique experiment.

As a constituent part of the larger Union we are also enabled, by the kind permission and with the valuable help of the secretary, Miss Lucy Gardner, to hold an exhibition this week in connection with our Triennial Conference, consisting of illustrations of the needs and methods of social work.

It will thus be seen that the small seed sown in Manchester College has grown into a goodly tree; and members of all denominations, Catholic and Protestant, orthodox and heterodox, Church and Non-conformist, have found it possible to work together in this matter of social service in perfect harmony and good fellowship.

Our own third summer school was held at Oxford as before, in July, 1911, and particulars of this are given in the report to be presented at the annual meeting of the Union.

The Committee has each year sent out a list of lecturers willing to speak on social subjects, but the offer has met, on the whole, with little response, though in some cases it was gratefully accepted.

The Committee regret to report that

Mr. Farley feels obliged, on account of overwork, to relinquish the joint secretaryship which he has held for four years, but they venture to express a confident hope that before long a successor with equal zeal may be found, who will be enabled to devote as much time as is necessary to bringing together and focusing the innumerable social activities already at work among our churches, which remain unknown to one another for want of a centre through which they might co-operate for their mutual help and encouragement.

M. E. GITTINS, }
R. P. FARLEY, } Hon. Secs.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE GUILDS' UNION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meetings of the National Conference Guilds' Union were held at the Old Meeting School on Monday, April 15. At the business meeting at five o'clock, which followed the Council meeting, the Rev. J. J. Wright, the retiring President, took the chair, and the minutes of the last meeting, the report for 1911, and the triennial report to be presented on Tuesday to the National Conference, were read by the secretary, the Rev. C. M. Wright.

Annual Report.

In presenting its eleventh annual report the Council welcomes into the fellowship guilds formed at Gee Cross (Hyde), Pontypridd, and Unity Church (Bolton). Unfortunately, several guilds have lapsed during the year, and others are in a state of suspense. Many reasons are given for these regrettable losses. In some cases the failure seems to be due to a lack of strong leadership. In others the reason seems to be an inability to get the young people to be loyal to the society. The Council hopes that all such guilds will be reorganised, and that an earnest endeavour will be made to establish them upon a more satisfactory and permanent basis. The reports from the various guilds speak of a great deal of good work done. It is safe to say that where circumstances are favourable and energy is displayed the guild has been found to be a most useful branch of the church's activities. From the reports we may note the following figures. There are now 26 guilds affiliated to the Union. The lowest number of members attached to any one guild is 30; the highest is 293 (this includes 134 juniors). The total number of enrolled members is about 1,400. In many cases it is quite evident that splendid work is being done by small societies, although they are not strong in numbers. The aim of the affiliated guilds is one and the same—(1) to foster the religious life, (2) to inspire personal service. But the methods adopted by the various societies differ very widely. Some guilds hold a monthly devotional meeting at which the warden or some other speaker gives an address. Others commence their meeting with a short devotional service, followed by a paper and discussion on some literary or social topic. But in every case the aim is to provide a link between the church and the school; to keep young people from drifting outside the influence of organised religion just at the age when they are inclined to leave the Sunday-school and to feel disinclined to enter the church. The reports speak of much practical work which guild members undertake on behalf of the church and school, and also on behalf of sick people, crippled children, and others who could be assisted by personal service. The Council again commends the guild movement to ministers and lay workers. It is the experience of all who are concerned in the welfare of our churches that in this materialistic and pleasure-loving age, it is exceedingly difficult to keep young people in association with organised religion. The guild movement represents a practical attempt to do so, and the Council earnestly hopes that all who have hitherto been unresponsive to its aims, will help the movement, and thereby increase its sphere of usefulness by making a serious effort to form a guild and by affiliating it to the Union.

In moving the adoption of the report, the Chairman mentioned that they were quite willing to co-operate with the fellowship branch of the Women's League. He thought they had no reason to be ashamed of the report. It could not fully represent all the work which was going on among the young people, because there were a goodly number of societies working on the society's lines that were not affiliated to the Guilds' Union. He estimated that there must be some 3,000 young people among this class. The motion was seconded by the Rev. Joseph Wood and adopted. The financial report, which showed a deficit of just over £3, was then read by Mr. H. P. Greg, hon. treasurer, and also adopted by the meeting. The secretary expressed his sense of the indebtedness of the Union to Mr. Greg for the generous help he had given in every way to the Union. The triennial report, which was subsequently presented to the National Conference, was then read.

The Rev. J. J. Wright, in thanking the Union for doing him the honour to elect him for two successive years as President, said he felt that the Society had given him valuable opportunities for service, especially for visiting the guilds already in existence. He wanted it to be understood that he should in no way lose his interest in the society. He hoped to put in as much work on its behalf as time and strength would allow. He proposed the name of the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, of Middlesborough, for the presidency for the ensuing year with the greatest possible pleasure. When he visited Middlesborough he found there one of the most vigorous, if not one of the largest, guilds he had ever become acquainted with. It was a really alive society, and owed a great deal of its success and vitality to the continual inspiration of Mr. Lambelle, who had also been one of the most faithful members of the Council of the Union. He never spared himself either time or trouble in the service of the causes he was associated with, and he knew that if they elected him as their President he would help them in their work to the very best of his ability. The resolution was seconded by the Rev. J. Wood, and cordially adopted by the meeting. The Rev. W. H. Lambelle, who was warmly welcomed on rising to speak, acknowledged in a few words the expressions of confidence which had been uttered, and thanked them for giving him greater opportunities for usefulness by making him their President.

The names of the officers and members of Council for the ensuing year are as follows:—President, Rev. W. H. Lambelle; Vice-Presidents, the Rev. J. Wood and the Rev. J. J. Wright; Hon. Treasurer, Mr. H. P. Greg; Hon. Secretary, the Rev. C. M. Wright; members of Council, Miss M. Twist, Miss A. Withal, the Revs. N. Anderton, J. Ellis, J. C. Ballantyne, J. E. Strange, M. Rowe, A. H. Dolphin, E. H. Pickering, E. Morgan, F. Thackray, and H. Fisher Short.

A cordial vote of thanks to the retiring President and to the Secretary for their untiring devotion to the work and aims of the Union was moved by the Rev. John Ellis and seconded by the Rev. Dendy Agate. The new Council met at the close of the general meeting to transact further business. This was followed by tea, which the friends at the Old Meeting had kindly provided.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S RALLY.

At 7.30 the Young People's Rally, which was preceded by an organ recital, took place in the Old Meeting Church. The meeting was well attended, and the speakers, the Rev. F. K. Freeston, Mrs. Thackray (Huddersfield), Rev. E. H. Pickering (Gee Cross), and the Rev. Dr. S. M. Crothers (Cambridge, Mass.), who addressed the meeting from the pulpit, were warmly applauded. Dr. Crothers naturally came in for an enthusiastic welcome, and his delightfully humorous yet earnest address was greatly appreciated. Several hymns were sung, and an anthem "Let the bright Seraphim" (Handel) was finely rendered by Mr. Cotton's Musical Society, the solo being sung by Madame Laura Taylor.

The chair was taken by the Rev. J. J. Wright, who gave those present a hearty welcome in the name of the Union.

Rev. F. K. Freeston's speech.

The Rev. F. K. Freeston, who was the first speaker, briefly explained the objects of the Union for the benefit of those who did not as yet know what their aims were. Sometimes, he said, they felt that they were multiplying societies too fast, but when they came to consider the question they realised that at least the guild must stay, whatever else might be changed or abandoned. It was intended to be an alliance of all the societies, a sort of central conscience, and that gave it a distinctive character and function. It was founded to serve as a bridge between the school and the church, across which it was hoped to make it easy for the young people to pass, a bridge leading to a very hearty welcome on the part of the church. The custom of publicly welcoming the young people was no longer an isolated practice, and year by year it was coming into greater favour. There was no sacerdotalism or ritualism about the simple ceremony, but the guild members were prepared for their entrance into church life as if for confirmation. The guild, Mr. Freeston continued, provided a compact between religion and recreation. He hoped nobody thought the members were frowning, Puritanical individuals, nor that they were namby-pamby goody-goody people. They did not feel that any form of wholesome and healthy pleasure or sport were irreligious, but that if these were not linked to the deeper truths of religion and experience they tended to take up too large a place in people's minds. He thought their guilds made this linking possible. They were also a means of mutual help, and were becoming more and more leagues of service. In many quiet but effective ways they dealt with social needs and social problems. But he placed the claims of the guild still higher, and he thought they were not going to be content with anything short of the best they could get. He looked upon the whole movement as an attempt to lift up their efforts and consecrate their will to the highest. Even if the idea seemed a little fantastic, he confessed that he regarded the guilds as schools of poetry. The highest and best things always began and ended in poetry, and religion was never understood until it became to a man or a woman a poem. Christianity was of the very essence of poetry, and when they talked about Christian truths it was not in order to rationalise, to prove or disprove, but to get at the heart of that love which is the great interpreter of religion in any form. Their guild movement was also a sort of order of chivalry and Legion of Honour. They very urgently needed in these modern days something corresponding, at least, though under different outward forms and expressions, to the old devotion, consecration and discipline which belonged to the order of chivalry.

Honour, again, was the quintessence of all the virtues. Every member admitted to a guild became, as it were, by the form of admission service, a chevalier of his Legion of Honour. But he also thought of the guilds as homes of humour. If there was one thing necessary that was found, though not always obviously, underlying all the great teachings of the world, it was humour. It meant more than mere laughter; it meant the finest discernment of human feeling. Jesus possessed this gift; Dante and Shakespeare had it, and it ought to be found somewhere or other in every full and complete character. Again, he thought of the guilds as a sort of amateur orchestra producing the finest melody by the blending and harmonising of various faculties and gifts and riches of personality, and doing this collectively. Finally, he thought the guilds served a very true purpose by being veritable temples of friendship. It was of the utmost importance that the members should make themselves worthy to be somebody's friend, for those friendships to which we owe so much, and which seem so spontaneous at the time, count again and again as the years go on.

Speech by Mrs. Thackray.

Mrs. Thackray, in the course of a sympathetic and practical address, said there seemed to be no stipulation as to what really constituted a guild. The forms they took and the methods they adopted were very various, but they were united by the idea that the guilds aimed at the development of character and the deepening and strengthening of church fellowship. How were they to secure this? Perhaps the ideal for most was an inspiring devotional service, but, if they tried this method and failed to get a response, it would be desirable to change their methods. She thought they must see what material they had, and what interests already existed. Interests, as an American writer had said, were the kernel of life, and the best interests for each were those which nourished us most. Many of the young people of the guilds had powers of which they were not conscious, others were fully conscious of their powers and anxious to use them. They must find out the hidden forces and utilise them, choosing these interests as a foundation for guild work which could best be developed and made active. It was not enough to secure passive members who kept quiet, and were very good, but who did nothing more. Unless work was expected the interest did not become fruitful, and the more people could be persuaded to take an active part in all that concerned the guild the more they would be helped by it. There were many ways in which this could be done, according to the lines on which the guild was developing. Each district must proceed by methods suitable to its special requirements; but, if they asked themselves what special quality they most wished to produce, the answer must be, reliability of character. In every church there were found people willing to help without quite realising their obligation to do so, and some were afraid of undertaking any responsibility. This pointed to lack of training, not to indifference. Here the usefulness of the guild training came in. The members should be made to feel that upon their faithfulness the work and success of the guild depended; they should be led to realise that the joy of achievement, of creation, is far greater than the joy of being a mere onlooker or a person who is entertained by others. Mrs. Thackray pointed out that one of the advantages of the week-day guild meeting was that the members saw their teachers in a week-day rather than a Sunday atmosphere, which was the test of the workability of a religious character. In conclusion, she said that church life did not necessarily mean handsome buildings and endowments, greatly as they valued these, but the union of men and women anxious to develop the highest ideals.

Rev. E. H. Pickering's Speech.

The Rev. E. H. Pickering (Gee Cross) said that one of the greatest difficulties he personally had to face was in getting people to understand why the guilds were required at all. That doubt ought never to exist. The guild was meant to be the concrete expression of active and eager religious enterprise such as should appeal especially to those who held their free, liberal Christian faith. Its definite purpose was to call and direct youthful energy towards an eager, active cooperation with the Divine Spirit for the salvation of the world. Their motto was: "For God and the Good Life," and they could not be for God, or live the good life, unless they became doers, not hearers only. There was specially an age for doing, especially amongst the young people. They must remind themselves of the adage, "To Pray is to Work." As to the structure of the guild, that must be largely influenced by local requirements. At Gee Cross they were already strong in many guild activities before they actually started a guild, but they needed the latter because those institutional activities were all too little influenced by the church and were continually overlapping and colliding with one another. The church was not necessarily healthy just because its young people were always up to something. They must see what they were up to. It was difficult to get their young people to take any active part in the church life, although they were already taking part in its various institutions. But there was a great deal of latent religious feeling in the hobbledoy and the young girl, of which many people did not dream. The raw youth was often reluctant to speak of this, and the first outburst of it often seemed to cause him to blush for shame. He was frequently misunderstood, but the searching eye could see the presence of God within him, and it was for the guild to purify and encourage the yearning spirit seeking after Him. He thought we were letting slip one of the best opportunities of doing this in our flagrant disregard of the Lord's Supper, and he would like to see old and young celebrate this frequently. Mr. Pickering also advocated the setting apart of one Sunday as Guild Sunday. The guild, he added, might do much socially, in bringing together all classes in a free and cheerful atmosphere. This might lead to the formation of groups for the serious study of various subjects, such as religious literature, social movements, &c. They must raise and develop the civic ideal and in every way make their work educative, remembering that Christ was the inspiration and salvation of the world because he was first of all the world's teacher.

Speech by Dr. Crothers.

Dr. Crothers humorously reminded the chairman that he had forgotten to introduce him as a former minister of the Old Meeting Church, and assured his hearers that on one occasion when he was attempting to re-enter his own country, and trying to prove his identity and respectability to the officials who detain anyone who lands on these shores, he found it very useful to have actually in his hands the framed testimonial given to him by the kind friends in Birmingham before he left England. He was not going to speak about the particular functions of the guild. They had in America different methods, but the same spirit and the same need. He would like to say in regard to the relation of the church to the young people that as the result of his own experience he thought it was often a good thing to leave the young people alone. He was also rather sceptical about what was called "the wisdom of experience," which generally meant that the older people said "Why, we did that twenty years ago, and it failed." He did not think it desirable to give too much of a programme. Let them get a group of young people of the right kind, with a healthy interest in religion, and just watch them. People were adjured in America to see the big towns "grow." You could not always see youth grow. It grew according to its own possibilities. The attitude of kindly sympathetic interest on the part of a church would always bring out the best in the young people. The guild was really the junior church, and if the instinct of religion had once been implanted there was always a tendency to come back to it though there might be many changes in life and thought. There was a quality they needed in their churches which only the young people could supply, for we were not giving them something; we wanted something from them—a quality which they have and which we are apt to lose, as the years go by. That quality was expressed by the word which Horace Walpole coined, serendipity. If they saw what they expected to see, that was not serendipity, but if they saw what they did not expect to see, that was serendipity. Our intellectual and spiritual attitude was often like that of a person who sits down on a chair, and the chair is not there, or like that of a clergyman in a church in Rome which he attended, who gave a five minutes' address to children in the course of the service. It was quite an admirable address, clear and to the point, but when, having an access of that quality of serendipity of which he had spoken, he (the speaker) looked round, he discovered that there was not a child present. Proceeding, Dr. Crothers said that the philosophy of the motor car was the philosophy of the church, and of every progressive movement. Each must get along by a series of rapid internal explosions. They must make use of this explosive power which in itself was very dangerous. If they had nothing that would explode they could not go along. Apply the spark to explosive material and things go; the more explosions there are, the better. This was the kind of thing they wanted, not a static quality, but the quality which belongs to eager, anxious youth, wanting to do things and to create things. Emerson had said that when duty calls "Thou must," the youth replies "I can." Youth always replied "I can." Every young man and woman was full of energy that said "I can," and the moral law was that which said "Thou must." The whole philosophy of the utilisation of that power was just the philosophy of the motor power. They must give enough opportunity for the teaching of the steady response to that law "Thou must." The teacher was simply at first the mouthpiece of that eternal law, and when he gave the incentive and the child replied "I can," something happened. When the "I can" of the youth became quicker than the "Thou must" of the teacher, the teacher must stand aside, for his work was done. There was then power and growth, and it was in that way that every church renewed its youth, by bringing in the young to share the full responsibility of enlightened service.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

Welcome to Dr. Wendte.

A CORDIAL reception was given to Dr. and Mrs. Wendte, at Essex Hall, on Thursday, April 11, when a meeting was held under the auspices of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and Dr. Wendte delighted the many friends who had assembled by giving an account of his recent travels in France, Italy, Egypt, Palestine and Turkey. Mr. John Harrison presided in the absence of Mr. Hawksley, who had been called to Doncaster to lay the foundation stone of the new Unitarian Church, and had been delayed on his homeward journey. Later in the evening Mr. Hawksley arrived, and was able to propose a vote of thanks to the Chairman for taking his place.

Dr. Wendte said he felt that the presence of so many in the hall was an indication of the common interest they all took in the growth of their religious principles in other countries, and in the gradual extension of Unitarianism—taking the word in the largest sense, not merely as representing a collection of doctrines, but as that form or expression of Christianity which was in close sympathy with universal ethics, universal religion, and universal brotherhood. That it was proving more and more acceptable to thinking people in every land he had discovered in the course of his journeyings, but progress must necessarily be slow as the obstacles were so great. For instance, in France, where he had succeeded in interesting a large number of friends and religious thinkers of various nationalities and the most diverse forms of faith in the International Congress, which is to be held in Paris next year, great difficulties arose owing chiefly to the timidity of those who, while sympathising with liberal ideas, felt some hesitation in allying themselves openly with those who advocated them, and in the general hostility which was to be expected in a Catholic country. It must be remembered that there were in France 750,000 Protestants, and 30 millions of Catholics. The Congress was going to be held for the first time in a Catholic country, where people's ideas were ticketed and pigeon-holed as soon as they were uttered, and where, if you said a word in favour of any particular body of thinkers, you were regarded as belonging to it. But there was a renaissance of religion going on in France as in other countries, and the old indifference and materialism was giving place to a new vitality and freedom of thought. In this connection, Dr. Wendte alluded specially to M. Bergson, with whom he had had a most interesting conversation in Paris, and whom he found more willing to find out what other people were thinking than to talk about his own ideas. He expressed himself most happily, the lecturer thought, in regard to Emerson, who was, he said, a philosopher, "or rather, he furnished the material out of which philosophers are made." It was, Dr. Wendte said, too early to give a detailed programme of the Congress of 1913, but it promised to be the most inclusive gathering they had ever had, and not only representative of the modern schools of philosophy and the great religious faiths of East and West, but of the Theosophical and Bahai movements as well. While in Paris, he had some interesting conversations with two Modernists of high standing, both of whom said that what was wanted in Paris was a Unitarian Church. Modernism had come to an end, and it had no future, but they needed some form of Theism in France, and if they started a Unitarian Church in Paris, appointing a missionary who could speak both French and English, they would help and support him. That was a sign of the times.

After an interesting review of the religious position in Germany, which he next visited, and sympathetic reference to the case of Pastors Jatho and Traub, and a small group of free churches not belonging to the State, which he had been asked to visit, Dr. Wendte spoke of the valuable work which Signor Conte is doing for the cause of liberal thought and Christianity in Italy. Signor Conte was originally a Catholic, then he became a Methodist, but ultimately, at the cost of great personal sacrifices, he broke with the orthodox forms of faith, which he found he could no longer accept. Signor Conte was for some years in Boston, where he met with many who sympathised with his religious difficulties and helped him to gain a wider conception of truth. He had now started a society called the Society of Free Believers. He was himself essentially a Unitarian, but it did not appear wise to adopt that name in Italy for various reasons. He was, however, doing their work, and advocating their principles in the little magazine to the editing of which he devoted a good deal of his time and strength. There were now branches of the society in Milan, Venice, and Palermo. Signor Conte lived in Florence, and was hoping to establish a branch there. He was an earnest and energetic man, who was appealing to Italy in the spirit of Mazzini, whose great moral and religious principles were scarcely realised by his countrymen, although his name was revered by them. If they had really taken hold of Italy, we should not be deploring the iniquity of the war now being carried on in Tripoli, a war which, unfortunately, was popular with almost everyone, from the king on the throne to the boys in the street. Dr. Wendte urged that some financial help should be sent to Signor Conte, contributed by Unitarians in England and America in memory of Mazzini, and as evidence that they realise what they owed to the noble work he was doing in striving to bring religious freedom and social justice to his people.

In Egypt, Dr. Wendte said that every day he was there he realised how much that country owed to England's beneficent rule for its general improvement and industrial development, but he wished that more could be done for the moral good of the people. The Mahometans had largely lost their hold on the old standards of religion, and had nothing at present to put in its place. There was their opportunity, for if anyone ought to be able to influence the Mahometan it must surely be the believer in the one God. From Egypt the lecturer went to Palestine:

here, again, he found the Mahometans in the saddle, and civilisation very much depressed. But the old and the new were side by side, and in Jerusalem a new city was springing up, full of splendid buildings, churches, hospices, mission-schools, hospitals, and institutions of all sorts. It was full of representatives of different religions and sects; there were forty different sects of Christendom alone, and many forms of religious crankiness. Here Professor Kieferndorf secured for him the promise of an interview with the Patriarch of the Greek Catholic Church, who received him with much kindness, interrogated him as to the particular heresy he represented, and accorded him his blessing. He then went to see the Grand Mufti, on the Mount of Olives, who also put some questions to him, and then said, "If that is your belief, then stay where you are and preach the fatherhood of God until all men believe, and we will believe it and all be of one creed." Dr. Wendte confessed that this remark inspired him with a great dream of a great monotheistic Congress to be held in the Holy City of Jerusalem, or perhaps that other Holy City, Benares, to which delegates should be sent from members of every religious body which believes in one God, and the all-embracing theory of brotherhood which logically grew out of it.

In Jaffa and some other places visited by Dr. and Mrs. Wendte, they learnt something about the flourishing colonies founded by a man named Hoffman from Germany, who believed that the Kingdom of God was to be established on earth and not only in heaven. He tried to found agricultural colonies in Germany, but was more successful when he finally went to Palestine, where he had done a great educational and religious work. The inhabitants of these colonies live like brothers, sharing much in common, but owning their own property, and their enterprise had won admiration especially among the Jews, who have taken up the idea, and won the support of the richer members of their community. They were regarded by the people as very good men, but dangerous heretics, as they reject the orthodox beliefs and practise simple Christianity. Hoffman, who died last year, had little encouragement and worked very hard for twenty-five years to establish these colonies. His followers were the spiritual allies of liberal religious thinkers, and would send delegates to the International Congress in Paris. Dr. Wendte concluded by describing some of his experiences in Bulgaria, where, in a little town not far from Sofia, he talked with a simple-hearted and self-sacrificing Unitarian, who had never before met a foreigner holding the same beliefs in all his life. He followed a curious trade which was common in Bulgaria—that of a decorator of coffins. He also had a printing press which enabled him to print Unitarian literature for distribution. Unfortunately, he was losing his means of support on account of his heretical opinions, but he made no complaints, and only the other day he formed what is known as the Bulgarian Unitarian Association, with 30 members. If he could be paid as a missionary it would greatly help him, and the cause for which he as well as those present stood. Dr.

Wendte's address was full of interesting stories of this description, which awakened much sympathy on the part of the audience, and his eloquent testimony to the courage and single-mindedness of those who are holding the fort in remote places, often without any support and encouragement, was received with frequent applause.

A vote of thanks to Dr. Wendte was proposed by Dr. Herbert Smith, who said he hoped that what they had heard would stimulate their interest in the International Congress. We suffered much in this country from our isolation, but it seemed to him that they would be much helped and encouraged by finding out, as Dr. Wendte had done, that their movement was really in touch with the great religious movements all over the world. Dr. Tudor Jones, in seconding the vote of thanks, emphasised this, and said that their movement had more in common with the very essence of the teaching of Jesus Christ than any other throughout the world. Mr. Harrison said he felt sure that everybody would wish to join the name of Mrs. Wendte with that of her husband in the vote of thanks. Mr. Hawksley, who arrived at this point in the proceedings, warmly endorsed this, and added his own personal thanks, and those of all present, to Mr. Harrison for taking the chair.

DONCASTER FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

Stonelaying Ceremony.

A VERY interesting ceremony took place at Doncaster on Thursday afternoon, April 11, when the foundation stones of the Lecture Hall of the Free Christian Church were "well and truly laid" by Mr. Charles Hawksley, of Londo, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; the Rev. Dr. Archibald Duff, of Bradford Congregational College; Mr. C. Smithson, of Worksop; and Mr. J. Seaton, senior deacon of the church. There was a large gathering. Mr. Hawksley, in laying the first stone, expressed the hope that the hall about to be erected on that spot would witness to a true liberal faith, and that those who worshipped there would seek to build up a Church of God in the highest sense. Dr. Duff, in a characteristic speech, said he looked forward with every confidence to the realisation of all their greatest hopes. What they were doing that day was bound to find a rich fulfilment. Mr. Smithson said he had more than a hope for the future. Everything was possible if each one would do his or her part. They were an enthusiastic people, and he felt their future as a prosperous and vigorous church was absolutely assured. Mr. Seaton said he could not help reviewing the past and all that the church has passed through, but though they had been compelled to face many difficulties they had overcome them all, and his optimism was greater than ever.

In the evening, at 7 o'clock, a public meeting was held in the Guild Hall. Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, of Leeds, presided, and the speakers were the Rev. Charles Hargrove, Dr. Duff, the Rev. Vivian Pomeroy (successor to the Rev. T. R. Williams at Bradford), and the Rev. E. H. Reeman, of Hull. It was a very enthusiastic meeting. The Church Secretary presented a glowing report of the church and its work. The Chairman made an excellent speech in defence of the liberty of prophesying. The Rev. C. Hargrove was listened to very attentively as he quickly reviewed the history of the little Unitarian chapel, now no more, and congratulated the Free Christian Church in possessing such a glorious heritage. Dr. Duff was eloquent in his contention that all men were really seeking the life of God, and he urged that church to assist in guiding all the forces of society into the channels of truth and righteousness. Mr. Pomeroy made a beautiful little speech, in which he pleaded for fellowship in the church. The world was lonely, and needed the touch of friendship. Let them endeavour to realise a true spiritual religion that would transform the lives of struggling men and women. The Rev. E. H. Reeman made a strong defence of the necessity for social reformation and urged that church and all the churches to do their part in altering the present chaotic state of society, and infuse the growing social consciousness with the religious spirit.

The day was a great success in the highest sense. The enthusiasm of the church is undiminished. The collections at the two gatherings realised £130. If another £400 are contributed the whole of the school premises can be erected.

REV. DR. C. W. WENDTE and Mrs. Wendte sailed from Liverpool for Boston on Tuesday, April 16. They were seen off from Euston by the Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

REV. DR. S. M. CROTHERS will preach at Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, next Sunday, April 21. On Monday he returns to Italy. He will be back to address the scholars and teachers in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, on Whit-Sunday, and for the anniversary meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in London. On Sunday, June 2, Dr. Crothers will preach at Hampstead in the morning and at Lewisham in the evening. He will then return to the Continent, and may be back in England some time in July.

THE quarterly meeting of the Moral Education League will be held at the Royal Society of Arts, 18, John-street, Adelphi, on Friday, May 3, at 8 p.m. Mr. F. J. Gould will present a scheme for the Correlation of School Subjects of Instruction with a View to Character Training. Open to readers of this paper. Discussion invited. A copy of the scheme will be sent gratis on application to the Moral Education League, 6, York Buildings, Adelphi, W.C.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Banbridge: Resignation.—The Rev. Edgar Lockett has resigned the charge of the First Presbyterian (Non-Subscribing) Congregation, Banbridge, Co. Down, and his resignation has been accepted with deep regret.

Birmingham, Waverley-road Church: The late Miss Taplin.—We regret to announce that Miss Sarah Jane Taplin passed away at her residence in Small Heath, Birmingham, in the early morning of Sunday, April 14. Her friends will be glad to know that her end came gently and peacefully, as of one going to sleep. Born at Colyton, near Axminster, in 1845, as the daughter of the Rev. James Taplin, she was educated at Miss Jane Anderson's school in Manchester, and completed her studies under the direction of Miss Smallfield at Bayswater. She was obliged to return to her home at Kingswood Parsonage, Hollywood, where she proved an invaluable help to her parents, assisting her father in his pastoral work, in consequence of which her friends were fond of calling her the "curate." For a time she became a teacher in Miss Norton's school at Holly Hill, Hampstead, where her brightness, intelligence, and fine qualities of heart and mind won her golden opinions from teachers and pupils. From here she was called home to her mother in Small Heath, whose widowhood and declining years she cheered and sustained by a rare devotion and self-sacrifice. She took a keen interest in the Waverley-road Church from the beginning. Although of a naturally retiring disposition, she was always ready with her sympathy for both minister and congregation. In spite of advancing years, she kept her mind open to the new ideas and influences of the day, and was never afraid of changes which seemed to her to make for good. Her loving presence and unworldly spirit will be missed for many years to come by her numerous friends.

Brisbane.—A correspondent writes:—The Progressive Christian Movement has an earnest, active committee of management. They have secured the "Protestant Hall," a commodious building, near Mr. Douglas Price's old church and the Anglican Cathedral, for Sunday morning and evening services, and have bought a good American organ. Mr. Price conducts service from the platform, wearing his M.A. gown. A hymn-book has been arranged and printed—it seems a good appropriate selection. I have only attended once, in the morning; the hall seemed more than half full, but I understand it is generally full in the evening, and that at the opening service there was hardly standing room. The singing was congregational, and of excellent quality. The subject of Mr. Douglas Price's address was the last of a series on "Heretics," and he dealt with Julian the Apostate, whom he described as a man born too late in the history of the world.

Chesterfield: Appointment.—The Rev. Edgar Lockett, of Banbridge, Co. Down, has accepted a unanimous invitation to become the minister of the Elder Yard Chapel, Chesterfield.

Ilford.—Mr. E. R. Fyson, of the Ilford Unitarian Church, is the Speaker of the very successful Ilford "House of Commons," and in this position he has won golden opinions.

At a social held at the Town Hall on Friday, Lady Bethell (who was accompanied by Sir J. H. Bethell, Bart., M.P.), on behalf of the subscribing members, presented Mr. Fyson with a silver teapot, as a mark of the high esteem in which he is held.

London: Kilburn.—At the Kilburn Unitarian Church, Quex-road, to-morrow evening, at 7 o'clock, Baba Bharati, the Hindoo sage and religious mystic, will preach on "Jesus Christ, and Christianity in India."

Poole: Appointment.—The Rev. W. B. Matthews, of Colyton, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to become the minister of the Poole Unitarian Church in succession to the Rev. H. S. Solly, M.A. He will begin his new duties in October.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

SINGING AND SPINNING.

The relation between hand-craft, which is creative activity, and human happiness, was well shown in a paper by Mrs. Godfrey Blount and Mrs. Egerton King, which was read recently at the general meeting of the Peasant Arts Fellowship. The writers gave an interesting description of their experiences in connection with the village industries of weaving and needlework, which are now ensuring a weekly wage to many women and girls, and of the way in which the lives of the workers are brightened and their sense of colour and beauty developed. One of their happiest examples is "an elderly married woman who had reached middle age by a path of patiently performed home duties before ever she had come into touch with imaginative work of any kind. She entered the Industries at first as an embroideress, and was immediately happy among the gay colours and designs. But the absolutely beatific life only began for her when she was required to put her embroidery needle by and to take up the making of homespun—from the first unscoured wool, through all the processes of spinning, dyeing and weaving, to the shrinking and perfecting of the cloth itself.

* * *

"A sudden and wonderful enthusiasm filled her for this work, and has never left her, nor ever will. When at her wheel, she says that it is almost impossible to keep from singing—'singing and spinning seem to belong together.'" She goes about her daily duties uplifted, radiant, dreaming day-dreams of indigo, madder, fustic, and crotal; the murmur of the spinning-wheel is in her ear, she walks to the rhythm of the weaver's beam, and if her days pass swifter than the weaver's shuttle, they pass as profitably too. She pretends to spin and weave for necessity and duty, but she doesn't—she does it for pure joy—for she is right in the secret which underlies all real work, and has become, in a humble degree, a creative artist."

BIRD PROTECTION IN FRANCE.

We learn from Bird Notes and News that a new society for the protection of birds has been founded in France by the Société Nationale d'Acclimatation de France, thanks to the enthusiasm and energy of M. Albert Chapellier. This will be known as the Ligue Française pour la Protection des Oiseaux. It is issuing a Bulletin, in the first number of which the President, M. Magaud d'Aubusson, outlines the programme of the new organisation. We owe much, he points out, to the birds; in all places their progressive diminution has coincided with an increase of insect pests; and the birds of France are decreasing in a way that strikes even the least observant eye. Legislation is needed for the preservation of useful species, not only in nesting time, but also at the migration season. The League proposes to study systematically the lines of route followed by migrants which cross the country, or which take their way by the French coast. To encourage indigenous birds it will promote the employment of nesting-boxes, protection of broods, and food in winter. It will also enter the schools, to speak to teachers and children of the value of birds, and to give encouragement and rewards to those who love and protect them.

ARMAMENTS AND THE DRINK TRAFFIC IN RUSSIA.

The Russian Duma has passed a new Military Bill considerably increasing the burden of conscription by abrogating the exemptions which have hitherto been enjoyed by various classes, such as schoolmasters, and others. Immediately after the passing of this Bill, the Council of Ministers authorised the Minister of War to introduce a Bill fixing the peace strength of the army at 1,455,000 men. Simultaneously a new programme of naval construction is about to be introduced which entails an expenditure of £50,274,460 to be spread over a period of five years. This lavish expenditure is evidently encouraged, says the Anglo-Russian "by the systematic increase of the revenue from the Government monopoly of the liquor traffic. Statistics just published show that the quantity of liquor sold last year by the Government in European and Asiatic Russia made 91,641,274 vedros (one vedro equals 2·7 gallons). This makes an increase of 2,098,827 vedros, compared with the quantity disposed of in 1910. The total yield to the Treasury, including the yield from denatured (industrial) spirit was 782,557,370 roubles, or an increase over 1910 of 20,010,141 roubles. Besides the retail trade, to which the above statistics refer, a considerable shipping trade is done in Russian spirit, both to the Near and Far East. It appears that more and more enormous tracts of land are being occupied with the cultivation of spirit-yielding crops, such as the potato, the spirituous product of which is becoming more appreciated of late years."

A NEW ERA IN CHINA.

We learn from the Daily News that Dr. Cantlie, of Harley-street, a friend of Sun-Yat-Sen's, has received a letter from the Chinese reformer in which he says:—"I am glad to tell you that we are going to have religious toleration in China, and I am sure that Christianity will flourish under the new régime." Sun-Yat-Sen believes in Western methods of education, and is sending his son, and probably his elder daughter, to America in order that they may profit by them. He realises, however, that any startling and sensational methods of achieving reform in his own country would defeat their own ends, and he looks for gradual and steady development. His main object is the education of the masses, so that when the time comes for starting in earnest the work of reconstructing the old State on modern lines the people will be prepared to accept the new order of things. It is feared, however, that Yuan-Shi-Kai, in whose favour Sun-Yat-Sen resigned the presidency in February, may not go all the way with the latter in his policy for the regeneration of China, for although he is a man of liberal ideas, so far as Eastern manners and customs allow him to be, he has never travelled outside China, and remains to some extent an unknown quantity.

THE FUR TRADE AGAIN.

Probably very few of the rapidly increasing number of people who wear furs have any conception of the extent to which cruel and revolting practices are adopted in order to keep up the supply of skins for the market. It has recently been stated in the press that a cat ranch is projected in America. The ranch is to be established at Oakland, where land can be obtained at a very low price, and the adventurers propose to stock it with a million of cats. It is calculated that at the end of a year there would be twelve millions of cats and kittens. The problem of feeding the cats has been ably dealt with. By the side of the cat ranch a rat ranch is to be run. Again, the promoters will start with a million, and the rodents, it is stated, breed four times as rapidly as cats. The rats are to be nourished with the carcasses of the cats which have been killed for their skins.

* * *

It will come as a surprise to many, in connection with this subject, that Mr. Thompson Seton, who has always been known as a friend of wild animals, is proposing fur farms as an industry for boys and girls in America. "The wild animals," he says, "are brought to the farm from all quarters. When it becomes known that an animal is wanted, anyone who finds it brings it in." This means that the professional trapper is to stock the farm, "bringing in" the maimed or mutilated victims of the brutal steel traps to be kept in cages till they are in a condition to be killed and skinned. We are left in ignorance as to how, where, and by whom the wholesale slaughter of the captives is to be carried on, but in the interests of the boys and girls who are to take part in this industry, as well as of the animals themselves, we hope the scheme thus outlined will find no supporters.

THE CENSORSHIP AND RELIGIOUS PLAYS.

Mrs. Dearmer, director of plays for the Morality Play Society, raises an interesting question in a letter to the Times on the subject of the censorship and plays dealing with religious themes. She points out that the pre-occupation of the drama with the more trivial aspects of human life, and "the religion of the sordid and hopeless," results largely from the arbitrary limitation in the choice of subjects which prevents a dramatist from drawing upon the stories woven inseparably into the fabric of the Christian faith. Certain control in these matters may be needed, but "why," Mrs. Dearmer asks, "should those of us who seek to make plays dealing with the eternal verities be flung back by an arbitrary rule to the stories of Greece or of the East rather than to our own sacred writings—the books of the New and the Old Testament? Why is a Censor bound to exclude every play which bases itself upon a Bible story? The reductio ad absurdum was afforded by the prohibition of the Samson Agonistes, a decision which no reasonable man could have pronounced in the free exercise of his judgment. If we are to have a Censor, let him be a reality, having in these cases a power not merely to exclude but to accept. Is the prejudice of those who regard the stage treatment of any Biblical subject as profanation to be seriously maintained against the example of Racine or of Milton?"

TRAINING COURSES FOR SOCIAL WORK.

The April number of Progress contains an article on Training Courses for Social Work, by Mr. J. St. G. Heath, of the Woodbrooke Settlement. "The growth of Government activity," he writes, "has enormously increased the demand for social workers, and the work in connection with the Adult and Juvenile Labour Exchanges, National Insurance, and Trade Boards is calling for an entirely new type of official. The same thing is true of the new municipal service in connection with Care Committees, After-Care Committees, the Juvenile Probationary system, and the Municipal Health Department. And the remarkable increase of social work of a semi-civic kind such as Guilds of Help has still further increased the number of posts which offer a regular, if not highly remunerative, form of livelihood."

* * *

"It is this increased demand," Mr. Heath continues, "which has led many Universities to take in hand the training for social work, and at the present moment there are courses in more or less close connection with the Universities of Birmingham, Bristol, Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Liverpool, as well as in connection with the London School of Sociology. There is, doubtless, always the danger, as in the case of teachers, that the supply of trained people may outrun the demand, but at the present moment it seems fairly true to say that there is an unsatisfied demand for really good people, and a fairly steady demand for all save ineffective workers."

JOHN TREVOR,

Photographic Artist.

Studio: 82, High St., Hampstead, N.W.

Mr. TREVOR does all kinds of photographic work at moderate charges. He makes a speciality of photographing people in their own homes. This gives greater ease and naturalness to the sitter and produces more characteristic portraits. Appointments should be made for interviews and sittings. Price list and specimens on application.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,
ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
Miss ORME. HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT
FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

COMMENCEMENT OF A NEW VOLUME!

Now is the time to start subscribing to

The Sunday School
Quarterly.

Edited by J. ARTHUR PEARSON.

CONTENTS, APRIL, 1912.

Heroes of Faith—John Wesley, Theophilus Lindsey, Albert Thornhill, M.A.
Children and the Cinematograph. Florence H. Ellis.
The Evolution Theory. H. Waterworth.
The Theory and Practice of Sunday School Teaching. A. Stephen Noel.
Dickens and his Message. R. K. Davis, B.A.
The Women's League Fellowship Section. Grace Mitchell.
Notes for Teachers.—I.—XV.
T. F. M. Brockway.
D. A. S. E.
F. J. Gould.
H. Fisher Short.
Lillyblush. E. C. Higgins.
Philip Finchett's First Sermon. A Lay Preacher.
Shelley's 'To-Night.' W. Lawrence Schroeder, M.A.
A Training School for Sunday School Workers. Clara By the Way. (T. Guild.)

Threepence net, Postage 1d.

London:

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION,
Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

REAL NAVY SERGE direct from Portsmouth. As used Royal Navy, 1/3½, 1/6½. Patterns free. Carriage paid.—JAMES BUCKLE, Serge Contractor, Portsmouth.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cran-tock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCS.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z, INQUIRER OFFICE, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, AYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

LADY living alone, wishes to receive Lady, elderly or otherwise, or Invalid Gentleman with nurse or attendant. No others taken. Every comfort and attention. Very good cookery.—Address, M. M., Clark's Library, 8, Finchley-road, Golder's Green.

EAST GRINSTEAD.—Comfortably furnished Cottage to Let; two Sitting rooms, three Bedrooms; good garden, uninterrupted view. Twenty minutes' walk from Station. Summer months 2 guineas per week.—A. A., Stace Library, Bouverie-road, Folkestone.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE
& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

BLAIN & HANKINSON,

Pharmaceutical Chemists,

69, Market Street, MANCHESTER.

Continuing WOOLLEY'S Dispensing and Retail Establishment.

REMNANTS! REMNANTS!—

Genuine White Art Irish Linen; pieces measuring from half to one yard, suitable for Teacloths, Traycloths, &c. Per bundle, 2s. 6d. Postage 4d. Catalogue FREE.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

WRITE FOR FREE PARCEL, containing over 200 Patterns of charming new Irish Linen Spring Costume Fabric, "Flaxzella." Washable, durable, makes up admirably, wide range smart designs.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.4, and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, April 20, 1912.

* Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3644.
NEW SERIES, No. 748.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 27, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.

MACMILLAN'S LIST.

The Kingdom of God. A Course of Four Lectures. Delivered in the Examination Rooms at Cambridge by the Rev. WILLIAM TEMPLE, Headmaster of Repton. Crown 8vo., 2s. 6d. net.

NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF
"PRO CHRISTO ET ECCLESIA."

Voluntas Dei. By the Author of "Pro Christo et Ecclesia." Crown 8vo., 6s. net.

Athenaeum.—"A comprehensive essay in Christian philosophy, treating of the relation of God's Will to the world, to creation, autonomous life and purpose, and man's religious and moral life."

Patriarchs and Prophets. Old Testament Stories in Modern English. By Rev. JAMES SMITH. Fcap. 8vo. limp cloth, 6d. net.

NEW TWO-SHILLING EDITION OF

Maurice Hewlett's Novels, with Frontispieces. In cloth binding. Crown 8vo., 2s. net each. Two volumes issued monthly.

5. The Stooping Lady.
6. Fond Adventures.

MACMILLAN'S NEW SHILLING LIBRARY.

NEW VOLS. Globe 8vo. 1s. net each.

Eternal Hope. By Dean FARRAR.

The Life of David Livingstone. (A New Book.) By C. SILVESTER HORNE, M.P. Illustrated.

For the Term of His Natural Life. By MARCUS CLARKE.

Gardening for the Ignorant. (A New Book.) By Mr. C. W. EARLE and Miss ETHEL CASE.

 Complete Descriptive List of Popular
1s. Books (about 160 vols.) and
7d. Novels post free on application

The Three Knaves. By EDEN PHILLPOTTS. Pott 8vo., 7d. net.
[Macmillan's 7d. Series.]

The Giant Fisher. By Mrs. HUBERT BARCLAY, Author of "Trevor Lordship." Pott 8vo., 7d. net.
[Macmillan's 7d. Series.]

Sale over 5,500,000 Copies.

Mrs. Henry Wood's Novels. Cloth, 1s. net per vol. May be obtained at all Booksellers, where a list of the 37 stories may be seen.

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., LONDON.

EIGHTH National Peace Congress, CAXTON HALL, May 15-18.

CONFERENCES ON

Education and Peace.
Commerce and War.
Armaments and Labour.
International Arbitration.

Apply for particulars—

The Secretary,
167, St. Stephen's House,
Westminster, S.W.

HIBBERT LECTURES ON ZOROASTRIANISM, BY THE

Rev. J. H. Moulton, M.A., D.Litt., D.D.

The Lectures forming the Second Section of this course will be delivered in the University of London, South Kensington, on Tuesdays, April 30, May 7 and 14, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Admission free without ticket. Syllabus will be sent on receipt of postcard addressed to The Secretary, at University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C.

FRANCIS H. JONES,
Secretary to the Trustees.

Welsh Disestablishment.

THE LIBERATION SOCIETY'S Annual Meeting

WHITEFIELDS, TOTTENHAM COURT ROAD,

Wednesday, May 1st, 7.30 p.m.

Speakers:

Right Hon. G. W. E. RUSSELL.
Mr. ELLIS J. GRIFFITH, K.C., M.P.
Rev. C. SILVESTER HORNE, M.A., M.P.
Chairman: Mr. JOHN MASSIE, M.A.

DOMESTIC MISSION SOCIETY.

THE ANNUAL MEETING

WILL BE HELD AT

Highgate Hill Unitarian Church,

ON

MONDAY, MAY 6.

H. E. CHANCELLOR, Esq., M.P., the three Missionaries, and others will speak.

Tea and Coffee at 8 p.m.

The Chair to be taken at 8.30 p.m. by F. WITALL, Esq.

HENRY GOW, Hon. Sec.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.
—An Open Scholarship of £20 per annum will be offered for competition in July. Candidates must be under 14 years of age on September 20, 1912. For particulars of the Examination apply to the HEADMASTER.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL,
AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.
—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad. Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon). Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

TAN-Y-BRYN, LLANDUDNO.— PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

Sound Education under best conditions of health. Next term begins May 1.

For Prospectus and information apply to
C. J. MONTGOMERY, M.A., Head Master.

PEARL ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000
Claims Paid exced £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHUBSALL, } Directors.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, April 28.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. M. HOLDEN.
 Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.
 Child's Hill, All Souls', Weech-road, Finchley-road, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. E. DAPLYN.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D. Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11, Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND, B.A.; 7, Rev. R. K. DAVIS, B.A.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11, Mr. C. A. WING; 6.30, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Rev. J. ARTHUR PEARSON; 6.30, Mr. A. STEPHEN NOEL.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15 and 7, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, M.A.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. H. GOW, B.A.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. CRITCHLEY, B.A.
 Ilford, High-road, 11, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.; 7, Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND, B.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Rev. Dr. TUDOR JONES.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11 and 7, Rev. F. HANKINSON.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 and 7, Rev. C. ROPER, B.A.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE; 7, Rev. J. ARTHUR PEARSON.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. GORDON COOPER.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. W. ROBSON, B.D.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15, Miss FITZSIMMONS; 7, Mr. STANLEY PENWARDEN.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLOR.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Mr. R. W. PETTINGER; 6.30 Mr. W. H. SANDS.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C., 11.15, and 7, Rev. Dr. STANLEY A. MELLOR.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
 Wimbledon, 27B, Merton-road, 7, Mr. WM. LEE, B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11 and 7, Rev. JOSEPH WILSON.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. FRED BROCKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30, Supply.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. WOOD.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. W. AUSTIN, M.A.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30.
 BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45, Scholars' Service; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.

BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11, Rev. V. D. DAVIS; 6.30, Rev. HATTIE BAKER.
 BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, M.A.
 BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.
 BURY ST. EDMUNDS, (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. GEORGE WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CAMBRIDGE, Assembly Hall, Downing-street, 11.30, Rev. E. W. LUMMIS, M.A.
 CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street, 6.30, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. CHARLES PEACH.
 { DEAN ROW, 10.45 and
 { STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS, M.A.
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11, Rev. E. H. PICKERING; 6.30, Rev. H. E. DOWSON.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS and Rev. H. W. KING.
 HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. I. FRIPP.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. CHARLES CRADDOCK.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. D. ROBERTS.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. C. ODGERS, B.A.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, Rusholme, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WHITAKER.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. DOUGLAS WALMSLEY, B.A., of Windermere.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. ALEXANDER FARQUHARSON.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. WM. C. HALL, M.A. Anniversary Services.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. Dr. CARPENTER.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVERS.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11, Rev. J. W. COCK; 6.30, Rev. A. H. DOLPHIN.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. NICOL CROSS.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAS, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Unity Hall Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Rev. GEORGE B. STALLWORTHY.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

BIRTHS.

GIMSON.—On April 17, at 90, Sparkenhoe-street, Leicester, to May and Russell Gimson, a son.

GRUNDY.—On April 24, at West Cottage, Royston, Herts., the wife of Charles Victor Grundy, of a daughter.

DEATH.

EDWARDS.—On April 21, John Reginald Edwards, Chartered Accountant, 119, 120, London-wall, E.C., younger son of the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, aged 36.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

REV. A. H. BIGGS wishes to recommend Miss DUNN, of Ilford Church, for any post of trust, or as Housekeeper.—The Nursery, Cameron-road, Seven Kings.

A LADY, who has given her interest for many years to the needs of Poor Working Ladies, appeals for donations towards the same. Particulars given.—Mrs. HENRY WILSON, Farnborough, Kent.

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY."—Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda. Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 1½d.—1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to EDITOR, "Dove-stone," Denton-road, Gorton, Manchester.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s. d.
PER QUARTER	1 8
PER HALF-YEAR	3 4
PER YEAR	6 6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	267	The Social Challenge to the Church	279	Discussions	292
THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT:—		Unemployment	282	Public Meeting	295
Loyalty in Religion	268	“Prayer”	283	Ministers at Conference	299
FOR THE CHILDREN	270	Women's Work in the Churches	284	National Conference Union for Social Service	299
NATIONAL CONFERENCE PAPERS:—		The Guild	286	Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund	301
Bergson and Theology	272	MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES:—		NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	302
Bergson	274	National Conference:		NOTES AND JOTTINGS	302
Christianity and the Moral Ideal	276	Reception of Foreign Delegates	288
		Business Meeting	288

* All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE deep impression which the Titanic disaster has made upon the public mind is seen in the slowness with which we have escaped from the feeling of numbness and bewilderment, and returned to the ordinary interests of life. The desire to throw the blame upon somebody, and to find a scapegoat, is in all the circumstances a very natural one, but we are glad to see signs of the recovery of a more even temper, and of a refusal to prejudge anything without adequate inquiry. It is easy to be wise after the event, and to suggest how things might have been managed differently. Whether the vessel was properly equipped is a very different question from the use to which the equipment was put at a moment of peril, when swift decisions of life and death had to be made. In regard to the former the most searching inquiry is rightly demanded. About the latter there is both wisdom and charity in silence. We were not there; and had we been, we might not have acquitted ourselves half so well.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD's letter in the Times on Monday on "Heroism below decks," is a generous and richly deserved tribute to the unseen members of the crew in the engine and boiler departments. "It is certain," he writes, "that those working below must have known the awful danger the ship was in long before anybody else, but they remained at their posts, resolving to die sooner than come on deck and create a panic or attempt to save themselves. Those below must have heard the muffled sound of the ice tearing through the ship's side. Within ten minutes or a little more they knew that the pumps would not check the rising water, yet for over two hours they remained at their posts, as was evinced by the lights burning and the few of them who were saved being picked up after the ship went down. That so many people were saved was due to the fact that those working below remained at their posts working the dynamos and kept the lights burning, and never came on deck to state what had really happened. Again and again the indomitable pluck and discipline of those who work below in the engine and boiler rooms is illustrated when some terrible disaster of the sea occurs, but on no occasion have these traits been more brilliantly shown."

THERE is something deeply affecting in the fact that some of those whose thought and skill had wrought on the great ship for the use and pleasure of others went down with her. Mr. Thomas Andrews, Junior, will be widely and deeply mourned. After years of unflagging industry he had almost reached the summit of his profession, and seemed clearly marked out to succeed to the leading position in the shipbuilding world held by his uncle, Lord Pirrie. There will be a general desire to express deep personal sympathy with the Right Hon. Thomas Andrews and all the members of his family, and not least, for many personal reasons, on the part of numerous readers of THE INQUIRER.

THE seventh International Congress on Tuberculosis has just concluded its meetings in Rome. It is stated that the report of the British Commission, which was explained by Professor Sims Woodhead, was received with great cordiality. At first the German scientists took up an attitude of strong opposition to the possibility of bovine infection; but as the result of discussion the Congress agreed that while the human subject is the chief medium of infection other possible sources must not be overlooked, and that greater stringency is required in the regulation of the sale of milk. It is satisfactory to learn that everywhere there has been a growth of interest in the anti-tuberculosis movement during the past year. Nowhere, however, have there been such remarkable developments as in our own country.

MR. McKENNA introduced the Welsh Disestablishment Bill in the House of Commons on Tuesday. The chief interest centred round the proposals for disendowment, and these, we are glad to say, proved to be more generous than it was at one time supposed would be the case. Under the Bill the disestablished Church will retain its buildings. From the endowments it will receive £87,000; life interests will amount to £62,000 a year; and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and Queen Anne's Bounty will be empowered to contribute £31,000, making £180,000 in all. If disendowment is to take place at all, and it is a necessary corollary of the Welsh demand for disestablishment, it is difficult to see how the terms could be more liberal.

IN the vigorous speech which the Archbishop of Canterbury made at Carnarvon on Monday, he set a good example of courtesy and moderation, and at the same time he avoided the mistake of pretending that the whole movement in favour of disestablishment is based on prejudice or faction. He admitted quite frankly in the first place that the four Welsh dioceses, the thirteen Welsh counties, have a distinct character of their own, and have a special claim for desiring consideration of their own circumstances and policy; and secondly, that an immense majority of the Welsh members of Parliament, and possibly a majority of the Welsh people, are in favour of a change. "The change," he continued, "is not advocated either in England or Wales simply by people who are non-religious or are actuated by mere temper or animosity. It is supported in England and Wales by many who, well-informed or not, are at least honest, earnest, high-minded Christian men." These are words of truth and soberness. We hope that at least among the protagonists in the controversy, this excellent temper will be maintained, and that religious rancour with its brood of evil suspicions will not be allowed to intrude.

* * *

THE adequate remuneration of the ministry has become a very serious problem among churches organised upon a congregational basis and dependent almost entirely upon local contributions. At the National Conference of Unitarian and Liberal Christian Congregations, held in Birmingham last week, it was decided to raise a substantial addition to the funds available already for the increase of ministers' salaries, and the policy of a minimum salary, graduated according to locality, was adopted. The matter has been taken in hand already on a large scale by the Congregational Union, and this week the Baptist Union pledged itself to an effort to raise £250,000. It was stated that it would cost £15,000 per annum to raise the present salaries of unmarried ministers in the Baptist denomination to £120 per annum, and of married men from £120 to £150.

* * *

It is thus recognised on every hand that on the financial side Independency has completely broken down, and that the larger fellowship acting in its corporate capacity must accept some share of responsibility for local needs. So far as the minister is concerned, any grant made from a central fund should be regarded simply as part of the salary he has earned, upon which he has an honourable claim as payment for his work. There should not be the slightest suspicion that there is anything in the nature of charity about it. It is simply wages, often very inadequate wages, paid to him by the Church as a whole instead of by the local congregation. The noble pride and sensitive self-respect of the ministry must be maintained at all cost, and this can only be secured when all funds are administered with full publicity in accordance with rules which make them as automatic as possible in their working. We have no desire to see the gradual transference of financial responsibilities from the local congregation to private boards of trustees, though they may be men of exceptional public spirit and benevolence. It is the Church as a whole which must realise and fulfil its common responsibilities, not only in the raising of funds, but also in the jealous care with which it guards their administration.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT

LOYALTY IN RELIGION.*

BY THE REV. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D.

"And she answered, I dwell among mine own people."—2 KINGS iv. 13.

THE significance of the story lies in the simplicity of the answer of the Shunamite woman. She had shown hospitality to the prophet, and he was anxious to make some adequate return. What can I do for you? he asked. Shall I speak to the king in your behalf? Or shall I recommend you to the captain of the host?

She answered with the pride of a peasant woman: They can do nothing for me. They are not of my kind. Let them go their way while I go mine. I abide with mine own people.

As we read the story we feel that we are coming upon one of the elemental sources of power. It is a power at once conservative and radical. It holds our human world together as gravitation holds the physical world. It is the attraction which draws us to our own kind. That which most moves us is the sense that there is something which belongs to us and to which we belong. Our people may not be the greatest or the wisest people of the earth. But they are ours, and we are drawn to them irresistibly. The great question in regard to any man is this: To whom does he belong?

The rationalist is inclined to overlook the personal considerations which determine the action of the majority of men. He treats the individual as if he stood alone. He appeals to enlightened self-interest and proclaims right of private judgment. But it is one thing to have the right of private judgment and it is quite another thing to be willing to exercise it. In politics and religion it is not enough to see an abstract truth. There is a sentiment of loyalty to friends and kindred that must be reckoned with. We do not know how compelling it is till we come to some moment of decision. We must take a forward step. Then it is that we ask not simply whether we are going, but with whom?

It is because of these instinctive affiliations that human history is unpredictable. A world in which people acted uniformly according to the dictates of individual reason might be a better world than this, or it might be worse, but it certainly would be amazingly different. Shelley pictured such a world. When all the old bonds of loyalty had been dissolved, man stood "Sceptreless—but man. Equal, unclassed, nationless, exempt from all worship." But such a condition has never been realised, in any large way, upon the earth. We know the individual only as he is related to other individuals. And in the closeness of these relations is strength.

In one of his greatest speeches John Bright used with wonderful effect the story of the Shunamite woman. He put aside the offer of personal advantage with the simple words, "I dwell among mine own people."

At the beginning of the American Civil War Robert E. Lee, then a colonel in the regular army, was offered the command of the Union forces. It was a momentous decision which he had to make. How should this man of great military genius and of undoubted personal honour decide?

Colonel Lee had already made his reputation as a soldier. He believed in the Union, he hated slavery, and had already freed his own slaves. He had no illusions in regard to the tragic character of the impending struggle. But that which decided his action was his conception of loyalty. He was a Virginian. When Virginia was invaded he must stand by his own people. It was too late to discuss the merits of the case. He must obey the call that came from the land of his birth.

And the same motives which appeal to the soldier determine religious affiliations. We talk of following truth. But the truth which we follow and for which we sacrifice ourselves is not an abstraction. It is something which has familiar associations; we love it "for friends and companions' sake." These human ties are always stronger than the rationalistic thinker imagines.

We think of religion as something that we determined for ourselves. But our fundamental religion is something that we did not make and we cannot unmake. Beneath all the differences of dogma there is something that is in the blood, something that belongs to the nature. And that, in the end, people respond to—in action if not in words.

Walter Scott tells us of the interview between the Roman Catholic girl, Diana Vernon, and her Protestant lover, who is trying to shake in some way her faith. The opinion can easily be changed, but there is something deeper than the opinion. And he appeals to her, as a Protestant would appeal, to exercise her right of private judgment. He says:—

"Consult some of our learned divines. Or, better still, consult your own excellent understanding."

"Hush," said Diana, "no more of that. I belong indeed to an antiquated religion. But forsake the faith of my gallant fathers? I would as soon, if I were a man, forsake the banner of my clan in the time of battle and turn against it like a foul traitor and follow the banner of the victorious army."

Now what can you do? That is the decisive thing. It was her religion and her fathers' religion, and she refused to discuss anything more. That was enough. Dr. Johnson said that if Socrates in any company were to say, "Come, let us study philosophy," and Charles of Sweden were to wave his sword and cry, "Follow me and we will dethrone the Czar," every man would follow Charles. I think we might go further and say that Socrates himself would be the first to follow the hero.

* Preached at Birmingham on Thursday, April 18, 1912.

Now, what does all this mean to us who believe in a liberal religion and in a rational faith? Shall we look upon the sentiment of loyalty as belonging only to the lower forms of faith, or shall we learn how to use it for higher ends? Here is a force which may work for good or for evil. We must understand it and make it work for good.

The pessimism which is so common today arises from the fact that so many intelligent people see the power of a blind loyalty but do not see the possibility of a loyalty that has become clear-sighted and self-determining. They appreciate the power which holds together the clan and the sect, but they do not see that it is possible by taking thought to build up a more inclusive community life. If the lower loyalty is strong, may not the higher loyalty become stronger?

Men and women are drawn towards that which they have come to feel to be truly their own. They go to their own people. But who are their own people? It is possible to answer that question in accordance with the higher reason. There may be a reconstruction of essential loyalties.

The existence to-day of the British Empire and of the American Republic are examples of such reconstructions. In the eighteenth century Great Britain attempted to build up a Colonial Empire on the principle of simple loyalty to the mother country. From these islands men went forth to found Britains beyond the seas. They carried with them laws, traditions, loyalties. But statesmen forgot that in the new lands they would form new ties. The children of the colonists would not feel just as their fathers felt. The sentiment of nationality would bind them to the land in which they were born; they would find there their own people. And when the colonist became a patriot, the Empire would begin to disintegrate.

But during the last century the whole principle of loyalty has been reconsidered. It has been seen that it has been possible to create a loyalty not of one part of the Empire to another part, but of each part to the whole. The Canadian is loyal to Canada, the Australian to Australia, while above the local loyalties is the loyalty to the Empire.

St. Augustine, commenting on the text, "Let brotherly love continue," said that brotherly love is the only kind of love that can continue because it is based on equality. The tie that binds together a league of equal states in brotherly love is stronger than that which binds inferiors to superiors. Love can do what fear cannot attain to.

In like manner the American Republic has reconsidered the nature of the loyalty which binds its citizens to itself. Originally its population was homogeneous. More than half a century ago the dangers of immigration began to be apparent. From all the nations of Europe men of diverse races and languages poured into the country. What would be the effect of this influx of aliens?

An appeal was made to the old principle of loyalty. The cry was raised "America for the Americans." Let us keep the country for our own people.

But it was a battle against fate. Here were vast spaces to be filled. On the other side of the ocean were vast populations seeking new opportunities. They could not be kept out.

Then the wisest Americans began to reconsider the whole problem. America must be kept for the Americans. Yes. Let us make these new-comers Americans. Let us see to it that they do not after coming to our shores continue to think and feel as aliens?

There was only one way to turn the threatened evil into a source of national strength, and that was to give these immigrants an enthusiastic welcome.

Now in the great centres the work of welcome is organised. The Italian, the Russian, the Pole are made to feel that they have come to their own. You may hear them singing, "My country 'tis of thee," and that country is "the land of the pilgrim's pride." Their children think of themselves as the descendants of the English Puritans.

Now all this has a bearing on our problem as members of free churches. The driving power must always be human sympathy. The same power which moved the ancient churches must move ours. But we must direct this power to ends which our reason and conscience approve.

What we must do is to invest the newly discovered truth with warm human interests and associations. We must make them our own and love them as we love our own family.

In this we are following the principle of adoption. Experience has shown that there can be real loyalty to an adopted country. So there can be loyalty to an adopted faith. But it must be a real adoption. It must be made fully our own. We must have "that spirit of adoption by which we cry Abba, Father," and by which we come to think of our fellow believers as our brothers. We must be no longer aliens but members of one household. We must adopt not only ideas but persons. We must bring truth to the white heat of loyalty, until we and our children can say, "These men and women are our brothers and sisters, because they do the will of God." Now that, it seems to me, is what makes us come together in an assembly like this, and I believe that we must come to say with even more insistence than our brothers, "We believe in the Holy Catholic Church throughout the world." If we are to rise above the sectarianism and class feeling, we must present to the world, not only a higher sense, but a more enthusiastic appeal of loyalty. "I go with mine own people." Who are they? Here we find society threatened with warfare of the classes. The church which calls for the higher loyalty does not and cannot allow itself to take the part of one or the other. The church that is to bring peace with justice must lift up the standard higher than that, teaching men and women, rich and poor, as they come to it Sunday after Sunday, "Ye are all brethren." There are interests in common, and those interests are not mere abstractions. It simply means that we are teaching the whole nation. We are appalled by the cost of war and warlike preparations, but never may we expect to end them by counting the cost, or throwing discredit on the soldierly spirit, the spirit that is willing to dare, the spirit of youth that flames forth at the demands of loyalty. What we need to do, what we must do, beyond this loyalty to the nation, is to strengthen the greater loyalty to mankind, so that the time may come when, if nation rises against nation, there shall be an instinctive loyalty that shall say "for shame."

What shall we say against loyalties of sect which seem to shut out the finer reason, the clearer truth? Abstract truth can never gain the victory. We can only say that by a law of being the eternal word must become flesh and dwell among us. The truth of reason must be the compelling love of the heart. It must be associated with love of father and mother and friend, so that we may say, "For my brethren and for my convictions' sake we will say, Peace be with you." You must love the truth that is to make you free as you love your dearest friend. You must become familiar with it as you are familiar with your own home. Religion is a kind of home-sickness, as a great philosopher has said. It is that which calls us back to our own country and our own friends. When the ideal and impulse that ought to be with us in this age of transition is brought back to an age of transition more wonderful even than this, when out of a narrow national loyalty religion grew for the first time to a point from which it could see the wider horizons of humanity, it is found that men said then: "The old order is passing away. We can no longer worship together. Religion decomposes and fails." Then there came men who preached far and wide a doctrine that made old distinctions no longer of any effect, that said, "between Greek and Barbarian there is no difference," and bound both together in a new body.

The centre of the new loyalty is the kind of faith which, renouncing the faith of the past, lays hold on the faith of the future. Faith is the "substance of things hoped for." Is it not the secret of our religion that, like the men of old who went out into the wilderness not knowing whither they went, we see certain great promises, and in perfect loyalty embrace them? You are going out to be citizens and members of a family. You are come to a city of the living God, an innumerable company, into the religious assembly of the firstborn, and to God the Judge of all, and of the spirits of just men made perfect. Do you believe in the truths revealed to men in these last things? Do you feel that loyalty belongs only to some narrow faith or sect? Do you not feel the call of your own? Do you not remember the men and women whose lives made yours possible, your spiritual ancestors? Is not the call sanctified by their memory? Remember that they represented love, faith, hope, loyalty, and as these things come into our hearts, and these instinctive loyalties unite themselves to reason and to truth, we shall come unto our own,

FOR THE CHILDREN.

SIR FRANCIS DRAKE.

1545-1595.

II.

AFTER plundering the Spanish galleons, as you heard last week, Drake hoped that he could get round by the North of California to England again, and leave his cargo of precious things there before he set out to explore the Pacific, but he found this was impossible on account of all the land to the North. It was another Devonshire man—Martin Frobisher—who discovered the North-West passage, as it is called, the way round by Behring's Straits and the north of North America. Drake did not know of this passage, so he turned round and sailed right away to the South-west across the great Pacific, knowing that now he would have to go right round the world if he wished to see his own harbour of Plymouth again. He could, of course, have gone back the way he came—by Magellan's Straits—but he was too wise a sailor to do that. With all his cargo on board the one little ship, it would have been next to impossible to get through the Spanish ships again, which would have been waiting to fall upon him as he passed Chili and Peru. He left New Albion, or California, on September 29, 1579, and had a long stretch of open sea to sail over before he arrived at the little islands in the East Indies called the Moluccas. He got there on November 4, and was well received by the king. On December 10 he got to Celebes, and here his ship struck on a rock, but it was not very badly damaged, and he was able to go on. On March 16 he reached Java, and left there on March 25. Then came a great stretch of open sea—the Indian Ocean. It took him three months all but ten days to cross this, and on June 15 he sailed round the Cape of Good Hope, having then on board only 57 men and three casks of water.

On July 12 he crossed the Equator—the "Line," as sailors call it—for the third time; on the 16th he touched the coast of Guinea, to lay in another supply of water, then he sailed on up the coast of Africa and back again by Spain and the stormy Bay of Biscay until he once more came in sight of England, and reached his own harbour of Plymouth on November 3, 1580, having been all round the world. Queen Elizabeth was very proud of him, as well she might be, and she showed how pleased she was by coming to a great banquet which he gave her on board his ship at Deptford, and making him a Knight. She ordered that the Pelican should go no more voyages, but be preserved just as it was. It had got so battered, however, by its long voyage, that in a hundred years it had nearly all crumbled away. There was just enough sound wood left to make a chair, and this chair can still be seen at Oxford, for King Charles II. gave it to the University. So long as the Queen approved of him, it did not matter to Drake what other people thought. There were a good many who considered that he ought not to have brought home so much wealth, that it would lead to more and worse quarrels with Spain. And so it did, as we shall see, for King Philip was very angry that Queen Elizabeth was pleased with Drake—so pleased that she even took some of the jewels which he had brought home and set them in her crown, and he sent over an Ambassador to warn Elizabeth that if she went on allowing her sailors to rob Spanish ships "it would come to the cannon." She answered, "that if he used threats of that kind she would fling him into a dungeon." So the Ambassador went home and made Philip angrier than ever by telling him this, so angry that he began to collect a great fleet, called the Armada, to sail to England and conquer it and make it a Catholic country. It took a long time to collect and fit out this fleet, and in the meantime Drake made another voyage to the West Indies.

This was in 1585—five years after he got back from his voyage round the world, and he took several places and ships. Two years later, he went at the head of 30 ships to Spain, and, sailing into Cadiz harbour, he managed to set fire to many of the Spanish galleons that were collected there all ready for making war on England, and burnt in this way more than 10,000 tons of shipping and stores. He called this "singeing the King of Spain's beard," and he singed it so well that Philip was obliged to put off sending the Armada for a whole year. When at last it was collected again, and, in 1588, sailed down the Channel to conquer England, Drake was one of the bravest in the great fight, which lasted a week. He was so well known for his courage by the Spaniards that the commander of one of the galleons gave in at once when he heard that Drake was Captain of the ship which was fighting him. This Spaniard, Don Pedro, said he thought it no disgrace but an honour to surrender to Drake. He came on board Drake's ship, and was treated with great kindness and politeness. The fight was ended at last by the English sending fire-ships in among the Spanish galleons. They had to give in then, and they sailed away up the Channel to the north of Scotland, hoping to get home again by the Irish Sea. "Never anything pleased me better," wrote Drake afterwards, "than seeing the enemy fly with a southerly wind to the northwards." But although they had been such a great fleet when they started, and had felt sure of conquering England, they had not reckoned with the winds and storms, and very few Spaniards got back to their own land again. For when they were near the Orkney Islands, a great storm came on which lasted many days, and nearly all these Spanish galleons were wrecked on the coast of Scotland and against the cliffs in the north and west of Ireland. The Atlantic round these coasts is sometimes so rough that the waves look mountains high, and these big lumbering ships, which could not be steered so easily as the small English battleships, were nearly all dashed to pieces on the rocks. It is known that about 8,000 Spaniards lost their lives between the Giant's Causeway and Blasket Island, off the coast of Sligo. When King Philip heard of what had happened to his great fleet, he said, "I sent my ships against men, not against the seas." The English were not ashamed of acknowledging that the storm had helped them in this great victory, for Queen Elizabeth had a medal struck in memory of it, and on one side were the words: "The Lord sent his wind, and scattered them."

If you go to Ireland now, you will see many things to remind you of the Armada. At the Giant's Causeway there are some curious shaped rocks, which the Spaniards took for chimneys and fired at, but only wasted their powder and shot; and in the church at Derry is a great organ which was on board one of the Spanish ships. Remember this great fight with the Armada, for it is one of the most important in English history. If the Spaniards had won it, we might have been living in a Catholic instead of a Protestant country now, and nothing that you do—neither the way you live, nor the sort of schools you go to, nor the books you read, and the thoughts you have, would have been the same as they are.

It was a pity that Drake's life did not end just after he had distinguished himself so greatly in this fight, for the rest of his life was not so happy or successful. It was not his own fault, however, if the voyages he undertook afterwards did not turn out well, for he was such a great commander, who knew his own mind so well that he could not share the command with another, and on these two unlucky voyages, one in 1589 and one in 1595, the Queen sent him first with Sir John Norris to Portugal, to help to put the King on the throne again, and then with his old commander, Sir John Hawkins, on another war against the Spaniards in the West Indies. Neither of these voyages turned out successfully; the commanders could not agree with Drake as to what was best to be done, and he was so annoyed and disappointed because he seemed to be serving the Queen badly, that he fell ill of a fever, and died in 1595, on board his ship off Nombre de Dios, that place which he had taken, you will remember, when he was hardly more than a boy, and sailed away with his brother in the two ships called the Pasha and the Swan. So it is sad to think that Drake's life ended in disappointment after he had done so many splendid things in it, but he would have felt better if he had known that after his death the Queen cleared him of all blame. One thing more I must tell you, that he was Member of Parliament for Plymouth in those years (very few) when he was not at sea, and did one very good thing for his native town, supplied it with water from springs some way off.

Drake was always very brave and decided, but honest and fair to others too. Think how he rose from being a poor cabin boy to being the greatest sailor in the world, and the trusted soldier of the Queen, and then think what led him to it. He could not have done all he did if he had not been honest and hard-working, and brave, and a good seaman, and just to his crew. All these things make him a great Englishman, and we should never forget how much he did for England in fighting her battles and discovering new lands over the sea.

DOROTHEA HOLLINS.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE SUPPLEMENT.

Cambridge University Press

The Journal of George Fox. Edited from the MSS. by NORMAN PENNEY, F.S.A. With an Introduction by T. EDMUND HARVEY, M.A. In two volumes. With two Portraits and three Facsimiles. Royal 8vo. 21s net.

"We find it impossible to indicate a tithe of what there is of interest both for history and character, now for the first time brought to the light. High praise is due to the Syndics of the Cambridge University Press not only for their enterprise in producing this authoritative edition, but also for the beautiful setting and form of the work. As to Mr. Penney's labours, we can truthfully say that, outside classical scholarship, we have hardly met such learned and faultless editing."—Athenæum

The Early English Dissenters in the Light of Recent Research (1550-1641). By CHAMPLIN BURRAGE, Hon. M.A. (Brown University), B.Litt. (Oxon.). In two volumes. With 10 Plates. Volume I. History and Criticism. Volume II. Illustrative Documents. Demy 8vo. 20s net.

Themis: A Study of the Social Origins of Greek Religion. By JANE ELLEN HARRISON, Hon. LL.D., Hon. D.Litt. With an Excursus on the Ritual Forms preserved in Greek Tragedy by Professor GILBERT MURRAY, and a Chapter on the Origin of the Olympic Games by Mr. F. M. CORNFORD. With 152 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 15s net.

Primitive Christian Eschatology. By E. C. DEWICK, M.A., Tutor and Dean of St. Aidan's College, Birkenhead. The Hulsean Prize Essay for 1908. Demy 8vo. 10s 6d net.

The Historicity of Jesus. A criticism of the contention that Jesus never lived, a statement of the evidence for His existence, an estimate of His relation to Christianity. By SHIRLEY J. CASE. 12mo. 6s net. (University of Chicago Press).

An Introduction to the Pentateuch. By A. T. CHAPMAN, M.A., Emmanuel College, Cambridge. Fcap. 8vo. 3s 6d net. Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges.

The Book of Exodus. In the Revised Version. With Introduction and Notes by S. R. DRIVER, D.D., Regius Professor of Hebrew, and Canon of Christ Church, Oxford. With Maps and Illustrations. Fcap. 8vo. 3s 6d net. Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges.

The Book of Numbers. In the Revised Version. With Introduction and Notes by A. H. McNEILE, D.D., Fellow and Dean of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge. With two Maps. Fcap. 8vo. 2s 6d net. Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges.

The Realm of Ends or, Pluralism and Theism. The Gifford Lectures delivered in the University of St. Andrews in the years 1907-10 by JAMES WARD, Sc.D., Hon. LL.D., F.B.A., Professor of Mental Philosophy, Cambridge. Demy 8vo. 12s 6d net.

The Moral Life and Moral Worth. By W. R. SORLEY, Litt.D., Knightbridge Professor of Moral Philosophy, Cambridge. Royal 16mo. Cloth, 1s net; lambskin, 2s 6d net, Cambridge Manuals Series.

Byways in British Archæology. By WALTER JOHNSON, F.G.S. With 99 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s 6d net.

Cambridge University Press

Fetter Lane, London

THE METAPHYSIC OF EXPERIENCE.

BY

SHADWORTH H. HODGSON.

IN FOUR BOOKS.

Book I.—General Analysis of Experience.

Book II.—Positive Science.

Book III.—Analysis of Conscious Action.

Book IV.—The Real Universe.

In 4 vols. 8vo. buckram (the vols. not to be had separately).
Price 36s.

ALSO BY THE SAME.

TIME AND SPACE: a Metaphysical Essay. 8vo. 16s. 1865.

THE THEORY OF PRACTICE: an Ethical Enquiry. 2 vols. 8vo. 24s. 1870.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF REFLECTION. 2 vols. 8vo. 21s. 1878.

OUTCAST ESSAYS and VERSE TRANSLATIONS. Crown 8vo. 6s. 1881.

ESSAYS:—The Genius of De Quincey, and De Quincey as Political Economist—The Supernatural in English Poetry, with Note on the True Symbol of Christian Union—English Verse.

VERSE TRANSLATIONS:—Nineteen short passages, mostly familiar, from Greek and Latin Classic Poets.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., 39, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.;
New York, Bombay, and Calcutta.

ROBERT BROWNING'S WORKS.

Centenary Edition.

In 10 Volumes, Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. each, net.
Printed in bold type on fine paper.

The Edition, limited to 500 numbered copies for sale in this Country and 250 copies for sale in the United States, will be sold in sets only, £5 5s. net the set.

26 copies for England and 26 for the United States will be specially printed on JAPANESE VELLUM, to be sold at £10 10s. net the set, each copy being numbered.

Dr. Frederic G. Kenyon, C.B., Director and Principal Librarian of the British Museum, will contribute biographical and bibliographical Introductions, and each volume will have, as frontispiece, a portrait of Robert Browning, several of the portraits appearing for the first time.

VOLUME I. READY MAY 7th.

The subsequent volumes following at short intervals, so that the edition may be completed this year.

NEW SUPPLEMENT (1901-1911) of

The Dictionary of National Biography

Edited by SIR SIDNEY LEE, Litt.D., etc.

In 3 Volumes. Royal 8vo.

15s. net each in Cloth, or 20s. net in Half Morocco.

VOLUME I. WILL BE PUBLISHED IN MAY AND VOLUMES II. AND III. IN THE AUTUMN.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE PAPERS.

BERGSON AND THEOLOGY.

BY PROFESSOR G. DAWES HICKS, LITT.D.

Two papers are to occupy your attention this morning, the connection of which it is hard to discern, unless, indeed, it be that Canon Lilley is to provide the antidote for the baneful views that Mr. Jacks is first going to lay before you. Professor Bergson, about whose thought and work Mr. Jacks is to speak, has handled, in a series of brilliant and suggestive books, a large number of metaphysical and psychological themes. But it so happens that he has not as yet applied his philosophy to the difficult and intricate problems of Ethics, about the relation of which to Christianity Canon Lilley is to address you. There is no man in England who has studied the recent developments of French speculation with greater care than Canon Lilley, so that I am quite prepared to hear from him that Bergson's philosophy has thrown fresh light upon the Moral Ideal and the Christian conception of the universe. Be that, however, as it may, I take it, at any rate, that I owe the honour of being invited to preside to-day to the fact that I had a small share in arranging the recent visit of Professor Bergson to London, and that I am expected, therefore, to say something upon the interpretation of nature which has aroused so much interest of late years in the minds of thoughtful men and women.

I am, I confess, somewhat uncertain of the sort of character Professor Bergson bears amongst theologians, and I cannot judge from the discordant voices that have reached me whether in former times he would have shared the fate of Bruno and Galileo, or have been reckoned as a true and faithful disciple of St. Thomas Aquinas. I am aware, of course, that that great and good man, the late Father Tyrrell, was one of the first to welcome the new ideas worked out in the book Creative Evolution, when it first appeared in 1907. But, then, alas! Father Tyrrell's modernism did not commend itself to the Church of which he was so distinguished a member. I have in mind, too, a memorable incident that occurred during M. Bergson's visit to London. It was my good fortune to be one of a little company gathered together in a friendly way for the purpose of interchanging views with our honoured guest. The rest of us on that occasion were only too delighted to sit as silent listeners whilst an animated discussion was going on between M. Bergson on the one hand, and the solitary Englishman who can claim to have views upon everything, George Bernard Shaw, on the other. Shaw, of course, maintained that there was nothing original to be found in Bergson's way of looking at things; he had himself anticipated everything that was of value in it in a celebrated play of his which had appeared years before. But the significant point upon which Shaw laid emphasis was this. The Naturalism of men like Huxley—if there ever has been a man like Huxley—had gone, he insisted, too far; the conception of the world which alone it left standing was of so cold and mechanical an order, that it was not possible for human souls, who after all were so constructed that "admiration, hope, and love" did form an important ingredient in their constitution, to feel satisfied with it. There was something wanting, and the something wanted was religion. The great idea of the Élan Vital furnished, he urged, just the basis of that which in the naturalistic philosophy was lacking, and he welcomed Professor Bergson as the inspired prophet of a new faith which had been revealed in the first instance to himself.

The situation was certainly interesting, and I do not know how far M. Bergson appreciated this novel mode of canonisation. My own impression is that he would repudiate with firmness and decision any intention whatsoever of accepting the rôle of a prophet, and that nothing could be more foreign to his purpose than to win converts to any set of doctrines, even of the kind sanctioned by Mr. Bernard Shaw. As a student of philosophy, Bergson has moved steadily and persistently along the quiet ways of reflective thought, and has tried to shed its peaceful light upon the deep problems of the nature of life and of the universe. Now, philosophy has undoubtedly to deal with questions that touch very closely the highest interests of humanity, and he who has once breathed the free, if rarefied, atmosphere of philosophic speculation must inevitably have his attitude towards all those interests profoundly affected. But this does not mean that it can ever be the function of philosophy to provide a gospel for mankind; still less that it can ever be the function of philosophy to set about evangelising the world. The aim of philosophy is to think through the vast detail of concrete experience, and to frame, if it may be, a reasoned interpretation of the system of reality as a whole. The knowledge it seeks to secure is the kind of knowledge which gives unity and connectedness to the body of the sciences, the kind of knowledge which results from a critical examination of the grounds of our ordinary convictions and beliefs. That knowledge can only be obtained by the strict and rigorous method of exact research, and nothing can well be more detrimental to genuine philosophical inquiry than the turning of what should be, in the wider sense of the term, a demonstrative science into an art of persuasion or a means of propaganda. Professor Bergson has, it is true, his own view of the way in which philosophic truth is to be won, but upon this fundamental matter he would most certainly be in accord with the long line of philosophic tradition. For Bergson's sake, then, I devoutly trust there may never be a Bergsonian cult, or that sort of popularisation of his philosophy which ruined the influence of Herbert Spencer in England and that of Schopenhauer in Germany—ruined their influence, because it inevitably fixed attention upon the wrong things, and led to the neglect of those which were really of significance. There is no other way either of understanding or of testing a new principle in philosophy than the resolute endeavour to apply it logically and scientifically to the whole round of questions with which human reason has long been exercised. Such principle has little or no value when it gets thinned down into a mere abstract formula that is to serve as a kind of shibboleth by which the adherents of what it is the fashion to call a "school" may be identified.

I think there is manifest danger of this sort of thing at the present time, and it is not, therefore, from sheer perversity that I am venturing to lodge a protest against it. Professor Bergson is, of course, in no way responsible for the base uses people choose to make of his teaching. He has preserved, from first to last, and in all his writings, the precision of method, the loyalty to fact, the strictness of reasoning, which belong, or ought to belong, to the man of science as his every-day attitude. In fact, if I were asked to point to his most important and enduring work, I should single out, not the far-reaching theories and speculations that have taken hold of the popular fancy, but rather the patient and arduous pieces of research—such, for example, as his strenuous investigation of the nature of conscious states, or his careful inquiry into the facts of memory—which are but comparatively little known, but which I believe in the long run will more profoundly modify the thought of the world than those striking flashes of imaginative genius which fascinate now the majority of his readers.

Yet I am far from wishful to disparage Bergson's more ambitious efforts, or to suggest that the theologian who goes to his philosophy in the right spirit will not find much that will be helpful in the fundamental problems of theology, much, too, that will cause him to reflect upon the tenability of dogmas that are too readily supposed to be, for the religious man, beyond the region of doubt. Let me refer, in the briefest possible way, to two conceptions in the elaboration of which M. Bergson comes into intimate contact with the ideas and hopes of religion.

The first is the conception of life—of life not as an appendage or property of inert matter, but as itself an independently existing entity—a free, spontaneous energy or activity, replete with endless facilities of forcing itself through the brute material which seems more real than its flow, and of adapting that material as an instrument for its own advance. The conception is not, it is true, wholly new—no philosophical conception ever is. Confronted with a constantly increasing body of evidence, in the organic kingdom, of extraordinary capacity of adaptation and selection, which seemed to baffle any attempt at explanation on purely mechanical principles, biologists had previously been feeling their way towards the view of a vital force, dominating and directing each living body to its own preservation. M. Bergson, however, extends that notion far beyond the limits contemplated by the biological specialist. The gist of his contention is that the mechanical theory of life has not only failed to explain evolution, but is inconsistent with the very fact of evolution. Take, for example, the universe in what appears to be its present condition, imagine it to yourself as broken into fragments, and then try to alight upon a mode in which these fragments might somehow be put together again; then instead of solving the problem of development, you have been simply attempting to reconstruct evolution out of bits of what has itself been evolved. And just as the child's act of fitting together the pieces of a picture puzzle, and of obtaining thereby a pretty design, has nothing whatever to do with the act of drawing and painting the design, so the imitation of reality by a work of mosaic bears not the slightest resemblance to the actual movement of evolution. That is the erroneous method of procedure not alone of Herbert Spencer, but of many other thinkers who have sought to trace the genesis and progress of life from exclusively physical and chemical conditions—the erroneous method of procedure, also, I would add, of many psychologists who have sought to trace the growth of reason and intellect from sentience and sense impressions. In opposition, then, to this method of procedure, M. Bergson has insisted upon treating life as itself a real process suo genere—as the formative, operative agent, that fashions, moulds, and leads the course of nature. Starting from primitive ill-defined organisms, not strictly to be described as either vegetable or animal, the life-impetus upon the earth has taken one of two divergent tracks. Either it has followed the path opening out towards spontaneity, action, freedom; or, else, relinquishing even the small measure of spontaneous movement it already possessed, it has stationed itself in positions where, with suitable means of nourishment at hand, it might sink into the humdrum existence of inactivity. Only the former path, that which advances to the vertebrates and proceeds from them up to man, has been wide enough to afford the passage required for the full flood of life. Picture the life-impetus as in essence a perpetual striving to create, a perpetual effort to realise its own freedom, having to wend its way through matter which stands to it as the mechanical and the necessary, then it is in man alone that you will find it has sounded the depths of its own being, and revealed the reservoir of unforeseeability, of liberty of choice, it in truth contains. Consciousness in man is just this life-force utilising matter as the raw material for its own creativeness.

So far the working out of the conception has been in the direction towards which religious reflexion has always instinctively tended, and there is offered to the religious thinker firm ground on which to build his faith in the dignity of manhood and his hopes for the future destiny of human souls. The conception allows us to look upon our individual lives as bearing within them the treasure of existence, and to claim for them a not insignificant place in the realm of being. And when it is further shown that the very essence of a conscious mind is memory, and that for a living spirit the past is and remains an indelible possession, there is provided, I think, for the Christian doctrine of the soul's immortality a philosophical basis stronger far than it has often been possible to secure from metaphysical considerations alone. But M. Bergson refuses at this point to call halt. He carries his gaze infinitely beyond the development of life of which this planet is the theatre, and ventures upon a field of speculation that shall include the whole of reality within its scope. He will exhibit the universe in its entirety as in essence a living individuality—a unity of life that brings forth all things—suns, planets, finite lives—as the fruit of its own womb. The Cosmic Life, as thus conceived, is the root of all existence, the great identity from which all diversity springs, the creative source of every event and the ultimate ground of whatsoever can be said to be. At first sight, there would seem to be here the promise and the potency of a foundation for a religious theism. But I must not shrink from expressing my conviction that this conception of Cosmic Life is more nearly akin to Schopenhauer's conception of the Will as the one Thing-in-itself than to the Christian conception of a divine Personality. Had time permitted, I should have offered reasons for the contention that the notion of universal life, or life-in-general, if by that be meant an actually existent reality, is a contradiction in terms—just an instance of that illegitimate hypostatizing of an abstraction against which, as exemplified in other systems of philosophy, M. Bergson has argued with so much power and cogency. I must here, however, content myself with pointing out that the analogy between Cosmic Life and life as we have been considering it completely breaks down. M. Bergson does not, of course, suggest for a moment that a finite individual life itself produces the material environment in the midst of which its life is lived. His whole account of life upon this planet is based upon the pre-supposition that the material conditions of life are as real and as primordial as the vital impulse is real and primordial. But the moment the advance is made to the conception of Cosmic Life, the situation is entirely changed. Instead of burrowing its way through a more or less refractory matter, the Cosmic Life is supposed somehow to throw out, or to call forth, from the depths of its own being just that without which terrestrial life could not be lived at all; instead of the biological conception of the concrete adaptation of life to material conditions, the bare abstract notion is presented of an inverse movement, unaccountably generated by the Cosmic Life, and which is forthwith identified with material nature. Consciousness, intelligence, reason, instinct—all these accrue to terrestrial life in virtue of its having to traverse matter, to entice it to organisation, and to make of it, in itself the seat of necessity, an instrument of liberty. When, however, life is thought of as an ultimate Cosmic Life, it becomes devoid of content; it loses just the specific, the differentiating, features that give meaning and significance to life as manifested in particular concrete individuals. And to ascribe to Cosmic Life, as thus presented, the characteristic of creativeness seems to me to be doing little else than hiding its nakedness through help of a phrase which in this connection baffles all attempt at explanation. I believe, then, there is reason for saying that this bold speculative idea, notwithstanding its attractiveness, will in truth prove to be far less helpful to the religious mind than the less ambitious conception of which I have been speaking.

The second conception to which I wish to allude is that of free creativeness as contrasted with the notion of a final end or purpose which the immense multiplicity of processes—natural, mental, spiritual—in the universe are supposed to be engaged in bringing gradually to realisation. Theologians, with one notable exception, have been practically unanimous, so far as I have been able to gauge their utterances, in condemning Bergson's position as, in this respect, antithetical to the Christian idea of God and of God's relation to the world. Mr. Balfour, a very earnest and acute student of the foundations of theological belief, has probably expressed, in his concise and pregnant way, a difficulty which has been widely and prevalently felt. "Creation, freedom, will—these, doubtless," says Mr. Balfour, "are great things; but we cannot lastingly admire them unless we know their drift. We cannot rest satisfied with what differs so little from the haphazard; joy is no fitting consequent of efforts that are so nearly aimless. If values are to be taken into account, it is surely better to invoke God with a purpose, than supra-consciousness with none." Understood literally, I am afraid it must be confessed, some of Bergson's language is exposed to this sort of criticism. For not seldom he writes as though the alternative of applying to reality as a whole the notion of final causality were the application to it of the notion of mere chance or contingency. I do not think, however, that such is, in truth, Bergson's intention, but that he is rather concerned to make clear that these alternatives are not exhaustive of the possibilities of reality. Unless I am grievously mistaken, his objection to the ordinary conception of End or Purpose is that it is altogether too meagre, too poor, too anthropomorphic, a category by which to interpret the vast and intricate course of evolution in its entirety. It does not follow that the universe, in its multitudinous modes of working, is aimless and meaningless, because to speak of one end or meaning to which each of these is subordinate turns out to be contradictory. It does not follow that the universe may not be teeming with aims and meanings, even though the attempt to bring them all under a single or collective end should evince itself as doomed to failure.

The idea of a definite scheme, a definite plan, of cosmic development, mapped out in detail from the beginning, the idea of "one far off divine event to which the whole creation moves," is full of embarrassments, and I doubt whether theologians have sufficiently realised the perplexities to which it leads. God, declared T.H. Green, "is all which the human spirit is capable of becoming." What object is, then, to be gained by the toils and labours of countless generations of men if everything of worth or value thus to be attained is already realised in the being of the supreme mind? Why the prodigious expenditure of struggle and effort and spiritual energy, of which the history of mankind is the record, if it can result in nothing but what is, and has always been, present in the universe without it? We have here, in truth, a recurrence of the old difficulty of the relation of the universal to the particular. The idea of the good-in-general, though useful as a concept, becomes paradoxical when it is taken to denote an actually existent fact. M. Bergson presses, and I think rightly, against the popular notion of a pre-arranged programme of cosmic development, that it is, after all, the notion of mechanism over again. Only the mechanism is inverted mechanism—the pull of the future is substituted for the push of the past, and the course of life and human history is prescribed by the ready-made goal it has to reach no less inevitably than by the original collocation of atoms from which, in accordance with materialism, it took its start. There is, indeed, in that case a fatalité that “shapes our ends, rough-hew them how we will.” Father Tyrrell, of whom I was thinking a moment ago, in what was, I believe, the last article he wrote before his death—and a most striking article it was, entitled “The Divine Fecundity”—showed himself to be fully alive to the force of these considerations. To suppose that God is working out some ultimate end by means of the myriad centres of life in the world would be, he argued, to suppose that they were not ends in themselves and that God was reduced to human dependency and poverty. And in weighty words, the warning is given that men may mistakenly come to care more for universal aims and causes than for the individuals in whose behalf they are taken up; more for the Sabbath than for man; more for the temple than for Him who dwells in it. However this may be, certain it is that individualities can only be reared where it is possible for each of them to work out, in a real sense, his own salvation, and that there cannot be at once individual freedom and a precise pattern of what each of us is destined to become at the successive stages of our onward growth.

Tennyson was for once, I venture to think, sadly deceived when nature seemed to him to be so careful of the type, and so careless of the single life. One of the great lessons, perhaps the greatest, which Bergson has taught us is that individuality is the supreme care of nature, and that for sameness, rigidity, repetition, she has, in comparison, but little concern. Nature like art aims at what is individual, at what is unique, at what will never again recur. And if God be verily the Father of spirits, an individual personality as they are individual personalities, then we may be assured that He would not wreck the possibility of their standing to Him in the relationship of children by turning them into puppets, nor, for the sake of His foreknowledge, sacrifice them as means to some far-off universal and impersonal end. Then the conditions of the evolution of human life must be such that a divine message for each one of us is this, “Thou mak’st the heaven thou hop’st indeed thy home.”

BERGSON.

BY THE REV. L. P. JACKS, M.A.

IN a lecture delivered in this city less than a year ago M. Bergson spoke the following words—

“What are we? What are we doing here? Whence do we come and whither do we go? These are vital questions. . . The future belongs to a philosophy which, no longer returning to these questions a self-styled ‘final’ solution, to be replaced by other solutions claiming equal finality, will be gradually perfectible, open to corrections, retouchings, and unlimited simplifications; a philosophy that will no longer pretend to have reached a solution of mathematical certainty, but will be content with a sufficiently high degree of probability.”

I believe that the members of this Conference will find a familiar ring in these words. They repudiate the spirit of dogmatism, introducing M. Bergson as one who does not profess to be infallible, nor claim to have reached a final solution of the mysteries of Life. If we are in quest of a philosopher who presents answers of mathematical certainty to all the Riddles of the Sphinx, it is not in Bergson that we shall find satisfaction. If, on the other hand, we neither expect him to be infallible, nor ask him to make us feel that we are infallible ourselves, and are content with Bishop Butler to take “probability” as the guide of life, then it is possible that Bergson may help us. He may help us even though he fails to provide our thought with a rock on which it can stand. For the characteristic attitude of thought is not that of standing immovable upon a rock. Thought lives by movement and its deepest needs are for air and light.

The last findings of Bergsonism do not admit of mathematically certain proof. They are truths of Intuition, whose nature it is to overflow the forms of thought and of language, so that any attempt to reproduce them in precise formulæ will distort and misrepresent them. They may be verbally indicated, but they cannot be verbally reproduced. The life of the spirit is arrested by the very act of defining it; and, being arrested, it is no longer life, but death. Our formulæ, says Bergson, “are like dead leaves floating on the surface of a pond.”

This result will appear to many persons as the breakdown of philosophy. Does it not end in the confession that there is no such thing as final certainty?

Well, all depends on what you mean by certainty; and I need hardly remind you that this matter leaves room for a pretty wide difference of opinion. I will not attempt an answer to Pilate’s question; I would merely ask you to make sure of your own standard of Truth before judging of Bergson’s philosophy. When you speak of Truth are you thinking of Mathematics? Is that, and that only, to be called true which is susceptible of exact statement and irrefragable proof? Then Bergsonism is not for you. Or do you admit that there is another sort of certainty, perhaps a higher and surer kind, exemplified, let us say, by your belief in the loyalty of your best friend, a thing which you could hardly prove, but on the truth of which you would be willing at any moment to stake your life? In this case you will hesitate before saying that Bergsonism has broken down. For the last findings of Bergson’s philosophy belong to the same class as our belief in the loyalty of our friends, or, I would add, in our personal identity. “The beliefs to which we most strongly adhere are those of which we should find it most difficult to give an account, and the reasons by which we justify them are seldom those which led us to adopt them.” These are Bergson’s words. Do they imply a standard of truth you are prepared to adopt? If not, let me repeat once more, Bergson will give you no satisfaction.

Philosophy, we are told, is, like poetry, “a criticism of Life.” But the philosophers who criticise life are not allowed to have things all their own way. Life has a habit of turning round and criticising philosophy. And philosophy, far from suffering under this criticism, makes her richest gains by attending to the reactions which her teachings provoke from the living spirit of mankind. No doubt, there are thinkers who have played the part of intellectual pontiffs, claiming to legislate for the mind of man, and presenting their message as a privileged monologue, to which no reply was becoming or even possible; and on the fringe of every great system you will always find a few imitators who assume the pontifical air and demand a silent receptivity from the world. But the great masters have another manner, and produce a different effect. It is one of the marks of a fruitful system of thought that it invites humanity to answer, and runs its course as a dialogue between the soul of the master and the ever-changing spirit of the world. Think how the teaching of Plato goes on reverberating down the centuries, awaking fresh echoes in the mind of every age. How rich and fruitful those answers have been! When Wordsworth wrote his Ode to Immortality he was calling back to Plato across the gulf of the ages. And may we not say of all the greatest teachers that the value of their message lies less in what they taught and more in what the world has learnt from their teaching. The two things are by no means the same. What the philosopher says to us is one thing; what we answer back is another; and philosophy wins her greatest triumph when by the wisdom of her appeal she evokes a yet wiser response. We can ask nothing higher of any thinker than that he should unseal the fountains of original insight within ourselves; and the surest proof that he has justly criticised life is that he has provoked life to criticise him. On the other hand, nothing is more fatal to philosophy than pontifical conclusiveness. Scanty, indeed, is the fruit of that thinking which covers the ground with final conclusions before the answering mind arrives on the scene; whose meaning is exhausted when we have read the books in which it is written; whose message makes no room for the free reaction of the human spirit. Such thinkers leave no spiritual posterity behind them. A few imitators, a few repetitions—and then the inevitable cul de sac. Think of the Deists of the eighteenth century! How ingenious were the proofs that some of them gave of the existence of God! And apparently how conclusive! But to-day the stream is dried up and the thirsty will never drink there any more.

Now Bergson, if I rightly understand him, must be classed with those philosophers who, like Plato, and perhaps like Spinoza, stimulate and encourage their disciples to win their deepest insight for themselves. The deepest knowledge of all, the knowledge which bears the issues of life and of death, is not the kind of thing that philosophers can first excogitate in their studies and then place on the public market. It is an original insight of the soul, and its value lies in its originality. The truth for each one of us is what we see for ourselves, and not what is seen for us by somebody else. It is because he perceives this that Bergson makes no pretence of closing the great questions of the soul with a final answer. His effort is rather to open them and to put them in the place where they will answer themselves. Unlike the Agnostic, who would drive those questions out, as beyond the circle of our knowledge; Bergson would drive them in, and even deeper in, until at last they come to rest in the luminous silence of Intuition. This, I take it, is the meaning of the motto from Plotinus which Bergson authorised his English translator to prefix to one of his works:—

"If a man were to inquire of Nature the reason of her creative activity and she were willing to give ear and answer, she would say: 'Ask me not, but understand in silence, even as I am silent and am not wont to speak.'"

There is no denying that in all this Bergson runs counter to what men in general expect of philosophers. What is philosophy for, we ask, if not to answer our questions? That surely is what most philosophers have tried to do. The dominant tendency has always been towards system, towards articulateness, towards precise formulæ. The object is to find a correct expression of Reality, couched in the language of the intellect. But Bergson reverses all this. What he seeks is not a correct expression, but a deep impression of the Real. Instead of leading us outward into finer articulations of thought and expression, he leads inward, retracing his steps through such articulations as already exist, until we reach at last the inarticulate birthplace of knowledge. Were it not for the misleading associations of the term, I should not hesitate to say that Bergson is, essentially, a spiritual impressionist. It was said of Turner, the artist, that he saw Nature not with his eyes, but through them. And of Bergson it might be said that the whole effort of his philosophy is to see through the forms which intellect imposes on our thought in order that we may grasp the Reality which lies beneath them. The intellect, he tells us, has no speculative competence. It is the working engine of our active life, a mighty engine, indeed, and destined to grow mightier as the ages pass. But turn it to speculative uses, ask it to tell you what Life is, what the Reality is, what you are, and it will only lead you on and on for ever through an endless dance of contradictions. The Intellect is the faithful servant of the mind, but we have made it the Master. Hence the chaos of our philosophical systems; a chaos which can only grow worse until we have learnt to see not with our intellect but through it. Life cannot be imprisoned in a formula; but, even if it could, we should understand life no better than we do: Reality cannot be expressed in a system; but even if it could we should be no nearer to Reality than we are. What insight needs is not a fuller system nor an exacter formula; but rather that we should, at moments, turn our eyes away from systems and formulæ, which, so far from helping, are precisely what prevent us from receiving that deep impression of Reality and of Life.

Yet Bergson's Philosophy is far from being a short cut or a primrose path to Truth. I know of no philosophical discipline so severe as that upon which Bergson invites us to engage. I know of none which involves such painful reversals of deep-set mental habits. I know of none which calls upon the student to burn so many cherished idols, and abandon so many time-honoured illusions. Bergson turns our intellect inside out, and the late Father Tyrrell was not far wrong when he said that in order to understand him we need a new sort of mind.

What is our consciousness? What is mind? Surely, we think, it is some process of observing and registering what goes on in the world. Things happen, and we see them; things turn up, and we observe them; things are there, and our minds register their presence. Our minds are the watchers, the spectators; and the world is the moving show which we watch. First the event: then the mental register of the event: first the thing, then the conscious copy in the mind. But, if Bergson is right, all this is wrong. Our consciousness, says Bergson, is simply the dawning of our actions. To be conscious means not that you have just seen something, but that you are just going to do something. It is, if one may say so, the trembling of the soul into activity. It does not register what happened last, but foreshadows what may happen next, and chooses from among the host of dawning actions that one which shall be acted to the full. This is why the mind is essentially free. Were it the function of consciousness merely to register what happened last, it is obvious that our minds would have no freedom; they would be tied to the tail of the world process: it would go on before, and mind would dance attendance in the rear. But Bergson reverses this order. It is mind that steers the way and the system of natural necessity streams out behind it like the wake of a ship.

I may say, in passing, that this last point—Bergson's general doctrine of consciousness—is especially important in its bearing on the philosophy of religion. It shows us what religion may, and what it may not, expect from Bergson. If there are any who expect the philosopher to produce an argument which will force all rational minds to believe in God, as Euclid forces us to accept the properties of a triangle, so that at last mankind will have no alternative but to believe in Him in the same way as they have no alternative but to confess that Euclid is true, and couldn't believe otherwise even if they were to try—if this is what we expect from the philosopher, we shall find in Bergson's teaching little else than a stumbling block of offence. Not only does he fail to produce any such proof, but his whole method involves that such proofs applied to such matters are from the nature of the case impossible. On the other hand, if there are any for whom religion means essentially an act of choice, an act which can never be forced upon the soul by logic, by philosophy or by anything else; if there are any for whom belief in God is only another name for the soul's free choice of the Highest, a choice made in presence of an alternative which permits us to choose something lower, a choice which can be refused by rational beings who will to refuse it—if, in short, there are any who carry their faith in Freedom into the very Holy of Holies, and hold that faith itself is free—then I say such persons, far from finding offence in Bergson, will feel themselves encouraged and supported by the atmosphere of the thought. For Bergson teaches that the very life of the mind, of consciousness, of spirit, is the activity of choosing; whence it would follow that if religion is to be an act of spirit, it must be, fundamentally, an act of free choice.

If Bergson disappoints us by presenting no cut-and-dried answers to the questions we are continually asking; if that stiff backbone of doctrine, which we expect philosophers to provide, is not forthcoming, we may at all events be grateful to him for allowing us some spiritual independence, and especially for helping us to emerge from the dark night of mechanical thinking. Mechanical thinking is the enemy against which Bergson turns the sharpest edge of his sword. He believes that mechanical thinking has invaded and captured the central fortress of philosophy; he shows us that unconsciously we are all its victims; and he has aroused no little wrath in high places by affirming that certain great philosophers who set out to deliver us from mechanism, have ended by themselves becoming its devoted slaves.

"To philosophise," said Novalis, "is to vivify." It is an admirable definition, and I am glad to see that the distinguished teacher of philosophy in Birmingham University has quoted it with approval. "To philosophise is to vivify"—to intensify our life, to enrich our experience, to fill all thinking and all objects of all thought with new and abiding interest. But mechanical thinking, whether it talks of matter and force, or whether it turns existence into a clockwork of categories, can hardly be said to vivify anything. To mechanise the world is to deaden it; and to think of oneself as a cog on its wheels, or as a necessary moment in its eternal process, is certainly not an animating experience. It may conceivably be true that all events in this universe, from the birth of starry systems to the last quiver of a shaking leaf, do but rehearse a programme inexorably drawn up and determined before the worlds began; but if anyone asserts that either the world or his own life is vivified by such a conception, I have to confess that I do not know what he means.

Now, whatever be the deficiencies of Bergson's thought in other respects, it answers well to the test of Novalis. No one can read Creative Evolution, however critically, without feeling a stirring and a shaking among the dry bones of his thought. One error, at all events, has been effectually destroyed by that book—the error of looking on Nature as of a factory where standardised patterns are turned out by the gross. We are in the studio of the great Artist surrounded by the mighty works which declare her triumphs, and also by many a token of arrested effort and abandoned hope and heroic endeavour that has come to nought. And as we watch her at work we read the story of our own lives and feel ourselves fellow workers in her labour, fellow sufferers in her tragedy, free with her freedom, sharers in her creativeness, and heirs, with her, to perpetual newness of life.

What then, in sum, is the service which Bergson may be said to have rendered directly to Religion, or if you will, to Faith? The utmost that can be claimed for him in the way of direct service is that his philosophy brings us to the point at which spiritual insight begins. He does not exhaust the findings of the Spirit in advance of its own discoveries; at most he indicates them by such words as Freedom, Creation, Life. He does not provide a full answer to the questions, What am I? Whence am I come? Whither am I going? but contents himself with leading us to a point of vision from which we may look hopefully for the beginnings of an answer in the depths of consciousness. That, I think, is all that can be claimed by way of direct service to theology. But to have done so much, if he has really done it, is to have done a great deal. To convince us that there is a vision to see may be a greater service than to see the vision on our behalf, or to articulate its findings before we have learned to open our own eyes. It is precisely this opening of the eyes that constitutes the great difficulty for religious thought. Once get the spirit to open its eyes and we need not be over anxious to inform it what there is to be seen. It will see for itself. Bergson's philosophy is a potent eye-opener.

So much then for direct service. But what shall we say of the service that is indirect? This, I think, may possibly be found the more important of the two. We have to consider what the effect on the mind and temper of the age is likely to be if Bergson's teachings should increase their influence, and become widespread not merely among professional philosophers but in the world at large. How is such a spread of Bergson's ideas likely to affect the general attitude towards religion? Will it dispose men to listen with greater or with less favour to the kind of religious message which this Conference would approve? We all know what happened when Herbert Spencer's Philosophy took hold of the popular mind. Spencer's philosophy, in spite of some great merits, can hardly be said to have made things easy, for the religious teacher. On the whole it seems to have hardened the hearts of men against him and his work. Will Bergson's philosophy do the same? Or will it do the opposite?

One thing seems pretty clear. I think we may take it as certain that Bergson's philosophy will become widely influential. It is so already; and it will become more so. Whatever the professional philosophers may be saying about Bergson, and I am sure that much of their criticism is just and necessary, there can be no doubt that Bergson has shot his arrow over their heads and hit the target of the general mind. People who ordinarily turn a deaf ear to philosophers, or even treat their discussions with contempt, have been awakened up by Bergson to a respectful interest in metaphysics and to a profound curiosity about the mysteries of their own being. How is all that going to work out from the point of view of this Conference? On the whole I believe it will work out well.

Suppose first, then, that men in general should follow Bergson in believing that Intuition, and not Intellect, is the organ of spiritual discernment. The effect of this I imagine would be to make the mind of the age more open-eyed, more receptive of new impressions, more alive on the side of the spiritual imagination. In regard to all that concerns the nature of man and his destiny there would be less intellectual cocksureness than there is at present. The number of superior persons would diminish. The word of the spirit would be less impeded by obstinate foregone conclusions. Dogmatis would become more difficult for everybody. Bergson's teaching, unless I am mistaken, tends towards wonder, towards a deepened sense of the mystery of one's own being, towards intellectual humility in presence of the marvellous works of God. What it loses on the side of finality it gains on the side of expectation. If, on the one hand, there is nothing in Bergson which compels religion to come in, thereby taking the Kingdom of Heaven by force, on the other there is certainly nothing which compels religion to go out. The doctrine of Intuition leaves the spirit free to assimilate whatsoever its fullest life requires. Its general acceptance would place the prophet in presence of a teachable audience. That is surely something to the good. If it is not all that we usually ask of philosophers it is certainly a great deal more than we usually get.

Suppose, in the next place, that our age begins to look favourably on the doctrine that Life wherever it is found is a continuous creation, and the rehearsal of a programme. One result of that would be, I imagine, that people would begin to read their Bibles more sympathetically. They would understand better what St. Paul meant when he said that in Christ neither circumcision nor uncircumcision availeth anything, but a new creation. They would be nearer to the writer of the 139th Psalm. They would recover some of that wholesome astonishment which men felt when they first listened to the words of Christ. I do not mean, of course, that there is a point to point correspondence between the underlying doctrines of the Bible and Bergson's Creative Evolution. I only mean that in the atmosphere of Creative Evolution one can read the great utterances of Hebrew Religion without feeling that the Bible is a foreign book and the God of the Bible an old-fashioned Personage. People who have been influenced by this aspect of Bergson will not smile incredulously when you talk to them of the Living God. They will listen with more intelligence and with more emotion when you read to them the parable of the Ten Virgins or the Great Assize; and they will start to attention when you bid them

"Watch; for in an hour that ye wot not of, the Son of Man cometh."

On the whole, then, we may conclude as follows:—Bergson's doctrine will prove intensely disappointing to all religious teachers who expect philosophy to provide them with the fixed outline and ground-plan of their message, or to precipitate the essence of theology into an impregnable core of truth, capable of being neatly packed within the four corners of a sentence. Those, on the other hand, who are content with philosophy if it provides them with a favourable atmosphere, and with a soil which is likely to respond to their cultivation, will see a promising sign in the growing influence of Bergson on the mind of their age. Both parties may say with perfect truth that Bergson is inconclusive; that in spite of all he can tell us of Freedom, of Life, of Creative Evolution, he leaves us still in presence of the essential mystery of our being. But do you know of any philosophy of which it can be honestly claimed that it eliminates that mystery? I do not. There are some philosophies, like the Agnostics', which leave the mystery standing there as something dead and foreign to our own spirits, and all we can do with it is to leave it alone. There are others like Bergson's which make the mystery in Nature essentially akin to the living mystery of our own being, so that deep can answer unto deep. That is the only difference so far as mystery is concerned, and unless I am mistaken, it is a difference in favour of Bergson. Again, it may be said that serious danger would arise if Bergson's intense and sweeping doctrine of Freedom were widely accepted by the mind of the age. Again I agree. But again I ask, do you know of any philosophy which is not dangerous—which does not contain something which weak men can convert into their own weakness, or which blind men can convert into their own darkness, or which self-righteous men can convert into their own pride. I do not.

"Be it unto thee even as thou wilt" are words which apply even to the profoundest truths of philosophy. There is no such thing as securing truth against abuse, and the deepest truth is always the most susceptible of perversion. Safety is no criterion by which to judge the value of a philosopher's work. And even if it were, Bergson, I imagine, would stand the test as well as any other. Whatever dangers may attend his teaching they are less to be feared than the spirit of dogmatism, than intellectual self-satisfaction, than the idolatrous worship of formulæ and phrases. These are the dangers that beset many systems of philosophy, and from such dangers Bergson's teaching is singularly free.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE MORAL IDEAL.

BY CANON A. L. LILLEY.

I FEEL that I owe you an apology in asking you to discuss a subject on which probably everything that needs saying has already been said a thousand times.

Yet it is just such subjects, and often the most obvious aspects of them, that we need from time to time to think anew. Life does not stand still even if thought may be tempted to do so. And if thought has any regulative value for life, which, in spite of Bergson's brilliant speculations as to the nature and function of intelligence, I must still venture to believe, the arrest of thought must mean the abandonment of life to its own unregulated and dispersive impulses.

But, indeed, I ought not to speak, except in a very limited sense, of an arrest of thought on the subject which we are about to consider. It is rather from a confusion of thought than from its arrest that we are suffering just now. And that confusion arises, as perhaps such confusion always does, from contradictory tendencies in life itself. On the one hand life is characterised to-day by a feverish and multiform activity. A mere unsifted lust of action drives us on. We have tapped elemental sources of power which give us the mastery of the material world. Humanity is like a conquering army engaged in sacking a captured city. For the moment it has forgotten its purpose as an army. It is not troubled by a thought of the general plan of campaign. Its ultimate objective is lost sight of, and even the conviction that it has one temporarily suppressed. The forces even of the material universe were once things of dread by which man's spirit was cowed and repressed. Now they have become its playthings or its familiar slaves. We live in a world of the Arabian Nights, and command its geni at our will. Activity is no longer an effort but an impulse, no longer an occasional intensity of effort towards a best deliberately chosen, but a universal movement of impulse towards the unlimited guerdon of chance.

And the reflection of this Dionysiac rage of life in the mirror of thought is a humanity universally possessed by a mere will-to-live, or arbitrarily selected by a will-to-power, or identified with a forward push of life for which every moment of its succession is an authentic "becoming." Whether it is Schopenhauer, or Nietzsche, or Bergson who reads the riddle of existence, they all read it in the same sense, influenced, we feel, by the characteristic aspect of contemporary life.

But there is another aspect of that life, the complement and consequence of its anarchic activity. It is the clamorous demand for order, for a new constitution of society. On the fact of this demand, and on its universality as a fact throughout the civilisation which has been stirred by the new consciousness of power, it is unnecessary to insist. But it may be worth while to analyse its character, and especially to elicit those elements of its character of which it may be itself unconscious. That the demand for a reconstitution of society is in the main consciously motivated by a sincere desire for juster relations between men in society need not, and will not by any generous mind, be denied. Indeed, it is not only this desire, but the expectation to which it points on that witnesses to the undiluted idealism of this movement. For that expectation is that a reconstituted society will make better men; that a new scheme of human association will morally improve all the partners. Now there is some justification for such a hope. The chief evil of an anarchic society is just that it is not a society, that within it the inspiring sense of partnership does not exist. But wherever terms of partnership exist, however consciously arranged, there, too, there will be the inspiration of a moralising sense of partnership. Society is always in some sense a moral fact, just because it cannot help being a moral discipline. And so every improvement in the terms of association, every added security for the justice of human relations, is of itself a certain deepening of the effective moral discipline which society exercises over its members. Yet the limits of such discipline are apparent. And the danger is that it may be altogether neutralised by the artificial arrangements which society may make for its own improvement. It will be neutralised if those arrangements tend in any way to retard or rebuke the development of individual power. The risks of such development are risks which society must always be prepared to take in the interests of its own moral welfare and growth. Now the fact that modern socialism is largely a revolt, an idealistic and righteous revolt, against the widespread abuse of the modern sense and opportunities of power, has made it to some extent, and without its full realisation of the fact, suspicious of power as power. It no doubt thinks it is aiming at the release of further power, at the release of power which is now artificially repressed, at economising power, and checking its present intolerable waste. And if I did not believe that the total movement, which in all its aspects is subsumed under the common name of Socialism, were indeed likely in the long run to secure these results, I could not maintain that close sympathy with it which in fact I have. Yet it may well be doubted whether the actual concrete proposals of Socialism for the reconstitution of society would not, if uncorrected by later experience, tend to the gradual lowering of the quality of individual power on which all real morality depends. What at any rate seems to me to be not at all open to doubt is that those proposals have been motivated by a certain jealousy of power which in the circumstances of the time was perfectly natural, but which at the same time betrays a want of perception of the vital value and function of power.

Whatever truth there may be in this analysis of the contradictory tendencies in contemporary life, it has been undertaken solely with the view of accounting for an undoubted confusion in what we mean to-day by the moral ideal. Putting it broadly, for one set of people the moral ideal is to be sought in a regenerated human society. Such a society would of itself have the power of making good men, or at least the greatest possible number of good men. The moral ideal, whence-soever it comes, can best be preserved by being woven into a network of human relations which will almost automatically preserve and utilise the good, or at least the socially capable, through whose meshes the bad, or at least the socially incapable, will inevitably disappear. It sounds like an attempt to improve on the parable of the draw-net. For in this kingdom of heaven

WILLIAMS & NORGATE.

Works by Dr. RUDOLF EUCKEN,
Professor of Philosophy in the University of Jena and recently awarded a Nobel Prize.

THE TRUTH OF RELIGION.

Now first translated into English from the second and revised edition, with a special Preface by the Author for this edition by the Rev. W. TUDOR JONES, Ph.D. (Jena), for some years a student under Prof. Eucken. Large demy 8vo. 650 pages. 12s. 6d. net.

THE LIFE OF THE SPIRIT.

An Introduction to Philosophy.
Third Impression. Crown 8vo, Cloth. 4s. 6d. net.

AN EXAMINATION OF PROF. BERGSON'S PHILOSOPHY.

By DAVID BALSILLIE, M.A.
Crown 8vo, Cloth. 5s. net.

New Volume in Crown Theological Library.

THE RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE OF ST. PAUL.

By Prof. PERCY GARDNER, D.Litt.
Crown 8vo, Cloth. 5s. net.

The Hibbert Journal.

Principal Contents of April Number Now Ready.

- The Right to Strike and Lock Out. Robert A. Duff, D.Phil.
The Jesus of "Q." The Oldest Source in the Gospels. George Holley Gilbert.
The Great Question. William Dillon (Chicago).
Brahma. An Account of the Central Doctrine of Hindu Theology as Understood in the East and Misunderstood in the West. Prof. S. A. Desai (Holkar College, Indore, Central India).
The Essentials of a University Education. Principal W. M. Childs.
Is Civilization in Danger? A Reply. Joseph McCabe.
Fresh Light on the Synoptic Problem—Matthew a Lucan Source. Robinson Smith, M.A.
The Occult Obsessions of Science—with Descartes as an Object Lesson. Louis T. More.
Business, Goodness, and Imagination. Gerald Stanley Lee.
The Religious Philosophy of Rudolf Eucken. Baron F. von Hugel.
Divine Promptings. Signora Re-Bartlett.
Social Service No. 3. What Public Schoolmen can Do. S. P. Grundy (Manchester City League of Help).
With Discussions, Survey of Recent Philosophical and Theological Literature, by Prof. G. Dawes-Hicks and Dr. James Moffatt, and Signed Reviews.
Super-royal 8vo, 2s. 6d. net; postage inland, 3d. extra.
Yearly Subscription, commencing with any number, 10s. post free.

HOME UNIVERSITY LIBRARY OF MODERN KNOWLEDGE.

Editors:

HERBERT FISHER, M.A., F.B.A.
PROF. CILBERT MURRAY, D.Litt., LL.D., F.B.A.
PROF. J. ARTHUR THOMSON, M.A.
PROF. WM. T. BREWSTER.

256 pages, Cloth, 1/- net; Leather, 2/6 net.

The Fifth Ten Volumes Now Ready.

11. CONSERVATISM. LORD HUGH CECIL, M.A., M.P.
26. AGRICULTURE. Prof. W. SOMERVILLE, F.R.S.
43. ENGLISH LITERATURE, MÆDAL. Prof. W. P. KER, M.A.
44. THE PRINCIPLES OF PHYSIOLOGY. Prof. J. G. MCKENDRICK, M.D.
45. THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE. J. PEARSALL SMITH, M.A.
46. MATTER AND ENERGY. F. SODDY, M.A., F.R.S.
47. BUDDHISM. Mrs. RHYS DAVIDS.
48. THE AMERICAN CIVIL WAR. With Maps. Prof. F. L. PAXSON.
49. PSYCHOLOGY: The Study of Behaviour. Prof. W. McDUGALL, M.B.
50. NONCONFORMITY: Its Origin and Progress. Principal W. B. SELBIE, M.A.

SECOND PRIZE COMPETITION.

First Prize £25. Second Prize £5.
And Ten Consolation Prizes of Books for the best Short Essays on any one or all of the above volumes.

Write for a complete Descriptive Pamphlet containing particulars of the volumes published and of a large number in active preparation.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta St., Covent Garden, London, W.C.

there will be no need of the end of the world, or of the angels, or of the furnace of fire. The judgment will be more immediate. But will it be as just? Will adaptability to the best possible social structure of a moment necessarily be an authentic criterion of the greatest values to the society even at that moment, to say nothing of higher values still, of values only to be measured by the effect of a life upon the completed spiritual structure of society, by its impress upon eternity? It is true that the moral ideal would be most fully revealed in the completed structure of relations achieved by and corresponding to the activity of perfected spirits. For each joint of that structure would itself be a perfect activity of spirit, and only in the articulation of the whole would the full power of spiritual activity be disclosed. That is, indeed, the kingdom of God. But to be deceived into supposing that there is any ground for a comparison between this kingdom and a mere framework of relations devised by even the most righteous aspiration of a moment in time is not to exalt the moral ideal, but to run a very great practical danger of suppressing it altogether.

At the other extreme the moral ideal is being sought to-day in the principle of individuality itself, in what is felt to be most constitutive in individuality. Now the principle of individuality is evidently that which will make the individual most an individual, that which will make him most independent of other individuals, or, where he cannot be so independent, will make him most easily master on his own terms of such services as they can render to him. The moral ideal will then ultimately be found in the superman, in the man who has transcended as far as possible all the relations by which men are customarily bound together on the common human levels, who has forced those relations where he cannot escape them into the obedient servitors of his superhuman will. The moral ideal thus lies beyond good and evil which belong to the merely human level. It consists in the unlimited development of a will to power, of a will which seeks the ultimate joy of absolute freedom, of the victory over all restraint. Perhaps you will agree with me that the supreme value of the Nietzschean ethic is that it is the reductio ad absurdum of the attempt to find the moral ideal in the principle of naked individuality, or to justify ethics at all in a world made up of bare individuals. The moral ideal of Nietzsche is the ultimate logic of Luther abstracted from his religion, as the moral ideal of Socialism is the ultimate logic of the Catholic Church emptied of its religion.

But it is the religion that makes all the difference. It is the religion both of Luther and of the Catholic Church that makes it possible for both of them to witness fruitfully to contrasted aspects of our human experience. It is the absence of religion, of specifically religious feeling, both in Nietzsche and in Socialism that enables them, or, rather, forces them, to treat these contrasted aspects as logically exclusive each of the other, to deny the one when they would affirm the other. Of course neither Nietzsche nor Socialism is strictly logical. The deep fountain of pity in Nietzsche's nature drew him near in detail to a humanity he despised in the bulk. And as for Socialism, I have already admitted that it at least thinks that the liberation of individual power is one of its aims. I have admitted, too, that I look forward with confidence to that as one of its chief results. But that will come about only because it is a great human movement, and will be forced of necessity on its forward march out of its own narrow logic. It will come about because Socialism is already more religious than it knows, and will become more and more religious.

And, of course, apart altogether from religion, life itself never yields for a moment to the purely logical dilemma. It itself is the continual transcendence in a higher synthesis of the antinomy of society and individual. There is no real danger of human society ever becoming the society of the ant-heap or the beehive. That is to say, there is no danger of its ever becoming the ideal society, quâ society. That distinction will always be reserved for the ant-heap or the beehive. It is there alone that, as Bergson himself points out, the instinct which animates the individual member of the society coincides with the work of organisation. There alone the individual is as exclusively a function of the society as the cell in a human body is of the complete bodily organism. It is merely misleading to use these even as remote analogies for human society.

But if life is the continual synthesis of the antinomy of society and individual, religion is the very principle of the synthesis. It is just this fact which constitutes the eternal truth and necessity of religion. In and by religion the society and the individual become really one. And in Christianity the principle of that identity, reached through a transcendence of the contrasted terms, is most fully revealed. That, again, is the most convincing evidence of its supremacy in the sphere of religion.

Let us see, then, how for religion, and especially for Christianity, man becomes both personal and social, and becomes both in the same act. As a principle of this unification religion will best demonstrate its power in a concrete revelation of the completely personal, which is also the completely social. Now the Christ of Christian faith is just such a revelation. It is primarily as a personal actor in the world's affairs that Christ becomes an object of our faith. Not only to those who accompanied with him during his life on earth was that life, in all its vicissitudes, the real and the sole occasion of their faith in him; but also to us of to-day that faith would not be possible, in all its depth and amplitude, apart from the record we possess in the Synoptic Gospels. And when that faith, in turn, begins, as it were, to reconstruct that life under the species of eternity, it is still driven of necessity to conceive its supramundane activity as an expression of the very same personal will. The individual Jesus not only becomes the personal Christ, he proceeds from a personal principle which was already the Christ. "Being in the form of God, he counted it not a prize to be on an equality with God, but emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, becoming obedient unto death, yea, the death of the Cross." Here the whole drama is personal. For, however inadequate the imagery to the fact it would indicate, it is felt by a true instinct that that fact, the fact of personality, has its roots not in time, but in eternity, not in the order of nature, but in the order of spirit. It is felt that personality is an impulse from God, and must, therefore, find its satisfaction in God. Within the limits of the individual life a personality can be formed which feels back to its origin in the Divine purpose, and works forward to a communion and a co-operation with all the Divine purposes. And the peculiar content of Christian faith is that such a personal life, whose mere individuality is presented to us in the Synoptic Gospels, did, and does, eternally co-operate with the redemptive purpose of God by which human spirits are being wrought into an eternal and perfect order of spirit. But that personal redemptive power, in order to be effectual, must be immanent in each spirit, must have gained a right of entry to each spirit, must be the power which that spirit needs in order to become completely itself. Thus the ideal society, in which all actual societies must be fulfilled, is an order of spirits which interpenetrate one another in virtue of their perfected personality. That society is the Holy Catholic Church of the Christian Creeds, of which the visible Church (i.e., the actual Christian societies) is the Sacrament, at once the symbol and the instrument.

Now how does this sublime act of faith correspond to prosaic fact? Well, there seems to be nothing more certain than that the living process by which individuality becomes completed personality is one which carries the individual as a veritable living agent and centre of action beyond himself. This super-individual character of personality hardly needs to be dwelt upon. But what is of far greater importance is the growing deepening, enrichment, purification, and unification of the elements of individuality which the formation of any personality that seems to us true and worthy involves. This condition of the growth of personality is best expressed by saying that every act of the personality, every moral act, is an end in itself, that it has something of an eternal character. In the world of personality, the moral world, there is no room for a value-distinction between means and ends. Every means to a moral end must be of itself a moral end, having a like eternal value. The end in the moral order will never justify the means. Now, it is just by this deepening of the moral life that personality, while becoming more itself, is able to enter the more fully as a life-giving spirit into that which is not itself. Is not that a fact of history, and of the most ordinary observation? The morally great characters shape society, establish the growing order and harmony of spirit, far more in virtue of what they are than of what they do. Their conscious hopes and schemes and activities for the future of society, their external action upon it, may be largely ineffectual, while their spirit has already become an eternally constitutive element in its further growth. We may say that in the good man, and in proportion to his goodness, society is already given, at least in some one of its characteristic aspects. And the good man is the man who has penetrated through the elements of his individuality to the eternal purposes which those elements subserve, and in so doing has fused those elements together into a unity which is permanent through all its growth, which paradoxically achieves permanence in and through growth. He is the man who has found God. In him what the future needs is given already. Through him the future comes more nearly to what it ought to be. He is not merely a person. He is in some sense already society, the society which must come to be because he has been. That is the true measure, surely, of such lives as St. Paul's, or Augustine's, or Francis', or Luther's. Above all, that is the true measure of the life of Jesus Christ.

And if the life of the future society is in a sense forefelt by the great souls and prophesied in them, it, on the other hand, becomes the fulfilment of theirs. There is profound as well as daring insight in that saying of St. Paul's, that Christ is being gradually fulfilled in the Church. For society, as I have said, is a kingdom of spirits, of which each must receive, on its own terms, every living influence it does in fact receive. Hence, in proportion, as each member of the society becomes in his measure personal and contributes to it the uniqueness of his personality, there may certainly be deformation of the master-spirit, which was its supreme inspiration; but there will also be a further fulfilment of that spirit. So at least it is that all societies become false, to the great spirits that founded them in proportion as their members become merely imitative and cease to live the spirit each out of his own sincerity.

Let me resume what I have said in a few words. The confusion that lies at the root of all our varying practical orientations to-day is a confusion as to the nature of the moral ideal. That confusion is still largely unconscious, but it is the inevitable result of our immensely increased opportunities of action. On the one hand, there are the various philosophies of will, whose ethical result is a justification and even glorification of mere force. On the other hand, there is the social reaction against these philosophies which has issued in a belief in social organisation as adequate to the production and maintenance of the moral life. Life itself cannot be permanently satisfied with either of these conceptions. It is itself at all times an effort to transcend the antithesis they present. Religion is the supreme principle and power of this instinctive effort of life. And Christianity, the revelation of the personal Christ, is the clearest manifestation of the religious principle and the fullest manifestation of religious power. For it insists on what the Johannine writings describe by the great inclusive name of love, the interpenetration of spirits, as the supreme category of life. And that is the reason of the supreme need and value of religion to life to-day.

THE SOCIAL CHALLENGE TO THE CHURCH.

BY THE REV. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

WHEN we are most pessimistic about the prospects of the Christian Church there is always one comforting reflection. It is that the politicians deem the Church still vital enough to be worthy of attack. We are further comforted when we see through the disguise and observe that the attack is really a somewhat primitive way of making love. What they want from the Church is her hand in pledged affiance. They require her to identify herself with their favourite crusades. The warriors of the tribe in their tired moments need consolation and sympathy. They make a raid upon the Church and would coax her with a club and drag her into their tent, where presumably they mean to live happily ever after.

So it is that wild woad-painted fighters like Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Ramsay Macdonald have quite recently endeavoured to goad the Christian Church into a livelier and more lovesome activity. It is a compliment to her power and to their need of her that some of these champions of social reform should charge her bitterly with a cowardly deference to wealth and with a selfish fear of poverty. At first sight it hardly seems generous that highly-placed statesmen in receipt of princely salaries should speak thus; or that politicians, who have just voted themselves £400 a year out of the pockets of the public, should taunt under-paid preachers with a terror of that penury which is their daily guest and inseparable companion. But we forgive the taunt because we know it is only a prehistoric way of "making eyes" or a barbaric method of caress.

It is, however, not surprising if some representatives of the Church are not altogether flattered by these amatory advances and remind their critics that what is needed is not so much to make our religion more political as to make their politics more religious. The Social Challenge to the Church is confronted by the Church's challenge to Society. This challenge, in turn, is not always as good-humoured and genial as it might be. Able ecclesiastics like Canon Hobhouse in his Bampton Lectures on "The Church and the World," and Dean Inge in "The Church and the Age," have exhibited a proud aloofness, a combative superiority and a disdain of democracy which many people essentially sympathetic with their point of view regard as regrettable and needlessly offensive. So it is that we find our discussion already full of heat and irritation, and it requires no small amount of self-discipline and moral restraint to preserve steadiness of outlook, amenity of temper, and moderation of statement.

Summoned to confer on proposals for social co-operation we are in danger of coming together not in a conciliatory or pacific mood, but already in battle array, each flaunting the flag of his own particular bias. It is, therefore, not gratuitous to solicit at the outset a kindlier approach, and beg those who listen to me to subdue and, if they can, forget their class loyalties and political allegiances and consider the situation with freshness and sincerity of vision. It will be generally admitted that the condition of modern society is sufficiently grave and critical to make for seriousness of examination and sobriety of judgment. It is no time for inflammatory denunciations, or reactionary cynicisms. The pressure of our problems has become perilous. We feel that the crust of our civilisation, which protects us from the savagery of our primitive passions, is thin and tremulous. The fires beneath are generating terrific forces which must speedily find relief or blow up in destructive eruption. During the recent miners' strike some of us realised that its restraint was ominous and indicative of the solemn sense of imminent revolution. Quiet and unemotional men hating exaggeration and panic, felt it was a matter of "touch and go," and discussed in hushed and awed voices the possibilities of an overwhelming industrial catastrophe ending in appalling riots of the magnitude of civil war.

That particular crisis has happily passed away with only an underground rumbling, a rent here and there in the surface of things, and the hissing of a little steam. Like men after a momentary shock of earthquake, we once more affect to be at ease, but, short as are our memories, we cannot quite forget. The menace remains and may be gathering energy for a shattering outburst. Whether we like it or not, an organised democracy has emerged into power, and we must hasten not merely to "educate our masters," but to come to terms with them.

I am speaking to an audience of professed Christians and religious people. We accept in some form the supremacy and immortality of the Spiritual Life, our Sonship in God, our membership in Christ, our Brotherhood in the vast human family. I may therefore assume that we recognise that some measure of the democratic demand is reasonable and just. We are agreed that, so far as it can be ensured by social arrangement, a life that is humanly worth living ought to be made possible for all. We are agreed that no industry should be permitted to exist that necessarily degrades a man below that human level. A life humanly worth living is indeed not a fixed or static conception, and may be impossible of precise definition, but such a life, we feel, has a preferential claim on the products of labour, and is a first charge upon the resources of civilisation. To deny that is to sell the pass of Brotherhood, it is to deny Christ, to repudiate God, and to blaspheme against the Holy Ghost.

But the democratic demand goes far

WORKS BY Dr. HAROLD FORD. THE ART OF 24,000 Sold! EXTEMPORE SPEAKING

MR. GLADSTONE.—"I congratulate you on your work."
MR. HERBERT LEWIS, M.P.—"The best and most helpful book I have ever read."
PRESBYTERIAN MINISTER.—"For thirty years I dared not preach without my MS., but, adopting your method, I am no longer a slave to paper."
Price 2s. 6d.

SERMONS WITH ANALYSES

for Extemporaneous Preaching. With Practical Aids to their Effective Delivery.

Church Family Newspaper.—"If Doctor Ford's plan were more widely adopted, the problem of getting men to church would to a great extent be solved."

2s. 6d. from Dr. Ford, Taddington, Buxton.

beyond this. It claims an ever-increasing share of what are called "the good things of life," wherever found and however produced. Labour enters aggressively into the arena of economic controversy and seeks to curtail the luxuries of rent and interest, to reduce the salaries of directive ability, to annex a larger proportion of profits in the effort to increase the wages of the ordinary workman. This is a sphere of discussion in which our common agreement terminates, where we can debate endlessly of what seems morally fair, socially expedient and economically possible, where competitive individualism and "State interference" will continue to battle for the victory of their respective ideals.

Passing rapidly through this hotly contested territory, not without a faint odour of singeing, we find that democracy goes yet farther, and often speaks as if it could, out of the material resources of this life, construct for itself an Earthly Paradise. A specious form of Socialism is sometimes offered to us which represents itself as a human end and final goal; as if to realise some ideal arrangement, or system of ownership of the means of production, distribution, and exchange were to attain complete human redemption. I believe that this kind of pseudo-Socialism obtains very largely among the workers, and although repudiated by the best representatives of Socialism itself, yet it is this ill-conceived and damaging delusion that offers itself, and is often accepted as a substitute for Christianity. It is the chief, though not the sole, inspiration of contemporary attacks on the Church. Others, as we know, join from another quarter in the assault. At the very moment when Socialists are denouncing the Church for its apathy, Anti-Socialists, with equal ferocity, and even greater ignorance, are denouncing it for its activity, and are busily organising a League to protect the Christian pulpit from the invasion of preachers who are alleged to be champions of "Atheism, Robbery and Free-Love."

What, then, ought to be the attitude of the Church toward these swarming hosts of critics? Its powers of adjustment and adaptation are said to be supple and elastic, but it can hardly please them all.

May not we as Free Christians unite to-day in making one answer with resolute firmness? The Church must not become the toady of Toryism, or the lackey of Liberalism, or the serf of Socialism. She must live her own distinctive life, not merely in and through all politics, but also beyond and above all politics. She is inter-national and therefore more than and above the national life. She is not a mere organ of the State, not a department of society, but in idea, society, and fellowship itself at its point of perfect consummation. Nothing less than the utter and complete transfiguration of Mankind in a world-wide Catholicism can satisfy her ambition. That is not to be realised in a few centuries of history. In the meantime she is "the witness of divine things in all the world." She comes asking us to examine again the meaning of these conceptions that too thoughtlessly captivate us—Progress, betterment, reform, advancement, civilisation.

What, for example, are we to understand by that ambiguous and elusive word, Progress? Without attempting to be exact, may I define it provisionally as the increase of the inner and outer resources of life in terms of those essential values which the soul of man estimates as good. Progress so conceived makes much of our political struggle seem vanity. It recognises that our wants are not always, or even often, our needs. The coarse materialism and brutal mechanisation of life, the lust of sensual pleasure, the cancerous greed for riches, the cold-blooded cruelties of commerce, the devouring cannibalism of class upon class, the bewildering desolation of city life, the withdrawal from rural simplicities—these are "the good things of life" which characterise our age. Is it strange that there arises an increasing reaction against this social nightmare?—that men begin to ask what has become of those goods of the spirit which cannot be competed for? Of what avail is this pulling down of barns and building greater, while over the mortal brevity of our earthly life a voice is heard for ever sounding, "Thou fool, this night thy soul is required of thee." We see the human waste and wreckage; we feel the old agony of wounds which no prosperity can heal, and voids which no material fulness can ever fill. Accident, earthquake, fire, tempest, disease, death, still exact their toll of immitigable sorrows. What progress can compensate for human discords and alienated hearts? In the midst of the splendour of our arts, industries, sciences, do we not hear the steady drip of tears and the sob of breaking hearts. All that is human in us recoils; all that is religious in us cries out for redemption and deliverance.

"And could we live more near allied
To cloud and mountain, wind and tide,
Cast this unmeaning coil aside
And go forth free,
The world our goal, desire our guide
We might then see
Those master moments grow less rare,
And oftener feel that nameless air
Come rumouring from we know not where
And touch at whiles
Fantastic shores the fringes fair
Of fairy isles;
And hail the mystic bird that brings
News from the inner courts of things
The eternal courier dove whose wings
Are never furled:
And hear the bubbling of the springs
That feed the world."

No, progress is not increasing the pace or multiplying the complexities of things trivial in themselves, yet actually all too tyrannous. It is not acceleration or shallow activity, not the external accumulation of the conveniences which are our nuisances. It is not the speeding up of things but the deepening down and fertilisation of life; finding the profounder meanings, the more vital satisfactions, and immortal values of the spiritual life. It is not hurrying distractedly over the surface of the world, but digging the wells of joy and abiding in fruitful settlements and growing tender associations of place, of love, of fellowship. It is enriching and purifying the treasures of the heart out of which are the issues of life. It is the refining of taste, the transforming of motive, the transfiguring of character, the dignifying of all existence. It is the Christianising of society rather than the socialising of Christianity. It is the sanctifying of the State into the Church rather than the secularising of the Church into a State.

Wordsworth made less "Progress" when all shod with steel he hissed along the polished ice in games confederate than when reclining back upon his heels he stopped short and paused to see the solitary cliffs wheel by him

"even as if the earth had rolled
With visible motion her diurnal round."

And our modern maniacs of speed flying faster and ever faster over the face of the globe are symptoms and types of a false progress which achieves folly; while religion is the simple walker through sequestered glades, assimilating the loveliness of what it sees, and sinking down into its richness and variety appropriates the vital stuff of reality with every breath.

The Church of Christ lives for this deeper and abiding progress, this enriching and strengthening of the inner life which proceeds moment by moment with increasing outer harmony and physical conquest. If it appears so haughtily impatient of the cheap illusions of our age as to be over-conservative and reactionary, yet its error may be on the right side. After all they are comparatively many who will concern themselves about the transient politics of time; but few and rare are the minds who consecrate themselves to the religion of Eternity. This consecration calls for concentration, and we must not be over-censorious if the Church sometimes seems too narrowly the organ not of our political enthusiasms but of eternal life in the midst of time. It is a good not a bad thing that the Church should represent the reaction against the superficial in the interests of the profound. Believe me, the hour of its opportunity is again at hand. Men are beginning to turn in upon themselves because they are disillusioned about the sources of true joy. They have sought pleasure from nerve and sense stimulants. Their power of response is exhausted and they have been baffled. Civilisation has once more tried the old weary pagan experiment in earth-happiness and failed. Culture and wealth, æstheticism and leisured ease have deceived us to the top of our bent. Travel and the seeing of many sights have not nourished our hearts. The soul's numbness and vacancy, and sense of dereliction remain. Even the uninspired millionaires are discovering that money cannot buy them a new digestion, or revive the murdered ideals of their romantic youth. Though the twentieth century has won a unique control over the external world and has subdued and wrenched every material thing to minister to its comfort, yet its real hunger is unsatisfied and its thirst unslaked. Like a man in fever it drinks and drinks, but its torment is unassuaged, and the old shadows and mirages continue to mock it. "Thou hast made us for Thyself, and our heart is restless till it rests in Thee." We begin to understand that the saint in every age is no fool, but a person who, on the whole, makes a good thing of life, even the best thing. One who knows the surprises of the "game of love" and thrills to the joy and rests in the peace which nothing but a dreadful sincerity and a terrifying simplicity of heart can give! If "to burn always with this hard gem-like flame, to maintain this ecstasy, is success in life," then, the one supremely successful person, even on the hedonist calculus, is the saint, and the one ever-glorious school of art that needs no apology is the Church, the mother of Saints. Before all things and at all costs the Church must remain the organ and the witness of the life which overcomes the world, a spiritual life which is other-worldly in the sense that it is higher-worldly; other-worldly not merely in the deferred sense of next-worldly, but in the sense of a life of heavenly-mindedness that begins here, but oversteps the grave. The Church must not merely drive us into the storm of temporal conflicts, but teach us to find at the centre of that storm the calm where beyond these voices there is peace. Already men engrossed in the worries and anxieties of their commercial concerns, workers exhausted by their toils and economic struggles, even reformers and politicians themselves, tired with effort, spent with strife, saddened by failure, ask for some haven of invigorating rest, a place of quiet breathing and restorative joy, some centre of repose and peace, some respite of calm and tranquillity where they may taste of that uninvaded stillness which is strength and power, not enervation and apathy. They need a moment's hush in the roar of life, when out of the silences deep shall answer unto deep. Many are the tossed and buffeted souls who long for this recovery of the spirit. They need to pause and look up to those high peaks towards which we all ascend so pantingly. They want an opportunity to lift their heads and gaze on those ideals which they seek to make actual, those Ends to which all their efforts are means.

Has not the question come to us sometimes, what if all our earthly reforms were realised; what if all our bodily needs were satisfied beyond anxiety; what, having attained our political goal, would then remain as the longing quest of the soul and the satisfying life of the spirit? That is the question which should come first, not last, because this perfect life is not something at the end of a process, but everything at the depth of it. It is a beatitude and a fruition to be foretasted, anticipated, and in measure enjoyed within the very process of reform itself. The poet comes near to that life in times of trance-like stillness, when he leans on the breast of nature and seems to share her consciousness and hear the beating of her heart, and feel the rising and the falling of her breathing. Or the musician, when no longer aware that he hears; because hearing seems to have passed into that to which he listens. Or the painter, ravished in the contemplation of pure loveliness. But chief of all it is foretasted by the religious mystic, who, in moments of withdrawal from the world, finds untellable intimacy and union with the Spirit of the suns and the Soul of souls. These things may be too wonderful for us. They are high, and few can attain unto them. Yet we all have our faint and dim approximations; and we dream of that life as being in its absolute supremacy a life of pure ecstasy, a white, breathless hush of adoring joy, a fulness and infinity of rapture, an unbroken peace of hearts in eternal harmony, beating in ultimate rhythmic beat with the blissful heart of God. And that is the supreme life—other-worldly, yet vitally and passionately this-worldly, of which the Christian Church is the organ, and of which, save by treachery deep as that of Judas, she can never cease to be the organ. Our reply, then, to the social challenge which politicians offer to the Church will be so far relentlessly uncompromising. However deeply we may feel that our Christianity is an intensely practical thing, however earnestly and sincerely we may realise that the work of a church is a definitely dynamic work, a work of Christ wrought upon the visible fabric of social democracy, yet we refuse to forget that religion must continue to move in a certain serene and exalted sphere, that it speaks with a voice whose breath is a timeless, ageless life, that it bears witness to a transcendent realm where the Eternal broods with the over-shadowing white wings of the Holy Spirit; that it knows in its own intensest experiences of a mystical catholic life whose needs are infinite and immortal, a state of still communion and blessedness, where the fruits of the spirit ripen, as love and joy and peace.

Yes—but if ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them. If this is verily our life and the length of our days, we cannot enjoy it on some mount of vision as pagan gods upon Olympus. It carries with it its own redemptive responsibilities and obligations. If we believe that this is indeed our supreme life, if we believe it with that sincerity which commands sacrifice and controls conduct, then as members of the Church we shall not only try to live it ourselves; we shall do our utmost to persuade others to live it. The Church will exert every power it possesses both of persuasion and of example, to make this life prevail. It cannot be content to be a sort of sacred art gallery exhibiting lovely ideals to choice souls who have the artistic temperament to contemplate them. In so far as she is true she will have a fire of prophecy to cast upon the earth and a divine commission to fulfil. She will "awake the sensual from their sleep of death and win the vacant and the vain to noble raptures." She will announce to the multitudes that they are sitting in darkness when they might behold a great light, that they are living in the realm of gross illusions, spending their money on that which is not bread and their labour on that which satisfieth not. She must convince them that in the quest for happiness they have gone fearfully astray, that they must be converted and become as little children and enter again the kingdom of the simplicities. Do not most of our sorrows arise from wanting the things we do not need? And is it not the business of the Church to educate our desires and tastes so that the things we require men to do for us shall as far as possible give joy to labour by lessening the degradation of drudgery, relieving the miseries of monotony, heightening the pleasures of toil. The Church must make

A TYPEWRITER THAT SHINES LIKE SILVER.

WONDERFUL WRITING MACHINE FOR THE HOME, FOR BUSINESS AND TRAVEL.

READERS OF THIS JOURNAL CAN BORROW ONE FREE FOR A WEEK.

It sounds unusual to hear that a well-known firm of typewriter manufacturers are lending their beautiful Aluminium Model Type-writers free for one week's home trial, but nevertheless this is exactly what "The Blick Co., Ltd.," of 9 & 10, Cheapside, London, E.C., are doing, simply to further popularize the use of the typewriter in the Home of the well-to-do, in fact of every one.

Now this Home typewriting has really become quite popular, even with our most fashionable set.

For many years the clergy, journalists, authors, and many Ladies and Gentlemen of society have been employing the typewriter in the Library, Boudoir, and when travelling, but of late, the custom of adopting the typewriter in the home has been steadily growing, and to-day, amongst the better classes, the custom has become general.

Undoubtedly the fact that a machine has been produced by "The Blick Co., Ltd.," especially adaptable to home use and the convenience of travellers, has had much to do with the general popularizing of this new vogue.

NOT AN ORDINARY TYPEWRITING MACHINE.

Now this Aluminium Model Blick typewriter is not an ordinary writing machine.

No, it is first of all a light and portable instrument made of Aluminium and polished steel. It is compact, strong, and durable, and capable of doing the hardest yet most beautiful work.

When not in use, it rests in its handy little leather case, or may be exposed all the time in the Library, Boudoir, or on Voyage. It cannot rust or tarnish.

The advantages of a typewriter in the Home are many. It is impossible to estimate them here; sufficient to say, the bright little instrument can be placed in one corner of the room, silent, but ever ready to do the biddings of every and any member of the family.

EASY TO USE THE TYPEWRITER.

Contrary to the opinion of many, the use of the typewriter is the most simple operation possible, after you have once learned the location of the various keys (a knowledge which can be acquired in a few minutes); you simply press the letters required and as quick as a flash they are printed on the paper, until the entire communication, or whatever you may be writing, is completed.

The speed with which you write is simply a matter of a little practice.

YOU SHOULD HAVE ONE SENT FOR A WEEK'S FREE TRIAL AT YOUR OWN HOME.

"It is not a question of buying the machine," as the Managing Director of the Company said when interviewed. "People must not think because we offer to lend one of our Aluminium Blicks we expect them to buy it; on the contrary, we lend the machine for a week to every reliable applicant, simply to prove to them how simple it is to use it and how necessary it is in the home when fully appreciated.

"Nor do we send them a worn-out, second-hand instrument. No, the machines we lend are absolutely new."

"There are over 30 going out this very moment," he said, pointing to a pile of machines ready packed for shipment.

"We receive many inquiries, of course, from people who are not serious, but we depend upon the excellence of the machine to change their minds; besides, if they have much writing to do, they quickly appreciate the importance of its possession and its usefulness."

THE LOAN OF ONE FOR THE ASKING.

You can have one of these beautiful Aluminium Blicks sent to your home for a week's free trial, simply for the asking.

All you have to do is to write to the Company, 9 and 10, Cheapside, London, E.C., or their Branch Office, at 9, Oxford-street, London, W., and ask to have an Aluminium Blick sent on trial for a week.

There are two types of key-boards to this new Aluminium Blick—the "Universal" and the "Scientific." You can have either fitted to your machine. Then, again, you can write with it in many styles of types, also different characters of letters.

A novel part of this machine is the number of various languages in which you can write, each language in the identical character of letters. For instance, Hebrew can be written in Hebrew character, also Greek, Turkish, Indian, Arabic, Russian or German, simply by changing in a single minute the type cylinder.

Write for a machine and try it, or send for the little Featherweight booklet, No. 92, telling all about it.

us feel a keener responsibility, not merely for the way we earn our money, but also for the way we spend it. For what I demand I doom somebody to supply. We should revolutionise the whole world of commerce if we brought our conscience into our buying, if we purified, moralised, and simplified our personal demands upon labour.

More than this the Church can do. She can, like her Master, show that her sympathies are unfailingly with the poor, the oppressed, the sinner, the criminal, the outcast. Believing in the supremacy of the spiritual life she will exert all her pressure so that circumstances shall be subdued, moulded, and organised in the interests of the life of the Spirit. She will seek to break down all barriers and hindrances to the free flow of the Life of Love and Fellowship. This means that she will claim for all a certain material minimum by way of physical nucleus on which the Life of the Spirit can flourish and be sustained. So far she will be involved in the face of all peril in a ceaselessly adventurous and crusading warfare on behalf of the weak, the unfortunate, the unprivileged.

The word of the Risen and Glorified Christ to the Church is "Lovest thou Me? Tend my sheep." She will not shrink from warning the prosperous and repeating again "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of Heaven." The Christian transformation of motive, and regeneration of character, and "transvaluation of values" are needed, perhaps, even more desperately by the wealthy than the indigent. Are not the rich in want? Are they not hungry—hungry for that fellowship which is heaven, and the lack of which is hell? Are they not starved—starved of the confidence and love of the people? If external goods must be subordinated to spiritual wealth, then the rich man in his own life must so subordinate it or write himself down a self-deceiver or a hypocrite. If extravagance is vile in the worker, if luxury corrupts a community, they are vile and corrupting also in a rich man's household. It is for the Church fearlessly to declare this with conscious antagonism to worldliness at the risk of losing her emoluments and at the cost of cutting her "chief subscribers" to the heart. She must touch the nerve of personality and redeem our "leading laymen" from selfish complacency and inspire them with a sacrificial passion for human welfare.

Once more, the Church would do much if only she probed and searched our hearts and unveiled before our shrinking eyes the evils of society, if she made our Marie Antoinettes to pass through the country with the wretched, the crippled, the diseased, the defective, exposed to view, not huddled away from our fastidious gaze. She must not fear to make us miserable for a time in order to make us glad and joyous for ever. Too often influential representatives of the Church have preached peace and patience in order to hold down the masses of men, yes, and in recent times more conspicuously of women, in abject submission to economic and political tyranny. To use the holy name of Christ as a kind of moral drug, a curare, to chloroform and paralyse men and women, and keep them quiet in their chains and prevent their righteous insurgence—this is a loathsome apostasy. Christianity is not a despotism to enslave but an emancipation to liberate. It is no passive or pusillanimous submission to preventable wrong, but an active co-operation for right. It claims justice and pleads for mercy. It releases Humanity for its highest ends. It will not address all its lectures to the workers. It will seek to convince the masters and the capitalists that commerce exists for humanity, not humanity for commerce; that the organisers of trade and manipulators of finance and directors of industry are here, like the rest of us, to minister, not to be ministered unto; that the community as a whole, the social democracy, is over and above them as God is over and above the community; that however important class interests may be they are ever subordinate to the well-being of society, and must ever be justified at that final bar of Humanity which is the judgment seat of Christ. And this, finally, the Church can do. She can kindle among her members the enthusiasm for social knowledge and service and reform. She can stimulate interest, promote study, beget faith. She can move to pity, win sympathy, and inflame love, which are the prime driving and attractive forces of all true progress. She can be a radiating centre of personal and social idealism, of a redemptive energy which shall send its members forth into the world as fearless citizens and reformers eager to labour, to uplift, to save. She can plead, and plead, and plead by the tender mercies of Christ that our strong men shall accept the responsibilities of power and bear the burdens of the weak, and use their business genius and directive ability not to oppress or exploit, but to redeem. She can be the organ of that ultimate Spiritual Communism which transcends all the p or surface controversies between socialism and individualism, competition and co-operation. She can hasten and imaginatively anticipate her own divine Vision of Brotherhood, and convince rich and poor that she cares and loves, and is compassionate, that her overwhelming concern now as of old is that Kingdom of God, for which her Lord ascended the Cross, and of which He remains the immortal inspirer even unto the end of the world.

UNEMPLOYMENT.

By JOHN WARD, M.P.

THERE is not much detailed knowledge as to the condition of the working-class in the first half of the last century, but we may fairly assume that the unemployed part of the poverty problem was not a pressing social fact until the factory system had begun its development. The Todpudlers and others who saw the surface of things were not, after all, so far wrong when they looked upon the Inventor and his Invention as an enemy to their labour. Such, unquestionably, it appeared to be, when the only apparent fact which they could discern was their gradual exclusion from their usual forms of employment; had they understood political science, they would have seen that it was not the inventor nor the machine which brought disaster to them—though even down to the present day it is extremely doubtful whether the toil of a single man, woman, or child worker has been lightened by mechanical science.

Modern industrialism seems to depend almost entirely for its success upon the existence of a surplus of unused and unemployed human labour, as a normal condition of its profitable working; at least, this much is certain, that ever since the introduction of the factory system with its mechanical appliances, and its perfect subdivision of labour, unemployment has been a constant and permanent feature of our public life. It is true that the volume of unemployment fluctuates greatly, the lowest point being apparently about 2 per cent., the highest 9 per cent. to 10 per cent., according to the conditions of trade.

Another peculiar feature of the subject is that these oscillations appear at fairly regular periods of progression and depression, averaging from 10 to 11 years. These trade depressions are a recognised part of our commercial and industrial activities, as demonstrated by H. M. Hyndman, in his "Industrial Crises of the Nineteenth Century," and constitute not the least interesting feature of Politico-Economic. But we are not bound to confine ourselves to the economic side of the subject, for if that were the only point of view, nothing further need be said.

It now becomes necessary to deal with the Social side, and discover what is the effect upon the morals of the nation, and especially the results of this festering sore upon the working-class.

No person belonging to the middle or upper class, nor even those wage-earners who have never been through the experience themselves, can imagine the utter hopelessness of a workless worker, or the demoralising and disastrous effects that such a condition imposes upon, not merely himself, but all those who are dependent upon his wages for the actual necessities of life.

It is not possible for my listeners to place themselves even by imagination in the position of such a man. On Saturday he draws his wages and is informed that his labour is no longer required. The mere announcement of the fact is a blow as severe in that home and family as a declaration of war by some hostile Power would be to the nation at large. The sudden recoil from comparative comfort and security to the possibility of no wages, no home, no comfort, not even the barest necessities of life, is so great as to unnerve even the strongest; and yet the real battle is not even begun. The week follows, each night the man returns to his home footsore and tired, without success; this is repeated day after day, till the days grow to weeks, and the weeks grow to months. In this sad interval much which has tended to the existence and comfort of the home has been disposed of to keep body and soul together. Deterioration, physical, intellectual, and moral, rapid and profound, are the natural consequences of such circumstances. Hence this problem of unemployment, which presents itself to the political economists as a mere passionless demonstration of economic law, becomes in its effects a great question of ethics and morals, fraught with the greatest consequences to the nation as a whole. Where morals and ethics come in it is scarcely to be supposed that the churches should be kept out.

The Christian theory of all men being brothers, each determined to bear his fellows' burdens, breaks down, in fact comes to a full stop, unless it has some answer to this riddle. What the churches can do I am not prepared to say. I can only state the problem as it appears to the secular mind, leaving those who are the leaders of religious thought in this country to decide how far it is possible to assist in rescuing humanity from the worst effects of this terrible problem.

Doubtless, any solution short of fundamental changes in our industrial system is out of the question. Hence, however good our intentions may be, we seem doomed to dissension and disputation the moment we begin to experiment on the subject. That must not preclude consideration for such matters, which it is impossible longer to ignore without worst consequences following. Whether it is possible for religion to give warmth and soul to political science is a question that has been often debated, and one to which hitherto no satisfactory answer has been forthcoming. But that the conscience of the nation will insist upon some solution of these social difficulties, even if drastic reconstruction of the social organism should be involved, must be admitted by every observer of present-day affairs, and the duty of the churches is to prepare and smooth the way for the next step in industrial evolution.

"PRAYER."

By THE REV. S. H. MELLONE, M.A., D.Sc.

IN the minds of the mass of men no religious doctrine is in a more uncertain position than that of Prayer. Many of us have grown into the habit of "taking the subject for granted" in the wrong kind of way. It is one which urgently needs discussion, and more than "discussion." It needs thorough investigation.

The word itself is sometimes used in a wide, if not vague, meaning, which none the less is suggestive enough to call for notice. Prayer is identified with Desire, as an act of the mind, but with desire for some kind of good. And from this point of view, the great main wants and desires which are distinctive of humanity have been interpreted as forms of Prayer. Bergson and others have emphasised the almost limitless significance of the fact that in every realm of life we find the impulse to expand, to ascend, to grow into increased capacity and possession. What evolutionists call the "struggle for existence" has been called an ever-renewed prayer for higher existence—a supplication that throbs through all the ranks of created being.

This general desire and impulse the human family shares. If prayer is to hunger and thirst after new and greater kinds of good, then man is from the beginning a praying creature. The struggle for daily bread, for physical well-being, for society, for knowledge, for truth and justice, for moral and spiritual perfection—all these elemental springs of action which constitute what Henry Drummond called the Ascent of Man—are like prayers which answer themselves,—or rather, whose answers are provided before the supplications arise. "It shall come to pass, that before they call, I will answer, and while they are yet speaking, I will hear." Prayer unlocks treasures which have been hidden for centuries in the abyss of creation.

Man prays—that is, formulates an ideal, feels an inspiration—and then does that which prepares the way for the realisation of his desire. The exact conformity of the human will to the nature of things is the condition of success. We are bidden to knock not at dead walls but at doors. The universe is so constituted that if we learn and obey its laws we receive its treasures.

This interpretation is suggestive and valuable in many ways. It has grasped an important aspect of the truth.

But those who feel the real difficulties of our day with regard to prayer, do not use the word in any such wide sense as this. They mean actual petitions, for things that we wish to receive or wish to happen—petitions expressed in words and addressed to a superhuman Power. Prayer involves words—it is a matter of asking; and it is at this point that the real difficulties begin.

I am not merely thinking of the fact that the use of words may become a purely mechanical religious exercise. This is indeed true, and may be true whether the words spring from extempore outpouring or are read from the written or printed page. Formalism is by no means confined to liturgical forms; and so-called "free" prayer may be a merely mechanical form. The men who only "say prayers" never pray.

The difficulty about words goes deeper than this. Words are the feeblest expressions of desire. Indeed, no human quality can fully utter itself in speech. Readers of Browning will be familiar with this thought; they will remember how, in "The Ring and the Book," the philosopher, "the Pope," almost passionately denies that

"this coil
Of statement, comment, query, and response,
Tatters all too contaminate for use,"

can come between the human heart and the Heart of the Eternal.

None the less, we cannot throw away our tools because they are imperfect, for we have no others to use. And it is one of the most significant facts of our mental life, that feeling always desires to complete itself by finding some expression, however imperfect, in words. The words may pass silently as thoughts through the mind, but they are there.

What, then, is the value of these desires springing up spontaneously out of the inner life, and seeking to express themselves in words of petition to the Most High?

There are two kinds of petitions, which I will distinguish by calling the one "beggary" and the other "prayer" in the true meaning of the word. By "beggary" I mean asking for something where you do not give any equivalent. One of the great laws of the inner life is that in order to receive you must give; nothing for nothing, little for little, much for much, all for all.

Goodness cannot be had for the earnest asking any more than knowledge can. If prayer is only this, it cannot make the foolish mind wise any more than it can make the barren soil fertile. "If Prayer only means asking for something, material or spiritual; if answer to prayer is obtaining what we have asked for just because of our asking; if it differ from ordinary begging, such as when a poor man asks a rich man for alms, only in respect of the person to whom it is addressed, then the difficulty of human experience is, if fairly faced, overwhelming; the conclusion of ages of prayer must be that prayer is un-availing."

We may learn something from those who said that work is prayer, or that prayer is desire made effective by action. For real Prayer is not merely earnest asking; it is from the whole nature of the man. A prayer is a thought, but it is equally a feeling and an endeavour. This takes us beyond the level of mere asking alike in spiritual and in material things.

And experience shows that such prayers are answered. There is something in the heart of the universe that responds. The response may not take the form of realising the verbal petition in which the inner striving expresses itself. But the response never fails. Let a man seek more of inner life, and more life is given to him. Let a brave man bravely seek more courage, and more courage comes to him. Let a merciful man show his mercy, and he will himself become more merciful in showing it. That is to say, let a child of God live as a child of God, and he will know better than he knew before what that God is in whose image he is made. To form an ideal, the thought of something that ought to be, and to work for its realisation in life, is to have an actual or possible experience of God. The secret of this was not hidden even from the "heathen," as these words of a Persian poet of five centuries ago will show. "Then spake he: Oft have I cried, but never an answer there came; no 'Here am I' was vouchsafed me, nor word of praise or blame; closed is the door against me; God hears not, nor cares, nor knows. Spake then again the prophet: It is God that has sent me here. Go to my servant, He said, and speak to him words of cheer. Oh, sorely tried and tempted, art thou not chosen Mine, created to do Me service, and pay tribute of praise divine? That call of thine, 'O Allah,' that was My 'Here am I'; thy pain, and longing, and struggling, My answer from on high; thy fear and thy love are My mercy; thy prayer, My voice 'It is I.'"

I repeat, the response from the Heart of the Eternal may not include a literal fulfilment of our verbal petitions. But to express "the soul's sincere desire" in such petitions is not vain. It is not vain any more than all human hope and endeavour are vain because disappointment and failure are facts of life.

It has been urged that this dark conclusion is indeed the truth. What hopes can we cherish to-day when we learn how foolish the world has been in its expectations throughout the past? Are we, too, not sleeping and dreaming when we think we cherish a sober and reasonable faith? It may be so, but on one condition only: if it can be shown that the human mind, at any point or stage of its career, has the power to overdraw the things that lie before it in the great evolving design of the Universe. But this is just what it is impossible to prove. Ever and again in human history we see that men have been disappointed in their chosen purposes—good purposes, for which they have laboured hard, and yet by that very labour, which seemed vain, have (unknown to themselves) actually achieved things greater than all their dreams. "When our spirits are attuned to the Spirit of Righteousness," says Sir Oliver Lodge, "our hopes and aspirations exert an influence far beyond their conscious range, and in a true sense bring us into communion with our Heavenly Father."

It has been said that prayer is an "instinct," a spiritual instinct, but in line with nature's instinctive appeals as a whole. If this conception is to be fruitful, it must be applied under one condition. We must have the experience of being at the end of our resources; we must be face to face with a situation where we have done the utmost that man can do, where we can do no more, but wait for the inevitable calamity or tragedy which we now see must come. It is said that when a hunted hare perceives that in spite of all its efforts the hounds are gaining on it, it screams aloud. And when in human experience all that had seemed real is shaken and falls as solid walls fall in the earthquake, then the elemental outcries of the human soul are heard—sometimes no more and no higher than those of the terrified beast, yet ever and again rising to meet the inevitable tragedies of life, not in the blind instinct of the animal, but out of the deep sense of need of the living God, the soul of goodness in things evil.

Truly and beautifully has this been said by the late Rev. O. B. Frothingham, in words with which I may fittingly conclude: "The mother, in agony, prays for the restoration to health of her sick child; the child, that a parent may be spared; the helpless, that a helper and comforter may not be taken away. This supplication is not wordy, but vital. It calls into exercise every faculty of life. It summons to the point of need guardians, nurses, physicians, the resources of knowledge, skill, and tenderness; but it is unavailing. Through some intellectual or practical deficiency, lack of knowledge, lack of skill or care, the conditions were not met. But still the prayer may be answered in another form. As the suppliant wrestles with destiny, and presses closer and closer to the necessity that drives so ruthlessly over his desires, the cry for a life becomes the cry that the loss of life may not be wholly crushing—a cry for patience and trust. If that cry is as powerful as the other was, if it moves heart and mind and will as that did, out of the unsounded abyss of the spiritual nature the response of peace will come. The patriot prays that his country may be delivered from the woe of war. His prayer is endeavour, long, persistent, faithful; but it is unavailing. But let the good man now seek as heartily for insight into historic causes as he prayed for change in historic events; let him seek as profoundly for light and courage, and faithfulness to principle, as he prayed for a turn of affairs, and the heaven that fled from the earth will return to the heart."

The true problem of prayer concerns not the Divine response to the human endeavour. It is the problem of rousing intellectual and spiritual hunger, of increasing desire, of fostering aspiration. God give us wisdom to feel and know our own deepest needs, and then the full response will never fail.

WOMEN'S WORK IN THE CHURCHES.

By MRS. SYDNEY MARTINEAU.

It is only of recent years that we have begun to talk about women's work in the Churches, describing it in capital letters and dragging it into the limelight so dear to our self-conscious age, but in reality it is no new thing. It has always been there, generally going on quite quietly and unobtrusively, but peeping out here and there in our earliest records, in the Christian Church and in the times farther back still. Now, however, life has become a much more strenuous affair, we live at high pressure, and if we are to keep abreast of the times we must utilise all our resources to the utmost, every part of the machinery of our church life must be scrutinised, tested, and strengthened, perfected in detail that in time we may possess the perfect whole. And so has come about the need for considering the work which women do, and still more which they might do for the strengthening of our churches and the advancement of our Faith.

It is a very favourite theme nowadays to pour scorn on the old story of the Garden of Eden; but, in spite of all that wisdom and learning have done to discredit it, the old tale does enshrine two clear truths, which to my mind lie at the very root of the matter of woman's work, in the churches or out of them. First, woman was made to be a helpmeet to man, though in a far wider sense than the old writer ever dreamt of. A helpmeet, not a cook or a sempstress or a charwoman, though she may have all these accomplishments, but one gifted with judgment, insight, and courage, to lighten the burden of his work and to share his life, with its aspirations, its possibilities, its success or failure. And if our churches are to be and to do all that they might, the men and women in them must work together, striving jointly for the same high purposes, the special work of each the complement of that of the other. Even in this twentieth century and among our own group of churches, claiming ever to be in the van of progressive and enlightened opinion, there are still some which view with distrust women's organisations, which appear to think that they must be in some way antagonistic to the work of men; which do not appear to see that being members of the same body, working for the same ends, though approaching them perhaps from a different point of view, then that which inspires, strengthens, and makes the one part more efficient, strengthens and inspires the whole. There are even still a few churches which give their women practically no voice in the management of affairs, and do not admit them on to the Committee. There is work for women to do in those churches! A church committee should have a representative of every part of the church's activities, and since every church has some societies at least run by women for women, as a mothers' meeting, girls' club, sewing meeting, and so forth, there should be a woman to speak for them. They cannot be equally well represented by a man. Indeed, it would be an advantage if the example of those churches were more generally followed which appoint two lady war-

Refreshing

Sleep

follows a Hygiama light

supper

Simply stir two heaped teaspoonfuls of Hygiama into a glass of hot milk and you have a delicious food-beverage, far more nourishing and digestible than the most expensive cocoa, and constituting a simple but sufficient light supper. It lays no tax on the digestive organs, but passes quickly into the tissues, and is one of the very finest foods for brain workers. Perfectly pure and non-stimulating, and contains no drugs. It has many uses and virtues, full particulars of which will be found inside every tin.

Price: 3s. and 1s. at all up-to-date Health Food Stores, Chemists, &c.

Up-to-date Booklet on Diet and Hygiene, pithy, reliable and practical, with sample Hygiama, post free, 3d. stamps.

HYGIAMA FOODS CO.,

Dept. 10, Catherine Court, Trinity Sq.,

LONDON, E.C.

dens to look after what may be called the household department of the church, and to supervise the work of the chapel-keeper or caretaker, these wardens being committee members.

Now I want to return for a moment to the Garden of Eden, and my second thought. You know the story of the apple, and Adam's familiar excuse, "The woman tempted me," and how often Adam's descendants have revelled in and made use of so glorious an example. But they have not so loudly proclaimed the fact that the legend represents Adam as having first attained knowledge through the woman! Yet, of course, every man takes his first steps along the thorny path of knowledge guided by a woman. Into a woman's hands are given the tender years, hers it is to plant the seeds which may ripen into noble life. I do not think the women of our churches realise at all adequately that one of the crying needs of ours, as of all times, meets them in their own homes, that there is a work for them which will tax all their powers to the utmost, which no others can do so well, but which, if well done, will do more for the future strength, spirituality, and power of our churches than any other work they may ever be called upon to do. We have heard already of the Sunday school and its work, but that does not touch the problem of the religious life of our own children, because for the most part they do not go there, and even when they do no outside religious teaching can take the place of that which they should receive in their own homes from their own parents. Of course this important work should not be for the mothers only, fathers can help so much. A few words from them on such subjects have such enormous weight with their boys, but I fear that in the majority of cases it is, as the Bishop of London said of another educational problem, "The fathers won't; therefore the mothers must." Some parents meet one with the statement that they do not think it right to bias the minds of their children until they are of an age to judge for themselves, but they may be very sure that if they do not give the bias someone else will. Also why, since they will bias their child in other matters, leave him without guidance in the most vitally important of all? If we believe in our own Faith, if it really is to us the truest and most beautiful thought of God and life, surely we must wish that our children also should have this good thing, that they should not fail of the goodly heritage which we have received of our fathers. It is not that we should teach them creeds which they may outgrow, it is that we should teach them the broad simple truths on which our faith rests, and the spirit in which we look at those more difficult matters about which as they must come to know men have held and do hold such diverse opinions.

It is not easy, children ask such searching questions; and we do not realise how many things we grow up people have come to take for granted until we have to meet those questions. Meet them we must, since, if we fail the eager young minds, they will turn elsewhere and we shall lose the key to that side of their life. We need to prepare ourselves better, and to overcome a certain reluctance to speak our inmost thought, and to show what our Faith really means to us—how much we care. But if we make the effort, it may well be an impression and an influence for the children to carry through their lives and the best shield against the open indifference to such things which they will meet as they go out into the world. We have a fine history behind us of loyal unswerving fidelity to truth and conviction. We have been set in the train of many martyrs and holy men; there are those yet among us to-day bearing the names of such forefathers; some who can even trace descent from the martyrs whom we are this year commemorating. Must we not hand the story down? Should we not let the young minds and hearts feel the thrill of it, and with it the stern inexorable sense of duty to the highest, which will ripen into strength and nobility of character?

It is very largely to the mothers we must look to check that drifting on the part of the young people into indifference, and away from us, which we all deplore and through which so many members of our old Unitarian families have become lost to us altogether who should have been the mainstay of our cause.

Further it has been urged upon us during this Conference that we should give of the best of our sons for the ministry. Now, I think we should be all agreed that it is no part of the parents' duty to urge their sons to adopt that calling, since the call must come from within and not by persuasion from without, yet it is our duty to create an atmosphere so favourable to the growth of the spiritual side of the boys' natures that the call may be not unlikely to come, and so may be heard and accepted. There is one cause of the tendency to drift away, which the women especially could do very much to stop. It is that we fail to seize upon the right moment to begin to busy our young people, and to draw their interests into work for our churches. They leave school full of energy and life, ready to be stirred with fresh enthusiasms, to throw themselves whole-heartedly into whatever they take up. That is the moment to put seriously before them the claim their church and faith have upon them, and to find some definite work for them before their time and energies are wholly absorbed, as they soon will be, in other things. These other things are often good, social and political work well worth doing, but why should they come first, and church work a bad second, or be overlooked altogether, as so often happens? Why should not their church have the benefit and inspiration of their young enthusiasm? Surely there that enthusiasm will best be moulded into steadfast high endeavour, and a riper experience for the great causes that need pure faith and noble ideals and character for their advancement. One of the difficulties is that church activities do not appeal to their imagination so strongly as much of the outside work, where they feel the strength and help of numbers. Ours it must be to show them the work in a truer light, to show that no social work can be of lasting benefit unless it is built up on faith, that what the world needs to-day is to be filled with the spirit of Christ, and that when that is truly achieved, all other reforms would follow naturally, and that into the hands of our Free Churches it is given to preach and to spread that spirit to a degree that is impossible to any creed-bound church. The number of our known adherents it is true is comparatively small, but we do not make the most of those we have. It is only on rare occasions like the present that many of us can see in concrete form any indication of our solidarity and strength, but it is our own fault if we do not seize every opportunity of fellowship which is offered to us. All over the country lie scattered small congregations and isolated individuals, who feel intensely their loneliness and separation from their kindred in faith. More especially the women, because as a rule they are unable to take advantage of opportunities of getting about to other places for meetings or services as men do. Well, there is to be the circuit system to help this. But now already at work there is the British League of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian women holding out the right hand of fellowship to all such solitary women, breaking down the loneliness and the separateness and the self-centredness which has been partly the cause of, partly the consequence of, their isolation. What they need is to be brought into closer touch with others, to have their interest and sympathies widened, to be made to feel that they are one with and part of a large body of worshippers and workers. They need the personal friendly word that shall break down the isolation. For isolation spells weakness always, and therefore it is that I would urge the women of our churches to join hands to form one great sisterhood, that the weak members may feel our strength and the strong perfect their strength in helping the weak. I believe the Women's League has a great future before it, and will be able by dint of the co-operation of members over a vast area to accomplish work in many directions that has not previously been possible.

It is chiefly work by women for women that is calling to us, and any movement which strengthens and inspires our women must at the same time prove a source of strength to our churches. One very important feature is the work of following up any girl or woman, young or old, who is leaving the church in which she has been brought up, and going away to settle in another district, for work, for study or any other purpose, temporarily or permanently. If there is one of our churches in the new district, some woman in that church is found to interest herself in the girl, to welcome and befriend her, to make her feel she belongs to the new church. I know it is objected that this is nothing new, that ministers and others have done this for long past. That is so, but you will find no minister to say that his or any past efforts have been enough, that the ground is covered, and that there are not losses many and grievous to deplore.

The fact is both agencies are needed, for a girl does want a woman's help and friendship. And then, what can the minister do when the girl goes to a part where there is no chapel within reach to which he can recommend her? Practically nothing, but a woman can; so that is work women in the League undertake. That girl gets a friendly personal letter every month, with news when possible of her old church and friends, one of our papers or periodicals, or whatever may be thought helpful to her to keep her interest alive, and make her feel that she does not stand alone.

How much such work is needed, and how greatly it is appreciated have been abundantly proved in the short time since it was begun. Now we are able to follow our young folks to America and Canada by help of the American Women's Alliance, and the idea is already being taken up in the Colonies. There is the work calling only for more workers. Surely it will not call in vain.

On many aspects of women's work I can barely touch. There is no need to speak of her services when the church coffers need replenishing, and that much-abused institution, a Bazaar, seems to be the only way of salvation, nor of the many activities in which needle and thread play an important part. Newer and wider fields are opening out, and now is the time for women to fit themselves for the work, and quietly, steadily they are doing so. On committees they are learning businesslike methods and procedure, becoming accustomed to expressing their views, training to give voice to them before larger assemblies. Already a few brave women have come forward to help the van missionaries, and have proved that they too have a message to the people. It cannot but be that these exceptions will grow less rare. Together the men and women of our churches will go forward, cherishing the same ideals, inspired by the same high faith, glowing with the same enthusiasm, no aim too lofty, no service too lowly, if thereby they may help forward the cause of truth and of those principles for which we stand, in the spirit of the Master.

THE GUILD.

BY THE REV. J. J. WRIGHT.

THE preceding papers have clearly shown the place and uses in our congregational life of Domestic Missions, women's work, and Sunday schools. To these might well be added such institutions as Temperance Societies, Bands of Hope and Mercy, Children's Happy Evenings, Boys' Own Brigades, Boy Scouts and Girl Guides, Reading Circles, Ramble Clubs, and Teachers' Training Classes. Nor even then should we exhaust the list of those varied, often vigorous, and really wholesome expressions and exercises of the life that is in us, and the still larger life that we are striving to attain.

But greatest of all these institutions—greater than all these other institutions put together, in numbers, in power, and in promise—is the Sunday school.

We who care at all for real religion, we who feel any concern for the future of the churches and for the impending manhood and womanhood of our nation, should never forget the very remarkable fact that in this country alone, within its Sunday schools, there are just now more than seven and a half millions of children and young people, and over seven hundred thousand teachers. It is doubtful if the churches themselves, as churches, have so many members. Be that as it may, these numbers, and the undoubted influence upon young life of the Sunday school (oh, that it were more efficient! as, ere long, it will be), easily make the Sunday school the greatest institution under our congregational life. And I am going now to place the Guild next to the Sunday school; not, of course, by reason of its size or present achievements (although these are not meagre), but mainly and certainly because of the Guild's aims and possibilities.

The "Guild," then, is—what? It is, simply all the young people of 15 years of age and upwards, in any Sunday school or congregation, grouping themselves together in the spirit of their religion, and offering themselves willingly, as far as in them lies, to do anything their religion needs, and for the sake of others. Their motto is "For God and the Good Life." Here, for example, is a school with 40, or 50, or over 100 such young people. They are its "Guild." They are its life and soul, too, either for work or play. Throughout our schools comprised in this Conference there have grown up, so far, about 30 of these Guilds. They have included some 3,000 young folk. In other churches of this kingdom, and in our own American churches inclusively, Guild members may be counted in scores of thousands.

Let it be understood that I cannot, in a brief paper, attempt a full and detailed account of the multifarious operations of these Guilds, or of any one Guild. And let it also be distinctly understood that the mere name "Guild" is of little importance. "A rose by any other name . . ." The important thing is your group of young people over 15 years of age. Get this group working, studying, and worshipping together; and whether you call the group a "Young People's Union," a "Young People's Religious Union," a "Christian Endeavour Society," a "Minister's Religious Instruction Class," a "Young People's Preparation Class for Membership of the Congregation," or a "Guild," it practically comes to the same thing. As a matter of fact, nearly all these names are used within the circle of our own Guilds' Union. They may indicate variety of method, but essentially there is a unity of aim. Every minister of religion who, at any of these things, is working with and for his young people, is surely intending that they with him shall learn, in their measure, to stand and strive "for God and the Good Life"; and surely he and they will stand the more unflinchingly and strive the more joyfully if they be in conscious union with all the other young, aspiring life of the religious body to which they each belong.

There is one feature of this "Guild idea" that I wish to emphasise. A while ago, probably after much experience and many disappointments, either humorously or seriously, someone said: "We have tried about everything else with our young people; suppose now we try religion." Well, we have tried it in our Guilds for years, and with more than 3,000 young people. And it works! Of course it does. Why shouldn't it? Have we, of all people, such little faith in the natural religiousness of young human life? "Man doth not live by bread alone." "The man in men needs God." And never more so than in young manhood and young womanhood. There is no ignorance and no negligence of which we older folk can be more guilty than that of not seeing the natural need of young people for a religion of their own, and failing to supply them, where possible, with that atmosphere and opportunity in which young religious life can exercise itself and grow.

There comes a time in most young lives—and it comes earlier now than it used to do—when, no longer content merely to receive religious impressions, they become eager to give the life that is in them some definite expressions. And, as a rule, the expression wants to take the shape of action. Jesus knew why. "This do," said he, "this do and thou shalt live." Get a group of young people together, as a Guild does, on any evening, 40, 50, or 100 of them, and, mind you, it is "the things to be done" which will mainly occupy the time of the meeting. The things to be done. What things? They are too numerous to tell. Suffice it to say that the Guild exists to do anything and everything which needs doing in connection with its school, congregation, neighbourhood, or its faith anywhere. The true Guild member is ready for any duty, even any drudgery, to the extent of his or her power; from teaching a class to scrubbing a floor; from acting as secretary to an institution to attending the door at a meeting or entertainment; from carrying flowers and a cheery word to the sick and aged to mending the school curtains; "minding" the younger scholars during service in chapel; securing new members for the congregation from the school; "running" the Band of Hope; managing most of the many "parties"; getting up pieces; acting as minister's wardens in connection with the chapel; making themselves useful to stranger or friend at opening and closing of services; raising money for a stricken comrade or any other unfortunate; and, in short, both "living the life" and "lending a hand" wherever and whenever a heart and a hand are required. So that, as you see, the Guild exists mainly for "doing." Through these "doings" that eager young life expresses itself at a period when expression naturally shapes itself in action; that best of all spiritual action, which consists in voluntarily doing something, not easy, for the sake of somebody else—taking trouble for the good or the pleasure of others.

But this "doing" needs sustenance. And the sustenance comes to Guild members in three ways: (1) By the regular meeting together of these young folk, their consciousness of a corporate life; (2) by the associated study they undertake of some suitable subject or book; and (3) by the simple, happy worship of God and the recollection of duty as in His sight, with which every Guild meeting begins and ends.

A moment ago I used the words "corporate life." The times we live in are giving many evidences of what "corporate life" can do. "Corporate life" is strong, and growing stronger. "Corporate life" is good; but, as yet, it is strongest—I had almost said for selfish—I will say for material ends.

And where is it weakest? Am I wrong in feeling that "corporate life," vital cohesion, is weakest just where it should be strongest—I mean in the churches—in the institutions which exist, above all things, for spiritual ends?

Well, along this very line the Guild is the church's greatest opportunity. Recollect that the Guild consists of the young folk of 15 years of age and upwards. They are the older part of the Sunday school and the younger part of the congregation. They are, in fact, the living link between the two. And see! Here you find a strong characteristic to work upon. Just at this period in its growth there is in young human nature a healthy craving for "corporate life." The Guild provides that, and cultivates it, and then offers it to the congregation. For everyone of these young people is due to the Congregation. He owes himself to the congregation, and as a rule, if rightly dealt with, he is willing to pay what he owes—namely, his young life's service. There are 3,000 such young people in our Guilds at this moment. But in our Sunday schools, with their more than 36,000 scholars, there are also at this moment some 9,000 other young people, and in our homes, apart from our schools, there are probably 3,000 more, making 15,000 young folk over 15 years of age ready now for our churches. Let there be Guilds and Guild members made of all these; let our congregations, in due course, link up all these into their membership; and shall we not see a change and a strengthening of our "corporate life" for spiritual ends?

Friends, we fail to do this at our peril—at the peril of our churches and all they stand for. And for this reason—the final and most serious reason I have to offer.

The present century has made a discovery in regard to the religious life which is as startling as it is unquestionable. After careful and widespread investigation, psychologists of religion have proved that there comes a period in every human life when there is "a rapid increase of sensitiveness to religious influence," and that when that period is over the "sensitiveness to religious influence" declines and practically ceases. And when is that period? Roughly, it reaches from the age of 13 to the age of 23. Really and truly the most sensitive and formative years run from 15 to 18. Awakened and unfolded, answered and aided, in this its natural period, whether from 15 to 18 or from 13 to 23, and the spiritual life of a man may be his forever; but neglected then, as the majority of cases show, even "the sensitiveness to religious influence" soon after the age of 20 begins to wane and vanish, and, before long, becomes practically nil. Yes, there is a tide in the affairs of the soul which, taken at the flood, leads on to spiritual fortune. Ah, the pity of it that any life should miss this tide! But we now know when the flood-time is. Let us reverently watch for it among our young people—in the home, the school, and the congregation—this tide of the Spirit of God, fresh rising in young hearts, flowing through new lives. Give it free and natural way, and surely it shall be glorified!

This, I am persuaded, is the Life which our churches now need most to cultivate and incorporate. Here we are at "the beginnings of the springs," accepting of God our young people as channels of the Water of Life to our congregations, while still, as always, everyone of us will continue

"Looking from the gift up to the Giver,
And from the cistern to the river,
And from the finite to Infinity,
And from man's dust to God's divinity."

Two of the National Conference Papers, viz., "The Sunday School," by Mrs. Dowson, and "Our Domestic Missions," by the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne, are unavoidably held over till next week owing to the great pressure on our space.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

MESSRS. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD.:—London's Underworld; Thomas Holmes. 7s. 6d. net.

MR. A. C. FIFEELD:—Drake in California; Herman Scheffauer. 2s. 6d. net. The Morning's Cup, and other Poems; Charles Herbert Frogley. 1s. net.

THE PERSONAL RIGHTS ASSOCIATION:—Individualism and the Land Question; Sir Roland K. Wilson, Bart., J. H. Levy, and others. 1s. net.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN:—English Apprenticeship and Child Labour; Jocelyn Dunlop and R. D. Denman, M.P. 10s. 6d. net.

MESSRS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE:—Home University Library. 1s. net each; Conservatism, Lord Hugh Cecil, M.A., M.P.; Agriculture, Prof. W. Somerville; English Literature, Mediaeval, Prof. W. P. Ker; Principles of Physiology, Prof. J. G. McKendrick; The English Language, L. Pearsall Smith, M.A.; Matter and Energy, F. Soddy, M.A.; Buddhism, Mrs. Rhys Davids; American Civil War; F. L. Paxson; Psychology, Prof. W. McDougall; Nonconformity, Principal W. B. Selbie.

RIDERS' NEW BOOKS

JUST PUBLISHED.

Large Crown 8vo. Cloth Gilt.
Price 2s. 6d. net. With Diagrams.

A Mathematical Theory of Spirit

Being an attempt to employ certain mathematical principles in the elucidation of some metaphysical problems.

BY

H. STANLEY REDGROVE,
B.Sc. (Lond.), F.C.S.

Assist. Lecturer in Mathematics at the Polytechnic, London, W.; Author of "Matter, Spirit and the Cosmos," "Alchemy: Ancient and Modern," &c.

CONTENTS.

The Doctrine of Correspondences—Incommensurable Quantities—Nature regarded as the Embodiment of Number—Negative Quantities—"Imaginary Quantities"—The Mathematical Solution of some Metaphysical Problems.

SIR W. F. BARRETT writes to the Author of this book:—"I have read your book through with great interest. Let me warmly congratulate you on its originality and ability. Your chapter on Imaginary Quantities is a most suggestive and valuable one, and affords a new and striking illustration of Swedenborg's doctrine of the correspondence of the physical and spiritual worlds."

READY MAY 6.

The Great Initiates

Complete Edition of EDOUARD SCHURÉ'S "Les Grands Initiés," with an Introduction to Esoteric Teaching, and a Frontispiece Portrait of the Author. Translated by Fred Rothwell, B.A. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2 vols., about 400 pp. each, 7s. 6d. net the two volumes.—N.B. Volumes not sold singly.

JUST PUBLISHED.

Crown 8vo, Cloth Gilt, 403 pp. Price 6s.

A Son of Perdition

An Occult Romance.

By FERGUS HUME,

Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab," &c., &c.

With four full-page illustrations.

This novel, the plot of which is of an entirely Occult character, is dedicated by permission to Mrs. Annie Besant, who has written to the author specially complimenting him on the merits and interest of his new romance.

JUST PUBLISHED.

Crown 8vo, Cloth Gilt, 416 pp. Price 1s. net.

A New Edition of

BRAM STOKER'S Celebrated Novel Dracula

"The very weirdest of weird tales."—Punch.
"Its fascination is so great that it is impossible to lay it aside."—The Lady.

READY APRIL 30.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 550 pp. 4s. 6d. net.

ENGLISH EDITION OF

Sree Krishna, the Lord of Love.

BY

SWAMI BĀBĀ PREMĀNAND BHĀRATI.

CONTENTS.

PART I: Introductory—Life's Source and Search—God is Formless and has a Form—The Concrete and Abstract God—The Science of Creation—The Steps of Creation—The Cyclic Motion of Changes—The Golden Age—The Silver Age—The Caste System—The Four Stages of Life—The Copper Age—The Iron Age—Manwantara or the Deluge—The Kalpa Cycle—Natural Dissolution—Modern Scientific Testimony—Science upholds Shāstras—Physical and Astral Bodies—Karma—Re-incarnation—How to Destroy Karma—The Atom's Return Journey—Yoga—Bhakti Yoga—Vaishnav, Christian of Christians—Krishna Leelā.

PART II: Proem—Sree Krishna, the Lord of Love—Messages and Revelations from Sree Krishna.

"The greatest book of the Century."—Oriental Review.
"A fascinating exposition of an exalted philosophy."—American Review of Reviews.

Write for Spring Catalogue and New Prospectuses to:—

WILLIAM RIDER & SON, Ltd., 164, Aldersgate Street, LONDON, E.C.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE
OF UNITARIAN AND LIBERAL
CHRISTIAN CONGREGATIONS.

RECEPTION OF FOREIGN DELEGATES.

THE proceedings opened on Tuesday, April 16, with the reception of the President, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, although the meetings of the National Conference Guilds' Union, of which we gave a report last week, had been held on the previous day, when a large number of delegates and friends were present at the Young People's Rally in the Old Meeting Church. At 4.30, after the members of the Council and foreign delegates grouped on the platform had been photographed, a resolution moved by the President, expressing the profound sympathy of all present with the sufferers of the Titanic and those who in England and America were mourning the loss of their loved ones as a result of that terrible disaster, was passed in silence, the whole assembly standing. The President explained that letters had been received from Italy, Germany, France, Denmark and Hungary, apologising for the absence of delegates from those countries. They now extended their cordial welcome to Dr. Crothers, of Cambridge, Mass., and Professor Eerdmans, of Leyden. They had the kindest feelings for Dr. Crothers, because they knew him of yore, and because they had the American nation very near their hearts. They had all rejoiced when there was a prospect of an international Arbitration Treaty, with the promise that never while the world lasted should warfare arise between England and America, and although there was at present some hitch, not on our side, in regard to this, they had, if he understood the naval question aright, ruled out the United States as a country against which to build Dreadnoughts. Our relations with our brothers and sisters in America were those which knit us together in a bond of peace which we would never allow to be broken. They would remember how much they owed in their religious life to men like Dr. Channing and Theodore Parker, and they knew also how Americans valued the great traditions of English culture and literature, and how when they crossed the Atlantic they loved to visit the spots made sacred by memories which they cherished. The two peoples were one in these things, and they welcomed Dr. Crothers as one of themselves.

Dr. Crothers said that when he came to England he felt that he was not so much a passenger as a freight ship, so heavily laden was he with instructions, and with messages and greetings from the American Unitarian Association, and its President, Dr. Eliot. He came as the representative of that Association, and also unofficially, as the representative of a body similar to the one he was addressing, and which only last summer had indeed the same name. That name, the National Conference, had, however, been abolished in order that they might enlarge their boundaries and include Canada, a process which they called in America "benevolent assimilation." He wished, therefore, to give them as the special greeting of Unitarianism on the other side of the Atlantic the fact that they had a Conference there knit together with bonds of brotherly love, which extended from the Gulf of Mexico, the land of the orange and the palm, clear to the North Pole. The President had spoken of the Arbitration Treaty, which was, he thought, prophetic of the time to come, and which the President of the United States had done all that he constitutionally could to establish. There was still some difficulty about that, but he wished that they could see with the eye of imagination the territory covered by the religious Conference of which he had spoken. He would like them to follow the three thousand miles of political boundary line from the Bay of Fundy westward, on the one side the British Empire, on the other side the American Republic. The only difference between them was that on the English side they talked French, and on the American side, English. The two countries smiled at each other across the way, and there was not a single soldier on guard, nor a single warship. If they sailed away on a great ship for 1,000 miles and passed through the Straits of Detroit, where the traffic in tonnage surpassed by many hundreds of thousands of tons that which passed through the Suez Canal, they would go on to Lake Superior, crossing the wide waters where for over a hundred years there had not been seen a warship. Then they could cross the great plains, those stretches of wheat-fields and purely agricultural land that sweep down for 2,000 miles to the Gulf; they could go to the new cities of Vancouver, Tacoma and Seattle; and they would find all bound together inseparably as one people, though partly under the British flag and partly under the American flag. It was this fact that gave force to their greetings to one another, and bound them together in bonds of union and peace.

Mr. Charles Hawksley, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, said that the Association which had done him the honour to make him its President had spread itself over the world. It had its counterpart in the kindred Association in the United States, and in course of time the two Associations would cover much larger areas than Dr. Crothers had spoken of, until they covered the globe. They could not forget how heartily they were always welcomed in other countries, as for instance in America, and at the Congress in Berlin. They had just parted with Dr. and Mrs. Wendte, and they had lately heard an account of the work done by Dr. Wendte in Europe, which had occupied him for twelve months, and for which they owed him their thanks. They wished him and his wife a safe voyage, and when Dr. Crothers left their shores, he, too, would be laden with their thanks and good wishes.

Mr. Dowson, in welcoming Professor Eerdmans, spoke appreciatively of the fine scholarly work which he had done, and of the close ties of sympathy existing between his country and our own.

Professor Eerdmans expressed his pleasure at having been appointed a delegate of the Dutch Protestantbond, especially as he had happy memories of another time when he had come over as a representative of that body. Their aims were the same, the bringing together of ministers and laymen of the various churches, and he pointed out that the feelings between those different churches was very different from what it had been twenty or thirty years ago, and that their religious sympathy was greater even than they supposed. He hoped they would have some interesting discussions during the week, but theological discussions were not everything, and often puzzled the unlearned. What was needed was the note of true religion, and he hoped the spiritual feeling which unites all people would inspire their Conference.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

The Business Meeting followed. The report, which was taken as read, was presented by the Rev. James Harwood, secretary, and the financial statement, which showed a balance due to the Treasurer of between £30 and £40, by Sir James Scott, who said it was a great pity that not more than half of the 400 congregations and associations from which they ought to be able to get support helped to keep the organisation he represented going. Their total expenses would be about £200 a year as near as one could judge, and they were about £50 a year short, but if the other congregations would contribute something it would be to their interest and advantage and would dissipate this difficulty. He urged them to make the work of his successor as treasurer, Mr. John Harrison, as easy as they could by contributing to the funds.

The President, in moving the adoption of the report, made sympathetic references to the late Rev. S. A. Steinthal, one of the first secretaries of the Conference, who organised the work of the committee and was universally loved and revered; the Rev. J. Page Hopps, and the Rev. J. C. Street. In losing these men they had lost noble leaders, but he trusted the younger ministers would remember them and live in their spirit. It was fifty years since he first preached at the Church of the Messiah in Birmingham, and one after another his old companions had passed away, leaving him very much alone, but it was one of the happy things of his life that he now stood before them as President of the Conference in the town which first ushered him into the ministry. He urged them to take to heart the words of the treasurer, whose services they were so sorry to lose, and make the burden lighter for Mr. John Harrison, who although not well at present, and prevented, to their great regret, from attending the Conference, had his heart in the work and meant to do all he could for them.

Mr. A. S. Thew seconded the motion, expressing at the same time the warm appreciation felt by all for the help and influence given by Mr. Dowson. He hoped that they might be able to welcome him at such gatherings for many years to come. The following reports were then presented: Sustentation Fund, read by Mr. W. Byng Kenrick; the Guilds' Union, read by the Rev. C. M. Wright; the Union for Social Service, read by Miss Gittins; Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund, by the Rev. C. J. Street; and the Ministers' Benevolent Society, read by Mr. T. H. Russell. The following resolution was moved by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed :—

That the best thanks of the Conference be given to the retiring officers and Committee, and that the following officers be appointed for the ensuing three years : President, Mr. Hugh R. Rathbone ; Vice-Presidents, Mr. Jas. R. Beard, J.P., Sir William B. Bowring, Bart., Rev. Dr. J. E. Carpenter, Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke, F.R.I.B.A., Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A., Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., Sir J. W. Scott, Bart., Rev. Joseph Wood ; Treasurer, Mr. John Harrison ; Auditors, Mr. G. R. Brace, Mr. C. Sydney Jones, M.A. ; Secretary, Rev. James Harwood, B.A.

Mr. Wicksteed said everyone must have realised, if only dimly, the extreme importance of the report which they held in their hands. It was a record of tact, patience, mutual respect and sympathy which had brought about what very few could have anticipated. The deeper currents of life had carried them on in spite of swirls and cross-currents and ruffings of the tide. They all remembered the feeling of hope and relief and confidence which came over them when they realised that the next three years would be spent under the presidency of Mr. Dowson. The thanks of the Conference were given to the retiring officers, who had their affection and respect, and who had served them so admirably. He rejoiced to see the names of sons of those among whom they had worked rising up to take the place of their fathers. The resolution was seconded by Mr. Egbert Steinthal, and passed unanimously. Mr. Dowson said that when three years ago he was invited, most unexpectedly, to succeed Mr. Wood in the President's chair, he did not hesitate because he thought it was a duty to which he was called. He had done what he could in the fulfilment of that duty, and all the officers had done what they could in the same manner.

Mr. Hugh R. Rathbone, President-elect, who was accorded a hearty reception, said although he had never attended a Conference before, he had had, for a number of years, a great belief in their churches and in their future, in their closer union and more active work in letting the objects of their faith be known. In Liverpool, partly owing to their desire not to be dogmatic, not to have any doctrine, not to have any creed in the ordinary acceptation of the word, they had been rather apt to hide their light under a bushel. They did not give themselves the name Unitarian, but they had got the name, and they did not do quite enough, he thought, to let people know what it stood for. He thanked them for the way in which they had expressed their appreciation of the officers, and for himself in the name of his forebears who were still recollected by them. The meeting was then adjourned until the next day.

The Annual Meeting was resumed at 2.30 on Wednesday at the Birmingham and Midland Institute, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson in the chair.

It was moved by the chairman on behalf of the Committee :—

(1) That the following be added to the list of societies enumerated in Rule 7, which are entitled to elect a representative to serve on the Committee : the British

League of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian Women, the Conference Union for Social Service, and the Sheffield and District Association of Churches.

(2) That the Missionary Conference be added to the list of Societies enumerated in Rule 7.

The Rev. Charles Roper seconded the motion, which was carried. It was moved by the chairman, seconded, in the absence of Mr. Fletcher Robinson, by the Rev. Dendy Agate, and passed "that the changes in the Rules recommended by the Committee, which have been circulated in the Report, be adopted." This was also carried.

The Minimum Stipend.

It was then moved from the chair

(1) That the report of the Committee relating to Ministerial Stipends be approved, and that its recommendation to raise a sum of £30,000 to enable the Ministers' Sustentation Fund to extend its operations be adopted and warmly commended to our Churches.

(2) That the following, with power to add to their number, be appointed a Special Committee to give effect to the foregoing Resolution :—

The President, Treasurer, and Secretary of the National Conference and of the other three bodies which composed the Joint Committee, together with the Revs. Dr. Carpenter, H. E. Dowson, F. K. Freeston, H. Gow, C. J. Street, Joseph Wood, Sir James W. Scott, Messrs. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., Chas Hawksley, C. Sydney Jones, W. Byng Kenrick, G. H. Leigh, C. F. Pearson, T. Fletcher Robinson, and Edwin Tate.

The Rev. C. J. Street said that he felt a great responsibility in having to second this most important resolution, and how serious was the absence in this connection of their good friend Mr. John Harrison, to whom the cause had commended itself thoroughly, and who had been most indefatigable in making necessary investigations and doing everything in his power to help them. It was a matter for great regret that he could not be there to expound their claim, especially as he himself would have preferred that a layman should second the resolution. They would all remember that at the last Conference a very strong and important resolution was moved, one outcome of which were the resolutions just moved. During the past three years the members of the Committee had worked heartily together, and they thoroughly agreed with and supported the claim which had been put before the meeting. There might be diversities of opinion, but amongst these diversities there was a true unity, and not only was their own body completely and absolutely united, but they came forward as representing the four great societies or funds belonging to their denomination whom they carried with them, and they trusted the meeting would now set its seal on the work of the Committee. Great care, thought, and insight had been given to the consideration of the scheme. The bulk of the work had been done by Mr. Wood, who deserved all the thanks that could possibly be given to him for the infinite pains he had taken. The guiding principle that had actuated them all along had been that they should bring all their great organisations if possible into line, and have a thorough understanding between them. Without a true union of aims it would have been impossible to present any scheme to the Conference with the hope of its being approved. It was possible that other ways of doing the thing that was in their minds had suggested themselves to his hearers, and it was quite possible that there were better ways than those they were presenting, but they might be sure that whatever was in their minds on this subject had already been considered. Some possibilities which they had themselves put forward had been ruled out as being impracticable. It was, for instance, undesirable to have new funds, and what was needed was the consolidation of their funds. One plan was even adopted and referred to the constituent bodies, and thrown back upon the joint committee by them, so that it seemed as if they had come to a dead wall. But what at first appeared to be a misery had proved to be a blessing in disguise, and they were now all of opinion that the proposal presented to the meeting was better than the one thought of before. He begged them to accept the denominational consensus and throw themselves into the task of making the scheme the success it deserved to be. He referred them to page 13 of the report, on which it was stated that their purpose was—

(1) To relieve the British and Foreign Unitarian Association from the responsibility (of which it would be glad to be free) of contributing towards the maintenance of the ministry in the older Churches.

(2) To give more adequate support than is at present possible to the maintenance

BOOKS for THINKERS

MAMMON'S VICTIMS

By T. A. BROCKLEHURST. 6d. net (postage 1d.). An astounding but accurate account of the log roll of the victims of conscience-less commerce—victims slain and maimed stupidly and preventably.

WOMEN IN THE MINISTRY

By HATTIE BAKER. 6d. net (postage 1d.). A striking appeal against the prejudice which at present excludes women from the Free Church Ministry. The author rests her case upon the spirit of the Testament, the practice of the Early Church, and the living needs of to-day.

THE A.B.C. OF SOCIAL ECONOMY

By ALFRED HOOD. 6d. net (postage 1d.). Tells in clear and simple language how the land question bears on the well-being of the people.

OLD STORIES AND SAYINGS FROM MANY LANDS

Compiled by ISA FRYIE MAYO. 1s. net (postage 1d.). The six post free 6s. Well off the beaten track. Intended to awaken in the many that international understanding which it is believed will be the special growth of the twentieth century.

- I. Great Britain and Ireland.
- II. Northern Europe.
- III. Southern Europe.
- IV. India, Ceylon, Burma, and the Near East.
- V. Japan and China.
- VI. Africa.

"Every Volume a Mine of Wisdom."

FAST AND FICTION

By MAHLON COOPER. 5s. net. A Book of Live Things generally; of Breezy Whys and Wherefores; of Sorrows and Wrongs.

Send 4d. stamps for specimen copies of the OPEN ROAD and the HEALTHY LIFE—two independent magazines—and complete catalogue.

C. W. DANIEL, Ltd., 3, Amen Corner, E.C.

of the ministry generally where the work is being satisfactorily done.

The Committee would still hold to this, but they had now been obliged to drop No. 1 for the present, not because they did not wish to relieve the British and Foreign Unitarian Association from responsibilities which it ought not to be burdened with, but because they found that it would require another £20,000 to allow them to do this, and their courage was not quite equal to asking them to raise £50,000. They believed that they could get £30,000, and if that sum was raised to £50,000, they would do their best to set the British and Foreign Unitarian Association free to apply their funds to the older churches. In regard to No. 2 it was a first condition that a minimum wage, of which they were now hearing so much, should be ensured to ministers, and the augmentation of stipends where good work has been done. The work of the Sustentation Fund and the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund was going on right lines, but their work was quite different. It was quite right now that they should ask for a minimum wage, and for special terms for abnormal places. It would be seen that they had put the figures in their Bill, the scale of stipends which they aimed at securing being as follows:—

For Agricultural Districts in England	£120
For Towns and populous places in England	150
For Cities and large Towns in England	175
For Agricultural Districts in Wales	110
For Towns and populous places in Wales	140

No one supposed for a moment that these were the best terms that could be desired, but these figures were the least that should be offered, and they represented the minimum they were striving for. They had wished to make the sums higher at first, but on looking into the figures they found that in order to do so they would require so much more than they had allowed for that it was for the present out of the question. Continuing, Mr. Street pointed out that it was to the interest of the congregations themselves that everything should be done to stimulate ministerial efficiency, and made a moving appeal on behalf of the minister in straitened circumstances whose mind is perpetually harassed by the expenses he has to meet, and the problem of how to maintain and educate a family on a pitifully inadequate stipend. There was also the question of ministerial training, which was becoming more expensive, as a higher educational standard had to be reached now than formerly. When all the disadvantages of their calling were taken into account, they might ask, what was it that kept men in the ministry? It was devotion to their cause. The same abilities applied to business might bring brilliant success, but they were willing to forego worldly prosperity for the sake of an ideal, and because they had a gospel to preach to their fellows. The least a congregation could do was to make their burden as light as possible. Mr. Street then gave further details in regard to the working of the scheme, and urged on behalf of some of the smaller churches, which many people were only too anxious to shut up, that where they were really alive, if only small in numbers, they should be kept open. Some of their finest ministers and laymen had come from the smaller congregations, and it would not do for them to disparage the latter.

Dr. Carpenter expressed his entire sympathy with the scheme which had been laid before them. He said it might have occurred to some members of the Conference to ask why, after all, two separate funds should exist side by side, the Sustentation and Ministers' Augmentation fund, and why, when a crisis like this arose, some attempt should not have been made to bring them together, and amalgamate and increase them for common purposes. The proposal was more than once discussed at joint committees of the two funds and the committee appointed by the Conference, and it was found that the basis of the two trusts were so different that it would have been quite impossible to amalgamate them without an Act of Parliament, or without calling in the aid of the Charity Commissioners. In spite, therefore, of the wish which many of them entertained that such a union might be effected, the difficulties were such as could not be set aside. He did not suppose the £30,000 would be raised in a single year, but he hoped that at the next Conference the committee just appointed would be able to state that the money had been raised, and that they could go forward in full confidence that their ends would be attained.

A question was asked as to why the stipend for ministers in Wales was £10 lower than in other parts. It seemed to show a lack of knowledge of conditions in Wales.

The Rev. J. A. Pearson asked what means were provided for the final disposition of the fund. In the event of the £30,000 being carried over into the Sustentation Fund, was there any opportunity for members of the Conference to be directly represented upon it? With the ideas on democracy which are increasing at the present day, it was desirable that the Conference should be so represented. It was not satisfactory that it should raise money to be handed over to a small body of subscribers. Other questions were raised by Mr. Pearson which the President said could not be answered just at the moment, but they would be taken into careful consideration.

Dr. Carpenter said the difficulty at present was a legal one. When the Pension Fund was being collected he went about the country telling people that the money would be placed under the control of the Conference, provided that the subscribers to whom the money belonged consented. When it was raised they were informed that the money would belong to the subscribers. He therefore went about explaining that the subscribers would be content to hand over the money to the Conference, but when the subscribers met they took their own line. The Committee propounded their claim but the subscribers adopted their own method, and the money was therefore under the control of a body outside the Conference. One could not, therefore, say in advance what the subscribers to whom the money belonged would choose to do with it.

Mr. Pearson urged that they should give the most careful consideration to the disposition of this matter.

The Rev. H. J. Rossington, referring to the fact that the Irish ministers were excluded from this scheme, said that they did not desire separation in this respect because that would be a great injustice. They had got up a Sustentation Fund of their own, and the impression was that they could get on without help from England. Some of the ministers were, however, in receipt of funds from England, and if the proposed scheme came into operation they would be actually worse off.

Mr. Hugh R. Rathbone said that he agreed with the President and Mr. Street in the necessity for the approval of this scheme being thoroughly unanimous. There were very great difficulties in regard to the two Funds, and if they were not very careful they would find themselves in the difficult position of having three funds. He felt sure that what had fallen from the lips of their friends from Ireland and Wales would be carefully considered. His personal opinion was—without, it must be remembered, consulting anyone on the matter—that it would be desirable to include Ireland and raise the Welsh stipends. Mr. Rathbone also thought that the rate of interest calculated (3 per cent.) was rather too low, and that the managers of the trust funds might be induced to take a rather wider view in regard to investments. He suggested that the amounts put down were too small. He as a layman felt that if there was one thing more important than another it was that their ministers should be free from financial cares. How could a man, for instance, justify the paying of £40 a year for his cook, and not paying £40 for his minister? He would almost prefer going for the £50,000, and he suggested that they would be wiser to ask for the larger amount; but, if not, at least they must get the smaller one. He warmly supported the motion.

Mr. Charles Hawksley asked if they were limited to £30,000.

The Rev. H. D. Roberts suggested that Mr. Pearson's question should be left to the consideration of the committee, and that Mr. Rathbone's idea should be adopted, and the good round sum of £50,000 asked for. That would help them to satisfy the case of Ireland.

The Rev. W. H. Drummond said he spoke under correction, but as a manager of the Sustentation Fund he did not think that Fund had contemplated giving up the Irish grants at all, and there was no intention, so far as he knew, of diminishing the money for Ireland. The new fund would be confined in its operation to the English churches, but that would not interfere with the present grants to the churches in Ireland and Wales.

Mr. Byng Kenrick, chairman of the Sustentation Fund said that it would never be the desire of the administrators of the Sustentation Fund to administrate on other methods than those which had worked so happily in the past.

Mr. Wigley asked some further questions relating to the Sustentation and Augmentation Funds, and accentuated Mr. Pearson's suggestion. If they were going to try and get small sums as well as large it should be on a very democratic basis.

The President said that the proposal was that the money raised should go to the Sustentation Fund, but not a penny to the Augmentation Fund.

Mr. Pearson again referred to his former question, and urged that the Conference, if it raised this money, should be responsible for the administration of the sum, not a private body.

The Rev. H. Gow supported Mr. Pearson's suggestion, but said that however the vote might go they were all absolutely unanimous in their desire to raise the money.

After some further discussion, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed said that out of an apparently hopeless position a scheme which had been in the air for 3 years had been brought, by the devotion and sacrifice of cherished ideals on the part of their leaders, to a point at which it was possible to believe that they were going to do what they had set out to do. What would those ministers say to whom a prospect of better things had been offered if now it was snatched away from them?

Finally the motion for the new scheme was carried unanimously to the great satisfaction of the meeting, and it was proposed by Mr. Dowson, and seconded by Mr. Pearson, that a request should be made for representation of the Conference on the Governing Body of the Sustentation Fund.

The Circuit System.

It was then moved by the Rev. J. Wood that the recommendations of the Committee relating to the Circuit System be approved. Mr. Wood said it was nine years since he read a paper at the Liverpool Conference pointing out the need for a more adequate organisation of their religious forces and the augmentation of the stipends of the ministers. He trusted they had now begun to see the need of waiting, and the prospect of some real achievement. He felt that if these two things were fairly under weigh before he retired, as he was about to do shortly, from the ministry, he could sing his Nunc Dimittis. The circuit system was really an experiment in fellowship. It was easy to sing "May we not divided but united be," but to what extent were they to be united? It was not sufficient that churches should have just a general sympathy with each other and send a delegate every three years to a conference. The difficulties the Church had to face in this twentieth century called for a much closer co-operation than in the past. They needed each other, for the interchange of services, councils, and experiences. Their difficulties were greater than those of the orthodox churches. They had accepted a place of danger, and from this they could not shrink. They had to appeal to a spirit of chivalry, and with no immediate prospect of success or reward. The prejudices against them were still enormous, and that was all the more reason why they should stand more closely together. The old idea of the independent church had proved a failure. Churches only stood when, like ears of corn, they stood together, and experience amply showed that the church that was not in affiliation with others was doomed to fail. It was only a matter of a brilliant personality, and when that was taken away, everything came, to all intents and purposes, to an end. He deprecated an exaggerated sense of their own independence, and a refusal to listen to the counsels of their brethren. In the evolution of the Free Churches there was a missing link; they had made almost a fetish of freedom, which, although good in itself, was only a means to an end. They had forgotten that the watchword of their churches should be federation. The little Bethel was sometimes the denial of democracy, but now a new spirit was abroad which brought men together for the welfare of a common cause. What he was pleading for, Mr. Wood continued, was not a new authority or a new organisation, but the coming together of groups of churches in neighbourhoods where this was possible, that they might strengthen each other and back each other up in a common interchange of opinions. The circuit system contemplated that little groups of churches conveniently situated should form one church which they might call a Federated Church, or Guild Church, or Fellowship Church, or District Church, just as they pleased. Any scheme which contemplated this must comply with two conditions. First of all it must be elastic enough to adapt itself to social conditions. Local circumstances would decide the kind of framework which should be set up, and they might be such as to make it in some cases impracticable or undesirable to institute the circuit system at all. The object of the scheme, it was further explained, was not primarily pecuniary; it was mutual service and fellowship that were aimed at. There was no idea of bringing pressure to bear in order to enforce the scheme, and those who came into it must do so of their own free will. He advocated no kind of authority or institution which should rival the convocations of the orthodox churches. What was urged was that there should be a recognition of the social character of religion, the need of each church for the sympathy and fellowship of the like-minded. They lived too much in sterile isolation and knew too little of the swing of being on the march. When he was their President and visited the churches in different places, he found that they had little contact with each other, and that very often one church knew nothing about its neighbour churches. Each one lived for itself, and their sympathy did not extend beyond an annual collection for the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. There were ministers, of course, who went about among them, but he was not thinking of that kind of thing. He felt that in the case of a group of five or six churches the ministers should interchange visits, and that the congregations should sometimes come together for common worship. After some further amplification of the scheme as set forth in the Report, Mr. Wood moved the resolution.

Mr. J. W. Wigley, of Manchester, seconding the resolution, said he came from a district where there was already a circuit church which had now entered upon the third year of its existence, and gave a description of the way in which they had carried out the idea. They worked on the system of corporate federation, but each congregation had entire control of its congregational life apart from the federal system. The ministers had worked admirably, and he was quite sure that all the good things predicted by Mr. Wood if the circuit system were accepted were capable of achievement. He hoped the scheme would be adopted with hearty goodwill.

The Rev. A. L. Smith said that the word "circuit" meant "going round," and that if they adopted it everywhere they would seem to be undertaking what the Methodists also call the circuit system. He added that in order to work this scheme they would want lay preachers, and, as secretary of the North Midland Lay Preachers' Association, he would like to remind them how much they had owed to their lay preachers in the past for what they had done in district work, and how much they would owe them in the future if the circuit scheme were adopted.

The resolution was passed unanimously.

England and Germany.

It was then moved from the chair:—

"That this Conference of Representatives of Liberal Christian Churches in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland desire to express their profound concern that anything should have occurred to disturb the cordial relations between England and Germany hitherto subsisting. That the Conference, gratefully remembering the extraordinary warmth of the reception given to their delegates at the Berlin Conference in 1910 by the kindred churches in Germany, sends a message of their own equal goodwill to their brothers and sisters in the 'Fatherland' born of

The Ideal Meal

So intimate is the relation between mind and body, that the argument for pure and simple food is irresistible. Not only this, but on humane and philosophic grounds, many are desirous of forsaking flesh-foods. Whether, however, the motive be health or humaneness, taste or economy, one naturally does not care to make changes without knowledge of ways and means. Now we offer you a unique Booklet, which not only explains how to use NUTS and other natural products in place of meat, but gives definite practical advice, hints and suggestions, recipes and specimen menus. This little book also explains the easy carriage-paid terms by which you can obtain convenient supplies of all the purer types of food straight to your door. This booklet (with one or two free samples) is free. Simply send a card mentioning The Inquirer.

Free

GEORGE SAVAGE & SONS,
Nut Experts and Food Specialists,
53, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

Phone
6708
Wall.

Phone
6708
Wall.

a common stock with them, and united to them in a peace that has never been broken, and which they pray may endure while the world lasts."

Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., seconded the resolution in a speech which was necessarily curtailed owing to the lateness of the hour. The resolution, he said, recalled the great kindness which was everywhere shown to the delegates at the Berlin Conference, and no one who went through that experience could at any time entertain feelings other than those of the sincerest friendship with Germany. He declared emphatically that we had no cause for a quarrel with Germany. Such difficulties as did arise were not worthy to obtain the importance they had obtained in the public Press. Why was it that the people in England were always being agitated by some sort of scare? Why was it that at the present time we were building a huge navy against Germany? We had never had a serious quarrel with her, although we had quarrelled with other European Powers. It was finance that was at the bottom of it all, and the vested interests in armaments, &c., which are inseparably linked up with war and the prospects of war. Referring to the recent utterances of the First Lord of the Admiralty, who had frankly told Germany that if she would trust us we would trust her, but that if she continued to build more than we should build against her, Mr. Chancellor said it was as well that this attitude should be plainly stated and realised. It was evident that England, as a nation, and so far as the people were concerned, had no quarrel with Germany, while, on the other hand, Germany, so far as her people were concerned, had no quarrel with us. But the war spirit was nurtured there, as here, by an energetic Navy League, which published an organ containing pages of advertisements of the Krupp firm alone. The speaker pleaded for the fostering of the spirit of friendship and the frank discussion of all the difficulties that cropped up from time to time. We had everything to gain and nothing to lose by cultivating the friendliest relations with Germany, and by encouraging in the circles in which we moved the feelings of goodwill and fellowship which would gradually be reflected in public opinion, and help to remove the causes of aggression, enabling the nations to enter upon an era of peace which would be for the blessing of the whole world.

Before the meeting terminated the Rev. Charles Peach moved and Mr. H. P. Greg seconded the following resolution, which was carried:—

That this National Conference of Unitarian and other Free Christian Churches, while thanking the Prime Minister for his promise of early legislation on the Education Question, urges that such legislation should provide for (a) the payment of a large building grant towards the erection of Council schools; (b) the transfer to the local education authority of all non-provided schools in single school areas, and (c) the bringing of a Council school within the reach of all children of school age. It further earnestly hopes that no countenance whatever will be given to proposals to establish a right of entry into Council schools, or to allow any schools supported out of public funds to contract out of public control.

Mr. Peach urged that the suggestion of what was desirable, and what was possible, and what would be enormously useful, should be conveyed to the Government with this declaration. It was subsequently decided that the resolution should be forwarded to the Prime Minister and the Minister for Education.

As a result of the ballot for the Committee the following were elected:—The Revs. Dendy Agate, E. D. P. Evans, F. K. Freeston, Henry Gow, Alfred Hall, C. Roper, J. M. Lloyd Thomas; Messrs. H. P. Greg, J. C. Warren, J. Harrop White, J. Wigley, J. N. Williams.

Wednesday's Proceedings.

On Wednesday morning a large number of delegates and friends attended the Communion Service at the Old Meeting Church, conducted by the Rev. Joseph Wood, who delivered the address, and the Rev. E. I. Fripp (Leicester). The Revs. J. Worsley Austin (Birmingham), V. D. Davis (Bournemouth), Philemon Moore (Carmarthen), H. Williamson (Dundee), and Messrs. B. P. Burroughs (Liverpool), J. Hewitt and J. D. Skirrow (Birmingham), Grosvenor Talbot (Leeds), A. S. Thew (Southport), and J. Harrop White (Mansfield) assisted. The organist was Mr. A. J. Cotton. At 10.45 the President, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, delivered his presidential address, which we published last week, at the Town Hall. The first Conference followed immediately, Professor G. Daves Hicks (London) being in the chair. Papers on "Bergson" and "Christianity and the Moral Ideal" were read by the Rev. L. P. Jacks and the Rev. Canon Lilley (Hereford) respectively. They will be found among the Conference papers. As the time allotted for the Conference was already disposed of, the discussion, which was to have been opened by the Rev. Dr. Tudor Jones, did not take place.

In the afternoon the business meeting was resumed, as reported elsewhere, and terminated shortly after 5. At 5.30 the annual meeting of the National Conference Union for Social Service was held at the Church of the Messiah Schools.

In the evening a conversation was held in the Town Hall. Mr. Byng Kenrick, chairman of the local committee, and Mrs. Byng Kenrick, received the guests.

By 8 o'clock the hall was crowded, and presented an animated scene which many people found pleasure in watching from the galleries. Several part songs were admirably rendered by Mr. A. J. Cotton's Musical Society, and Miss Alice Hare contributed several solos, including "Micaela's Song" from Carmen, "She wandered down the mountain side," and Elgar's "Pleading" and "The Torch." Mr. W. G. Halliley was the accompanist.

Thursday's Proceedings.

The religious service on Thursday morning was conducted by the Rev. F. H. Vaughan, of Mansfield, the sermon, which we publish this week, being preached by Dr. Crothers (Cambridge, Mass.). Two important papers were read at the Conference which followed: "The Significance of Jesus for His Age," by Mr. C. G. Montefiore, of which we gave a summary last week; and "The Significance of Jesus for Our Own Age," which has also appeared in these columns, by the Rev. H. J. Rossington. The chairman, the Rev. Dr. Estlin Carpenter, in introducing the subject said that the subject was one that could never lose its interest for those who in any sense took upon themselves the Christian name. The first decade of the present century had seen great changes in our views regarding some of the special elements in the teaching of Jesus. The critical study of the gospels has been pursued in this country with extraordinary zeal by students of all denominations, and a number of books have attracted public attention, which illustrated in various ways the results to be derived from such study. Readers of Father Tyrrell's remarkable work on "Christianity at the Cross Roads," would remember how he has presented the extremer form of the eschatological interpretation of Christianity, and claimed that the Catholic Church was its true heir, and fulfilled in the highest form its great transcendental conceptions. On the other hand, they had heard Professor Burkitt, of Cambridge, declaring that the first three gospels are so profoundly imbued with Jewish notions of Jesus' own time as to render them to a large extent unsuitable for books of universal devotion. It was therefore a matter of importance to us to be able to estimate as far and as correctly as we could the relation of Jesus to his own age. They were happy in being able to hear from one of the most accomplished scholars of Jesus' own race, what was the impression he had formed from an almost life-long study of the gospels. He ventured to say that Mr. Montefiore was not unvisited by dreams of a time when the barriers between Christians and Jews shall drop away. They welcomed him with no common pleasure, for they felt that in him they had a mind of profound sincerity brought to bear on a great question, and if they did not always see eye to eye with him, or he with them, he was at any rate fearless of difference, for he knew that the deeper unities of worship lay beneath. When Mr. Montefiore had spoken, they would have the advantage of a further paper from Mr. Rossington, of Belfast, who had already rendered service to this cause in his excellent little book in refutation of the preposterous theories of Dr. Drews.

DISCUSSION.

The Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, who opened the discussion, said that he could not dissociate the two papers they had just heard from the splendid Conference sermon preached by Mr. Gow, and from the one by Dr. Crothers to which they had listened that morning. He wanted to elucidate a difference which he thought required elucidating between credo, I believe, and crediderunt, certain have believed. The credo, was, he said, ninety-nine parts made up of the crediderunt of others. Then there was a further difference between credo and credite—believe ye. "I believe" is an appeal to life and experience, life going out seeking life; but "believe ye," "ye have got to believe," was a very different thing.

It was not essential that men should cling to this or that form of religious faith, and if they put their belief into the form of the assertion "ye have got to believe," it must only mean "I believe—believe ye what is necessary for fellowship with us." They ought to firmly fix one thing in their minds—that a belief that such and such things happened in the past, or that such and such words were once spoken, could not in the nature of things be an article of dogmatic faith. There were different planes which could not touch each other, and to say that it was part of their credo that something happened in such and such a year was a false quantity. An historical fact could not be an article of dogmatic faith or the gauge of spiritual sympathy. The few criticisms he had to offer referred absolutely to points of historical fact, and had nothing to do with dogmatic faith or spiritual communion. Mr. Wicksteed then dealt at some length with certain aspects of Judaism, and the prophets of Israel, with their ethical monotheism which still seemed to him the most stupendous thing in all history, and drew an interesting parallel between their interpretation of the Law and that of Jesus. The prophets were slain, but the truths and ideals they embodied survived. When Jesus came he was a prophet at a heavier price than the others, a prophet who was ready to slay his people on the altar of his God that the whole world might become the world of God. Mr. Montefiore was far too generous, he continued, in his estimate of how far the best Judaism had gone into Christianity. He could find in Christianity far more of Plato and Plotinus than of Isaiah or Jesus, and if there was any difference before which the difference of Jesus and Judaism shrank into insignificance, it was the difference between Jesus and Christianity.

The Rev. E. W. Lummis said he wished that Liberal Christianity could be congratulated on having forgotten the idea that a religion can be constructed without a Christ. It was very easy to see from a critical point of view the difficulty of holding such a position, but when they came to the historical Jesus with cold eyes, criticising, until he, rising before them, warmed their hearts, they would find something there that would suffice for their religious needs, or at any rate something of very great value for the religious life. He, personally, found the most salient characteristic of Jesus was his serene moral sanity. When he said "this is so" they felt quite sure it was so, not because he said it but because it answered to something central in themselves. In the whole course of his life, taken with his teachings, he seemed to be so beautifully and serenely right, walking the way of an enlightened conscience. His moral sanity—and this was a point of supreme importance—was rooted in a quite extraordinary spiritual genius. He had a sense of God, an extremely fine faith, a conviction beyond ordinary experience of the reality of transcendent things, and consequently a surging optimism which lifted him into the plane of the ideal with every step he trod. His morality was unimpaired by a unique trend of circumstances. He possessed a great gentleness, an enthusiasm for humanity which did not permit the denunciation of anything but sanctimoniousness and hypocrisy. They had therefore a quite special reason for applying this historical Jesus to the needs of their own time, and so to correct the materialism of the world, which does not associate spiritual genius with moral common sense.

Dr. Carpenter, in closing the discussion, said that he believed that the view held by the extreme school of eschatologists—Tyrrell, Schweitzer, Loisy, &c.—exaggerated very much the eschatological elements in what he regarded as the real historical nucleus of the Gospels. Their warmest thanks were due to the readers of the papers that morning, but especially to Mr. Montefiore, for his efforts to bring his own people and those who hold the views of Liberal Christians into some kind of real fellowship and sympathy with each other.

Afternoon Session.

Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., presided at the afternoon Conference, when two papers, "Unemployment," by Mr. John Ward, M.P., and "The Social Challenge to the Churches," by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, were read. Great regret was felt at the unavoidable absence of Mr. Ward, whose paper was read by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant.

The Chairman said the subjects they were about to consider were "The Social Challenge to the Churches" and "Unemployment," the application of that challenge. Unemployment was one of the most difficult questions they had to deal with, because it affected the most helpless section of the community. Politicians helped those who helped themselves, and the unemployed were the last to come in for their assistance. There were three kinds of unemployment—chronic, seasonal, and intermittent. The schoolmaster, the Poor Law guardian, the minister of religion, the labour leader, and the capitalist must all deal with one aspect or another of this question, and it was obvious that no one Act of Parliament could remedy the evil. The Right to Work Bill which came up annually in the House of Commons seemed to him no remedy. If workshops were erected in a neighbourhood similar to those already there, and started in bad times, that would only throw more people out of employment; neither would it pay to run these things by municipalities. They must, however, deal first with the children, and bring them up and educate them well. Then one had to deal with the difficulty of blind alley employment. The drink problem also had to be faced. Again, if those who controlled capital had more foresight, they would spend money in bad times upon new constructions to prepare for good trade. He would like to urge this upon all capitalists, and particularly upon the railway companies, as Mr. John Burns had urged it upon the local authorities. He personally believed in insurance as a remedy for unemployment. This might be either voluntary or compulsory; in the one case it was called thrift, in the other case very uncomplimentary names were applied to it. He was, however, glad they had made a beginning in this question of national insurance, and he believed that as a result the country would benefit greatly.

Opposed to Nothing that is Good.
Afraid of Nothing that is True.

THE CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH

Organ of the World-wide Progressive
Movement in Religion & Social Ethics.

A Sermon and Prayer by the REV. R. J. CAMPBELL, M.A., appear every week; also Answers to Questions on Religion and the Problems of Life by REV. W. E. ORCHARD, D.D., a Parliamentary Article by PHILIP SNOWDEN, M.P., and a Contribution by REV. E. W. LEWIS.

"THE SOCIAL CHALLENGE TO THE CHURCH," the Address delivered by Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS at the National Conference, Birmingham, will be published as a Pamphlet Supplement to the "CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH," May 1st.

Every week with the "Christian Commonwealth" there is published a Supplement, containing notable Sermons and other utterances by Preachers and Leaders, at home and abroad, who voice the religious and social message of the twentieth century. Among those whose discourses have appeared in this series are:—

BISHOP GORE; Rt. Hon. D. LLOYD GEORGE; MR. G. BERNARD SHAW; DR. LYMAN ABBOTT (Editor of the "Outlook," New York); PASTOR HERMANN KUTTER (Zurich), Switzerland; PROF. T. L. YASWANI (Brahmo Samaj); MR. C. MONTEFIORE, M.A. (Liberal Jewish Synagogue); PRINCIPAL J. ESTLIN CARPENTER; DR. W. E. ORCHARD.

The price of the "CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH" and the Supplement together is 1½d., post free 2d. (Newsagents supply the Supplement to order only.) Either can be obtained separately at 1d., post free 1½d.

EVERY WEDNESDAY - One Penny.

Order of your Newsagent.

By Post: Per annum—Inland, 6/6
With Sermon Supplement, 8/8.
Abroad, 8/8 With Supplement,
10/10.

THE
CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH,
Salisbury Square, LONDON, E.C.

DISCUSSION.

Mr. Ronald Williams (Director of Labour Exchanges, Liverpool) in opening the discussion said that unemployment was a thing to be prevented, not palliated. The commonest and most difficult kind of unemployment was that caused by sickness, trade fluctuations, and periods of cyclical depression which swept over the country from time to time. No human agency could cope entirely with the latter, although suggestions were made, as they had heard, for keeping back such work as Government contracts, the building of new post offices, &c., in good times, so that they might be carried out in bad times; for dealing with the question of coast erosion, afforestation, &c. Then there was seasonal unemployment, instances of which he gave; and the fact that there were numbers of skilled men temporarily out of work owing to the demand and supply not getting into touch. Some trades were overcrowded, and others not sufficiently equipped. This involved the question of training the children adequately for earning a livelihood, so that they would not just fall into any kind of work that offered when they left school. The drink problem, which complicated matters still further, could not be disregarded, and, lastly, there was the unemployment or under employment of the casual worker. Mr. Williams gave striking instances of this, drawn from his experiences in connection with the dockers, and advocated the more intelligent pooling and distribution of labour, which some of the shipowners of Liverpool were beginning to put into effect.

Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., said he did not believe that the problem of unemployment was an essential part of the working out of natural laws; it was rather due to the violating of natural laws on the part of society. There had been in recent years an enormous increase in the wealth of the country, but a comparatively slight increase in wages, and a much more rapid increase in the cost of living. Since 1895 the population had increased by 6,250,000, while the area of land under cultivation in this country had decreased by nearly a million acres. The land had been getting into fewer and fewer hands, and to an increasing extent withdrawn from productive cultivation; fewer and fewer people therefore found employment upon it, and were driven from their villages into the towns, where they undersold those who were previously there, and helped to keep down wages. Mr. Chancellor put forward his own strong view that land monopoly was at the bottom of the trouble.

If it could be made unprofitable for a man to withhold land from cultivation to devote, for instance, to sport, a very different set of tendencies would be put into operation. Men did not want the right to work; they wanted the opportunity to work, and until they were given those natural opportunities which it was the right of every man to have, all their schemes of insurance and labour exchanges would not go to the root of the matter and unemployment would continue. In conclusion, Mr. Chancellor referred to the drink question, which, he feared, did not present itself as urgently to the members of their churches as it ought to do. He hoped there was going to be a great moral and political crusade against intemperance.

Mr. Capleton pointed out that the suffering going on in the middle classes at the present time owing to the industrial crisis was hardly ever alluded to by speakers on social problems, and that there was always plenty of produce seeking customers, but the would-be customers had no money. The great question was not, therefore, how they could produce more, but how they could so distribute their resources that all could have more of what was produced. Instead of producing for profit, we ought to produce for consumption, and there was no way of doing that until we regarded our country as a unit economically.

The Rev. W. Piggott said a great fallacy underlay the remarks of all the speakers except the last one. Production was increasing in a greater ratio than consumption. They had got to face the fact that all their reforms were palliating a system that worked more and more destructively, and their palliations could not pick up the wreckage fast enough. Humanity was greater than all the products in the world, and when some of them asked for a consideration of the Socialist solution and explained that the taxation of landowners would only bring that solution nearer, it was because religion had taught them humanity and the gospel of brotherhood.

Mr. F. Maddison emphatically dissented from the Socialist doctrine, and endorsed the views which Mr. Lloyd Thomas had so eloquently expressed in regard to the attitude of the churches towards social questions. We might get tired of our political opinions, but we never got tired of the eternal truths.

Mr. H. Rathbone also spoke. He did not wish to allude to contentious subjects. They must all desire to have a little more understanding, and, he thought, they ought to look to the churches for their inspiration, and acquire a real knowledge of social conditions. They must realise that it did no good to tinker with the grave evils about which they were thinking.

Mr. Brunner expressed his appreciation of what they had heard. Mr. Lloyd Thomas's paper, he said, was both a sermon and a poem.

At six o'clock the Triennial Meeting of the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund was held in the Town Hall Committee Room.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

At 7.30 members of the Conference reassembled in the Town Hall for the Public Meeting, over which Mr. W. Byng Kenrick presided. Mr. C. W. Perkins gave some beautiful selections on the organ before the proceedings began. Addresses were given by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant on "The Ejected of 1662," Dr. S. M. Crothers (Cambridge, Mass.), Mrs. H. D. Roberts on "War from a Woman's Point of View," the Rev. F. K. Freeston (London) on "The Church and the Churches," and Mr. Fred Maddison (London) on "International Peace."

Friday's Proceedings.

The last session on Friday morning opened with a Devotional Service in the Birmingham and Midland Institute, conducted by the Revs. Dr. Drummond (Oxford) and J. A. Pearson (London).

Before the Conference began, the following resolution was moved by Dr. Carpenter: "That this Conference, assembled for a second time in Birmingham with greatly increased numbers, expresses its warmest thanks to the churches which have again welcomed it in their midst; it gratefully records the services of the Local Committee, Chairman, Secretaries, and Treasurer, and all who assisted them in arranging the details of its proceedings, and it offers its sincerest acknowledgments to the many hosts who have received its members with such considerate and generous hospitality." Dr. Carpenter reminded those present that the date of the Conference 27 years ago almost synchronised with the beginning of the Rev. J. Wood's ministry, and the present Conference almost synchronised with the close of his ministry. When they remembered the part he had played in the proceedings of their Conference and the labours he had undertaken in regard to the important scheme which they had adopted, they would surely wish to offer their condolences to the congregation of the Old Meeting for losing so devoted a pastor. A warm tribute was paid to the local committee and to the Chairman, Mr. Byng Kenrick, for the valuable services they had rendered in making all arrangements for the welfare of the delegates and friends visiting Birmingham, and to the secretaries, the Rev. J. Worsley Austin and Mr. Ellis Townley. The vote of thanks was seconded by Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, and supported by the Rev. M. K. Schermerhorn (U.S.A.), who said that in 40 years' experience of conferences he had never known one so splendidly managed as the one now closing. The President added a few words, and the resolution was carried with enthusiasm, all present standing. Mr. Byng Kenrick acknowledged the thanks thus expressed on behalf of the committee, and the Rev. J. Worsley Austin and Mr. Ellis Townley also responded.

A Conference on "Our Congregational Life and Institutions" followed, the speakers being Mrs. H. E. Dowson, on "The Sunday School," Mrs. Sydney Martineau, on "Women's Work for the Churches," the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne (London) on Domestic Missions, and the Rev. J. J. Wright (Chowbent) on "The Guild." A paper on "Our Music," by Mr. John Harrison, was also down on the programme, but owing to ill-health Mr. Harrison was unable either to attend the Conference or to send his contribution to the discussion, a fact which was regretted by all.

The Chairman, Mr. Lawrence Holt, of Liverpool, said that it was almost impossible for him at the present time, as a friend of the managers of the White Star Line, to apply his thoughts to anything but the terrible disaster which was in all their minds. In considering the subject they were about to hear discussed, however, he would urge them to seek, so far as their religion meant the doing of good works, not to do that work alone, but in communion with people of every shade of thought. He felt that a certain amount of social work was necessary in order to train up their own youth and keep open the approaches of religion to high ideals. It was necessary sometimes to instigate the indolent among them to a sense of their duty in relation to social work. They must be prepared to give their time and energies to it, but he would ask them to remember that a church after all, and organised religion itself, was only a means to an end. Their church life and institutions were simply the means by which men and women might be turned out into the world fully equipped to bear its burdens and joys, and by their life to preach the message of a world-wide citizenship.

Owing to the lateness of the hour no discussion followed the papers.

The Rev. Dr. H. S. Mellone (Manchester) followed with an address on "Prayer," and the proceedings terminated with a hymn and the benediction.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

THE public meeting in connection with the National Conference was held on Thursday evening, April 20, in the Birmingham Town Hall. The chair was taken at 7.30 by Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, who, after the singing of the opening hymn, spoke as follows:—

I stand before you at the present moment in a representative capacity as the official of the committee representing our local congregations, and, therefore, as my first word I should like to express on behalf of those congregations our pleasure in welcoming the delegates to this National Conference of Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other Non-Subscribing or Kindred Congregations. In so far as names are necessary it is inevitable that those in the forefront of religious progress will require a large number of definitions. For my own part I have sometimes wished that we could revive the old denomination of Independent. It is idle, however, to waste breath upon these discussions on terminology. For the most part we go through this world called by names not of our own choosing, and if as individuals we are reconciled to that fact, we shall, as a denomination, be able to reconcile ourselves to it.

What is the essential thing which has united us throughout the history of this Conference and long before? It has been our struggle in the cause of toleration and to obtain civil and religious liberty. We have striven to secure that no one shall be put under special restraints and disabilities because of his religious beliefs, other than the restraints and disabilities which we are all subject to as citizens of the State. We have also struggled to secure for ourselves, both laity and ministry, that no limits shall be set to our freedom to follow where our honest search for truth may lead us. That liberty has not been secured without toil and suffering and persecution, which did not end with the early days of the movement. Our people have been subjected to misrepresentations all along, especially here in Birmingham. No one here is likely to forget the inconveniences, to use no stronger word, that our predecessors were put to in boldly following these aims which we still hold.

It is [now twenty-seven years since the last meeting of this Conference in Birmingham. Twenty-seven years is a large piece from the life of an individual, but not a large piece in the history of any movement; and therefore if, as I have said, you consult either your memories or the records of the past, and consider what were the subjects that were being discussed at the meetings held here twenty-seven years ago, you will not be very much surprised to find that the problems and the aspirations have remained very little changed. What has struck me in attending these meetings has been, not that the problems have been changed, or that the aspirations are different or better now than they were then, but there is a different emphasis. Are we going to sit down with the freedom we have now got as if it were a thing we could enjoy, or are we to take it as a thing we must use? Shall we try to cleanse our hearts and purify our spirits? Let us not deceive ourselves. We are none of us always so good as in our best moments, but that is no reason why we should not have ideals. I trust we shall go away from these meetings holding fast some of the ideals set before us here.

Mr. Kenrick closed with a reference to the resolution of the Conference to raise a fund that should provide for each poorly-paid minister a reasonable minimum stipend. Calling upon the laity to contribute to the fund, he announced that some had been so stirred by the appeal that promises amounting to £5,000 had already been received.

"THE EJECTED OF 1662."

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant said:—Although Birmingham's motto is "Forward," and our chairman has commended to us the duty of progress, there may be some reason in casting our glance backward for a moment to an event that occurred five half-centuries ago. The results of that event are not ended. Our Conference itself, and the movement it represents, must be included in their number; and Protestant Nonconformity is obviously an effect to be reckoned with. However inadequate my words must be I trust they may serve to recall the facts, while in your own minds will arise thoughts and feelings unexpressed, if not, indeed, inexpressible. Let me remind you that the first Protestant Nonconformists in this country were those who, having rejected the Pope as head of the Church, saw no good reason for accepting King Henry VIII. in his stead. There were also Catholic Nonconformists, who had not rejected the papal supremacy. The King seems to have shown a discriminating sense of the relative offences of these two groups by sentencing Catholic Nonconformists to be hanged, and Protestant Nonconformists to be burned. That was in 1534. Under his daughter, Queen Elizabeth, when the difficult work of establishing the English Church was carried out, there were many who could not fit their religious ideals into the moulds prepared for them by the State, and in consequence they suffered severely. Still worse sufferings befell them under her successor, James I., and under his son, Charles I. Some of the Puritans sought liberty in flight across the sea, to Holland or North America. Others were prevented from escape, and remained with those who never thought of fleeing away, but who at last, after long endurance, stood up to the King and fought out the issue.

We are not here to glorify war, but we do feel that in that struggle blows were struck which went far to secure the liberties ultimately enjoyed in this land. The immediate outcome of the struggle was a short period of Puritan ascendancy. During a full century the Nonconformists had suffered under the persecuting statutes; they had been taught during many years "how not to do it," and they learned the lesson only too well. For a period considerably less than twenty years they persecuted in their turn, and though there were many mitigations in their method, we candidly admit that a large number of excellent men did suffer loss and hardship under the Puritans. If apology were needed here, ample evidence shows that a good defence might be offered. But let the worse they did be admitted, the fact remains that if they used whips they were chastised with scorpions. The Puritan period ended with the restoration of the monarchy in the person of Charles II., a man of whose private life the less said, in decent company, the better. So far as he was capable of forming a strong resolution, he may be said to have intended a liberal policy in regard to religion; but political and ecclesiastical forces ruled otherwise, and the darkest blot on his public record lies in the Ejection of 1662. Despite the most explicit promises of broad and inclusive legislation, despite also the singular loyalty of the Presbyterian party, such conditions were devised, with a sort of ferocious ingenuity, as would ensure that the Puritans should be "knaves if they conformed," and should be starved if they did not conform. They were not knaves, and they came out. Over two thousand men, mostly Presbyterians, including some of the best men of their generation, declined the Uniformity imposed by the Act of 1662, and during the years succeeding they faithfully endured in face of the most cruel enactments. How is it possible for such a people as ourselves not to honour these men—and the women who suffered by their side! For, it is told, in some cases where the men hesitated their wives urged them to do their duty, pledging themselves to share the worst privation if only conscience might be obeyed.

Some in this meeting are the actual descendants of those brave people; all of us who value religious liberty are their spiritual descendants, and all unite in commemorating on this occasion their learning and devotion, their zeal for religion, and the imperishable service they rendered by their days of suffering to us and others. To others—as well as to ourselves! It would be unpardonable to forget them in a city which not only treasures the names of H. W. Crosskey and George Dawson, but also Charles Vince the sunny-natured Baptist, and R. W. Dale the Congregationalist, a giant among men. It is a broad inheritance we share, and if it be true, as I believe, that our ancient chapels are the most distinct posterity of those old English Presbyterians, it is also true that all Protestant Nonconformists are co-heirs with us of the inspirations and duties of that far-off day. May I, in concluding, very briefly recall the stages of these five half-centuries; it should afford some practical considerations. At the close of the first half-century after 1662 the old Nonconformists, having at last attained to liberty of worship (but not of thought—being forbidden to think otherwise of the Trinity than as prescribed by authority), were doing their best together to resist the severe pressure still brought to bear on them by the dominant sect, the Church of England. The second half-century saw the lessening of these evils, but revealed a sense of growing indifference of thought in the ranks of the Nonconformists. Mainly the Presbyterians seem to have exhibited the unorthodox tendencies, and though overt Unitarianism was not yet visible except in isolated cases, it is clear that the Unitarian movement had begun. At the close of the third half-century this movement had become in a measure organised, and the fourth witnessed long and grievous struggles for the inheritance of the ancient meeting-houses and trust funds. So it came about that fifty years ago, when the bicentenary of 1662 was celebrated, men were living who on one side or the other had contended strongly about these matters, and it was unhappily inevitable that some bitterness remained in their memories. But now another half-century has passed away, and I think we may thankfully say that a new temper has been growing. Between us and many of our Nonconformist brethren there has developed not only a feeling of mutual respect, but of something warmer. It would be wrong to suggest that they have weakened in their attachment to the beliefs they hold dear, but I think it is true that they have come to recognise the pressure of some of the considerations which led our forefathers to modify their old opinions; and certainly we are all coming to feel that great aims unite us, beneath all our differences. If any young people here present live to witness the next half-century, and share in a similar commemoration, we cannot doubt that this drawing together will appear by that date much more decided. In any case there will still be a common bond of unity in the veneration for ever due to the men of 1662.

SPEECH BY DR. CROTHERS.

Dr. Crothers said he greatly admired the committee which had made the programme of such a logical character. The first subject announced was the Ejection of 1662. It happened that about three months ago, as the result of a friendly conspiracy on the part of the laymen of his congregation, he was for the space of ten months ejected from his pulpit. He therefore stood there as the ejected of 1912, and he came bearing the friendly greetings of those who ejected him, of the members of his own church, of the Unitarian Association and of the General Conference of the United States and Canada. If he went into any adequate expression of their feelings he should over-run the time allotted to him.

He was tempted to speak of what they were doing over there, of their hope and courage, and of the new national church they were building in the city of Washington—a city which represented better than ever before the national character—the church of the United States, the church whose minister was Chaplain of the United States. They knew that when the days came when the President ceased to be a Unitarian they could have a memorial of the fourth Unitarian President.

It was interesting in Birmingham to recall the man who, after Washington, was looked upon as the greatest of American Presidents, who was the author of the "American Declaration of Independence," Thomas Jefferson, and to remember the connection between him and Priestley. It was largely through his invitation that Priestley had come to America, and the two names were inseparably connected in their national annals. So they (the Americans) had received the ejected of Birmingham as the Conference received the ejected of America. He felt, on further thoughts, it would not be wise for him to indulge in that report of progress in America, and he refrained for one reason. Much as they loved and admired one another, there was a temperamental difference between the Englishman and the American when they talked about what they were doing. It was the temptation of the Englishman never to overstate things. The Americans, on the other hand, had not the fault of understating things. There was another characteristic to be taken into account before they could understand one another. "When you report, you report on last year's work; when we report, we report on next year's work." They were full of a sublime consciousness of what was going to happen. He would draw their attention to a fact in the book of Nehemiah. Telling of the work he was doing in the city of Jerusalem, Nehemiah says, "Now the city was great and large, but the people were few therein, and the houses were not builded." He would suggest to the higher critics that Nehemiah was an American. This characteristic was not a newly developed feature. It was the result of the climate, and not of the desire to be boastful. Some months ago he had been going through a Western State and had stayed in different towns, and at each town he was assured that there was something there which was the "biggest in the world." He had come at length to a little hotel in a little town, where he felt he should have relief from big things. But taking up a sheet of note-paper in the hotel he found at the head, "This is the biggest little hotel in the world." "We are all of us, at the present time," he said, "enthusiastically convinced that the Unitarian denomination is the biggest little denomination in existence."

"I should like to say something on a subject which belongs to us on the other side of the world. The old time church and the old time minister loved peace and practised peace within its own borders, and when it had need of excitement, got up a controversy with its neighbours. Now, every church and every man has many distractions. The characteristic of the present is that suddenly new lights have been turned on, and there are more duties than we can do. We are distracted by the number of things that call upon us urgently." Dr. Crothers said it seemed to him one might write in imitation of Walt Whitman's "Song of Joy" a Song of Duty, embodying among a list of duties, humorously conceived, a song of the citizen's obligation to see that every other citizen did his duty, and a song of the duty of the modern minister to know what he is talking about. "But duty collides with duty. Just in proportion as we see the variety and multiplicity of modern life, do we need to get strength and patience and common sense, and, above all, a saving sense of humour, to do our tasks cheerfully and well. We see the manifoldness of life. We feel its infinite variety. And we come to the church for life-giving air." To bring together, as we must, the various duties and lessons of life and blend them in one cheerful, friendly enthusiasm, was the greatest work that that Conference could do.

WOMEN AND WAR.

Mrs. H. D. Roberts, speaking on "War from a Woman's Point of View," said she did not claim to represent all her sex, but thought there was a certain section of women whom she might represent. The forces making for peace had never been so insistent as they were to-day. We had begun to express the case in terms not of right merely, but of reason. It would be the masses of the people who would set their faces and raise their voices against the futilities and wastefulness of war. There was, however, a contrary stream of tendency which had much to answer for. The idea of physical force as the basis of society was held by some. National efficiency, these people told us, depended finally and in the long run upon a state of preparedness for war. But of late years, she observed, women had taken a more prominent and honourable part in the cause of peace. Now the attitudes of women were very various with regard to physical force. There were women to whom the idea of physical force was the very abomination of desolation. There was room for the heroic without war, and in this drama of ours of love and death, which was becoming so increasingly strange and wistful, the physical force argument seemed terribly anachronistic and out of date. She did not question in any way the motives or the self-sacrifice of some of those of her own sex, who had recently been advocating it, but they had reasserted the principle in the very quarter in which men had the right to look for its denial.

The whole method of physical force was wasteful, brutal, barbaric. It did seem as if the poetic and idealistic spirit were becoming more remote from us. To find idealism we had to look back to the "old unhappy, far-off things and battles long ago." To many women, war, as carried on to-day, looked not only demonic but sordid. In the old wars there was a poetic spirit. In the time when Byron wrote war was the very "poetry of politics." But could we, she asked, imagine a Mazzini set in the midst of modern financial warfare? We could not. We no longer pretended to see good behind it. Nowadays, the cry was, "Trade follows the flag." "Efficiency" was the catchword of the present age. That was what we thought about chiefly.

The pacific dreamer was largely woman, who had at her very heart, peace. But she had at present no power, because she had no voice in the affairs of the world. When she really had some voice, so that she could be the helper and inspirer of man, then would dawn the day which would see an end of war as a means of settling human disputes. Every woman possessed a good deal of commonsense, though she was not always credited with it. She would find, Mrs. Roberts thought, that she could not possibly give her voice for the wholesale extinction of life, which she produced, and she would refuse to see any essential glory in the murder of men, whether of only one or of a thousand.

The present age was a wasteful age, which was calling out for a new synthesis of ideals and values, and it might be that before long there would be heard some clarion voice expressing the higher aims to which all would listen, and to which women would reply, "Our life is but a little holding, lent to do a mighty service."

THE CHURCH AND THE CHURCHES.

The Rev. F. K. Freeston said he should speak about "Peace within the Churches." We would do all that in us lay, he said, to promote peace. It was a purely church question. Peace did not exist at present. It had not existed in the past. The history of the past had been a sad one, of wars, conflicts, persecutions, evil, malice, and all kinds of uncharitableness. He passed that by. Let them think the best, and say the best. What was the state of feeling between churches in the midst of which we live? Let them say at once there was far less open enmity than there was even within the remembrance of some of them who looked back only twenty or thirty years. There was lack of cordiality, a great lack of mutual tolerance and co-operation. There was very little spiritual hospitality. There was still great room for improvement. He instanced Birmingham, which had produced many great men, Newman, of the Church of Rome; Shorthouse, a great Anglican; Dale, a great Congregationalist. Were they friends? Did they visit each other? Did each bring to the other true strength? They read each other's works, but they had no personal intercourse with one another. They went their separate ways to eternity. Was that necessary? Why could not they have been on speaking terms?

There was room for improvement in those things. There was tolerance, a truce, a sort of neutrality, but not peace. You never knew in making an advance towards one of a different spiritual household how it would be received. If there was one institution in the sight of God and man of which peace should be the very essence it was the church. If we in these days were not approaching this peace there was something wrong. Did we desire this peace? How should we promote it?

By realising the chief cause of its absence, which lay in the fact of the sharp divisions and the many sectarian rivalries. The ejection had created Nonconformity, and had given rise to numerous sects. The number of sects we had in this country to-day, he said, was a disgrace. He admitted, most readily, that there was not only a large amount, but an increasing amount, of unity of spirit. He admitted that the bonds of peace for which men prayed was a bond which they desired; and yet he felt bound to draw this corollary—that this unity in which they believed remained very much a pious opinion, a pretty sentiment, until they made some effort to give it shape. And he was obliged to say that this bond could not be a bond of peace so long as it was made a bond of dogma. The difficulty, therefore, was a very real one. It lay with them to make some practical attempt to give that unity shape, and to make that bond of such a character that unity could live in it. There was no hope in crying peace when there was no peace, or in facing the lack of it in a light-hearted manner; he did not see any hope in the deprecation of church controversy. They wanted more controversy, but controversy of a different kind, a controversy fair-minded and just, a controversy which was as anxious to see the position of an opponent as to justify one's own.

There was no hope, either, in any paper unity. Unity was born, not made. There was no hope in undoing history, though he confessed he was longing for the time to come when they should get the repeal of the Act of Uniformity. If they were to treat this matter wisely, it seemed to him their hopes could only lie in following the facts and forces of our own day, facts like the claim of the great historic churches. It was increasingly difficult for the orthodox man now to maintain the reason for his difference from the rest. All the different church systems had claimed divine warrant. But we knew that Peter was not a Roman Catholic, and that Paul was not an Episcopalian, though he was bound to admit that Thomas was an Independent. The new conception of religious solidarity would pass into the church. The rise of democracy had shown, it seemed to him, our inefficiency in the face of great national and moral issues. What we wanted was a great deal more ecclesiastical collectivism. Unity could not, and must not, mean uniformity, identity, or even similarity. It was not something against diversity, but something depending on it. "Our problem," he concluded, "is an old one. Under new conditions to find how to secure a unity of affection and love and reverence in which men may worship and pray, while realising and admitting the essential differences of theology, and that outside the church peace is impossible. This Conference was started primarily with the idea of increasing the unity of the free churches. It is going to succeed even more in the future than in the past."

INTERNATIONAL PEACE.

Mr. Fred Maddison said:—"In speaking of the subject of international peace in such a gathering as this it is impossible to omit one word as to the record of the churches. If it is omitted here it is never omitted from the indictment of the churches by those who are opposed to them. We had better admit the truth that the churches have made more wars than they have ever prevented; that even to-day an army's banners can be blessed, no matter what is the object of that army, whether it is to destroy tyrants or to destroy freedom. During war the churches are too often of the earth, earthy. They think of the success of their own armies, regardless of the justice of the dispute. One says this with pain, but not without hope, because of late years there has been vast improvement in this direction. But religion is higher than the churches, and knows no racial barriers. We who believe in God do feel that this cause of international peace rests on the abiding foundation of the oneness of mankind in the divine unity, and that the bedrock of this movement, as of all efforts to bless humanity, is religion, holy, spiritual, free."

Mr. Maddison pointed out that there were one or two menaces which threaten international peace. First, there was the press. It would be a great injustice to make a wholesale indictment of the press, because it would not be true, but it must be admitted that there was a section of the press, and by no means a small section, that was a standing danger to goodwill between the nations. The most serious mis-statements were made in certain papers, which increased their circulation, and although these could be corrected on the following day, the mischief was already done. People read the inflammatory piece of news, and often forgot, or did not believe, the subsequent refutation.

The second menace was military professionalism. He had no patience with any man who attacked the character of our soldiers. The British soldier was a brave man. He was as brave as a miner. But militarism was a standing menace. The desire for international peace, which they wished to oppose to it, was not mere sentiment, but the highest statesmanship. They did not want to hear that peace people "mean well," for that was no compliment and means nothing. "But," the speaker continued, "I suggest that there is nothing so practical as the substitution of arbitration for war. The willingness to submit to arbitration does not mean that we are indifferent to our country's interest. I love my country; but that is no reason why I should hate somebody else's. I say candidly, you cannot get rid of force; but you can use it well or you can use it badly. Now arbitration puts force where it should be, and reason and law where they should be and that constitute the plea for sanity of the peace movement."

Mr. Maddison referred to the fact that the President of the United States had been the first to commit himself and his Government to unrestricted arbitration, and concluded with an appeal to the people of a liberal religious faith to do their best by pressing upon their day and generation that all the safety of the country and all that made a people great could be conserved within the realm of law and international peace.

The Medici Prints

as published by The Medici Society, founded in 1908, aim at reproducing in the most accurate facsimile possible not only the colour but all the detail of drawing and composition in selected Works by the great Masters of Painting at prices low enough to bring the Prints within the reach of all purses. Infinite patience and care in selection and correction, aided by the latest developments of modern scientific photography, have resulted in the publication of a series of Prints which as faithful scientific reproductions have not yet been surpassed.

AMONG THE EARLIEST PUBLICATIONS TO APPEAR IN 1912 ARE :

Plate No.		Plate No.
Italian XXXVIII.	Cima da Conegliano: The Presentation in the Temple (Dresden). 20½ × 27¾ in. 25s. [Now Ready.	English XVIII.	Reynolds: Miss Ridge (Tennant Collection). 19 × 16½ in. 15s. [Now Ready.
Italian LI.	P. della Francesca: The Madonna, Child, and Angels (Christ Church, Oxford). 24 × 15½ in. 30s. (Edition limited to 500 copies.) [April.	N.P.S. VIII.	L. F. Abbott: Horatio, Viscount Nelson (National Portrait Gallery). 19¼ × 16 in. 15s. [Now Ready.
Italian XLIII.	Filippino Lippi: An Angel Adoring (National Gallery). 17¼ × 8 in. 10s. 6d. [Now Ready.	N.P.S. VII.	F. Quesnel: A Lady of the Court of Mary Queen of Scots (Althorp Park). 18½ × 14¾ in. *25s. (Edition limited to 500 copies.) [Shortly.
Italian XXXII.	Raphael: S. George with the Garter (Hermitage). 11 × 8¼ in. 15s. [April.	Flemish XXVI.	Jan Steen: "Youth or Age?" (Hermitage). 19 × 15 in. 25s. [Now Ready.
Italian L	Guido Reni: The Youth of the Virgin (Hermitage). 17¾ × 25½ in. 25s. [Now Ready.	French XIII.	Greuze: A Boy with a Lesson Book (Edinburgh). 18 × 14 in. *15s. [Shortly.
English XVII.	Gainsborough: Miss Hippley (Tennant Collection). 19 × 15½ in. 15s. [Now Ready.	French III.	Vigée - Lebrun: Mother and Daughter (Louvre). 19 × 15½ in. *17s. 6d. [Immediately.
English XXIII.	Raeburn: Mrs. Scott Moncrieff (Edinburgh). 19 × 15½ in. *17s. 6d. [April. * Obtainable at reduced prices before publication.	German VI.	Dürer: Christ Crucified (Dresden). 7½ × 6¼ in. 15s. [Now Ready. Postage extra, 6d. per print.

AMONG THE NOTABLE PRINTS ALREADY PUBLISHED ARE :

Plate No.		Plate No.
Italian VIII.	Botticelli: The Birth of Venus (Uffizi). 21½ × 35¼ in. 30s.	N.P.S. X.	Whistler: Portrait of Thomas Carlyle (Glasgow). 19 × 15½ in. 17s. 6d.
Italian XXIII.	Correggio: The Education of Cupid (National Gallery). 25¼ × 14¾ in. 20s.	Flemish XXII.	J. Van Eyck: Travelling Altarpiece of Charles V. (Dresden). 14 × 25½ in. 25s. (Also supplied without "reverse" figures, 22s. 6d.)
Italian XXXV.	Giorgione: Judith (Hermitage). 25¼ × 11¾ in. 20s.	Flemish XV.	Rembrandt: The Sweeping Girl (S. Petersburg). 25½ × 21½ in. 25s.
Italian XLV.	Filippo Lippi: The Holy Family (Uffizi). 20 × 13¾ in. 17s. 6d.	English V.	Gainsborough: The Painter's Daughters (S. Kensington). 13½ × 20½ in. 15s.
Italian XXI.	D. di Michelino: Dante and his Book (Florence). 20 × 25 in. 25s.	English VI.	Raeburn: A Boy with a Rabbit (Burlington House, Dip. Gal.). 24 × 18½ in. 25s.
Italian XXXVII.	Raphael: The Sistine Madonna (Dresden). 38 × 27¾ in. 40s.	English XIV.	Reynolds: The Age of Innocence (National Gallery). 18 × 15 in. 12s. 6d.
Italian XXX.	A. di Predis: Beatrice d'Este. (Milan). 20¼ × 13¼. 15s.	English III.	Romney: Lady Hamilton with a Goat (Cranbury Park). 25 × 20 in. 25s.
Italian II.	L. da Vinci: Head of the Christ (Milan). 13 × 10 in. 12s. 6d.	N.P.S. II.	Unknown Painter: William Shakespeare (Stratford-on-Avon). 17¼ × 13¼ in. 15s.
German II.	Holbein: Georg Gisz (Berlin). 19¼ × 17 in. 25s.	French VI.	Liotard: The Chocolate Girl (Dresden). 26½ × 16¾ in. 17s. 6d.

Postage extra, 6d. per Print.

THE NATIONAL PORTRAIT SERIES.

THE POPULAR MEDICI PRINTS (price 6s. each).

Fully Illustrated Lists of these Series may be had post free on request.

THE MEDICI SOCIETY'S PROSPECTUS—containing full particulars of all prints published and in preparation for 1912, with 170 miniature illustrations—post free for 6d. stamps. Summary List of The Medici Prints, post free. Catalogue of DRAWINGS BY THE OLD MASTERS, reproduced in facsimile colours or tints—with many illustrations, 6d. post free. Catalogue of 6,500 SHILLING CARBOPRINTS from the great Galleries of Europe—with illustrations, crown 8vo., 250 pp., 2s. post free. Special Lists of the National Portraits Series, Popular Medici Prints, "O.M.C." Miniature Old Masters in Colour (price 1s. each)—all or any post free. The Prints may be inspected (free, daily, 10-6), at—

THE MEDICI SOCIETY'S GALLERIES, 7, Grafton Street, W.

MINISTERS AT THE CONFERENCE.

The Revs. J. W. Austin, A. R. Andreae, T. Anderson, A. Amey, W. E. Atack, D. Agate, Jos. Anderton, H. Austin.

J. C. Ballantyne, K. Bond, W. T. Bushrod, J. S. Burgess, W. H. Burgess, S. Burrows, J. M. Bass, J. Shaw Brown, T. F. M. Brockway, O. Binns, W. C. Bowie, Dr. Beckh.

R. N. Cross, Dr. J. E. Carpenter, G. Cooper, W. G. Cadman, B. C. Constable, H. Chellew, W. J. Cock, Dr. S. M. Crothers, W. J. Clarke.

Rudolf Davis, V. D. Davis, W. H. Drummond, A. H. Dolphin, Dr. James Drummond, H. Dawtrey, J. Park Davies, W. T. Davies, H. E. Dowson, T. Dunkerley, J. D. Davies, J. G. Davies.

D. J. Evans, G. Evans, Dr. Ewart, W. H. Eastlake, Prof. Eerdmans, John Ellis, E. D. Priestley Evans, D. Delta Evans.

G. A. Ferguson, F. K. Freeston, T. M. Falconer, Edgar I. Fripp.

Henry Gow, T. Graham, W. E. George, Dr. Griffiths, Dr. Cyril Greaves, T. A. Gorton, A. Golland.

H. W. Hawkes, A. M. Holden, Jas. Harwood, H. E. Haycock, W. C. Hall, A. Hall, Fred Hall, A. C. Holder, C. Hargrove, E. R. Hodges, F. Holt, P. Holt, A. Hurn, P. M. Higginson, J. Hipperson, W. Harrison, Dr. G. D. Hicks, E. S. Hicks.

T. J. Jenkins, Dr. W. T. Jones, T. L. Jones, N. J. H. Jones, Simon Jones, J. I. Jones, F. H. Jones, J. F. Jones, L. P. Jacks, R. C. Jones.

H. W. King, G. Knight, R. M. King.

W. H. Lambelle, B. Lister, E. W. Lummis, R. H. Lambley.

J. H. Miskimmin, J. S. Mathers, J. McCleery, H. McLachlan, J. Moore, Dr. S. Mellor, E. Morgan, T. Munn, J. M. Mills, J. McDowell, P. Moore, R. H. Maister, W. B. Matthews, Dr. Mellone, F. B. Mott.

J. H. M. Nolan.

Dr. J. E. Odgers, A. E. O'Connor, R. J. Orr.

W. J. Pond, W. J. Phillips, H. E. Perry, J. H. Pearson, C. E. Pike, C. Peach, A. E. Parry, W. W. C. Pope, E. H. Pickering, J. C. Pollard, W. G. Price, W. J. Piggott, G. L. Phelps, G. Pegler, G. A. Payne.

H. J. Rossington, W. H. Rose, E. S. Russell, H. D. Roberts, R. S. Redfern, J. Ruddle, H. Rylett, M. Rowe, C. Roper.

J. H. Short, H. F. Short, L. Short, W. Short, C. J. Street, S. H. Street, G. Street, J. E. Stronge, A. L. Smith, H. S. Solly, T. P. Spedding, J. H. Smith, E. W. Sealy, F. Summers, G. B. Stallworthy, W. Stephens, G. J. Slipper, A. C. Smith, H. B. Smith, M. K. Schermerhorn (U.S.A.), W. R. Shanks, H. H. Shelley, R. Smyth, W. L. Schroeder, J. H. Shaw, H. B. Smith.

H. S. Tayler, E. L. H. Thomas, W. J. B. Tranter, S. Thompson, Dr. Thackray, C. Travers, W. T. Turland, A. Thornhill, J. Toye, W. J. Topping, W. L. Tucker, J. M. Ll Thomas, G. W. Thompson, W. G. Tarrant, L. Tavener, H. R. Tavener.

Gertrud von Petzold, E. A. Voysey, F. H. Vaughan.

C. M. Wright, J. J. Wright, G. Ward, Joseph Wood, J. Wilson, W. Whitaker, D. J. Williams, W. A. Weatherall, P. H. Wicksteed, W. E. Williams, H. Warnock, M. Watkins, C. A. Wing (U.S.A.), J. Worthington, I. Wrigley.

The list of delegates and friends includes the following:—

Messrs. W. G. Armstead (Lancaster), Albery (Horsham), W. Andrews (Bournemouth), W. Bailly (Hampstead), B. P. Burroughs (Liverpool), J. W. Barlow (Bury), E. B. Broadrick (Dukinfield), F. D. Bowles (Hackney), A. Barnes (Acton), W. Belfield (Ashton), Miss Blake (Ilminster), Harold Bailly (London).

H. G. Chancellor, M.P., Mrs. Cogan Conway (Ringwood), E. Capleton (London), D. Campbell (Kidderminster), W. Cheshire (Birmingham), W. Carter (Poole), A. Crompton (Rivington), J. Chadwick (Sale), A. Carter (Cheltenham), R. S. Chambers (Shrewsbury), J. R. Cameron (Accrington), H. T. Cooper (Leicester), J. E. Chattaway (Leicester), E. Carlier (London), J. J. Coleman (Birmingham), J. Cotton (Birmingham).

John Dendy (Manchester), M. Devellan (Kidderminster), D. J. Davis (Aberystwyth), W. J. Dowse (Nottingham), P. J. Daniell (Liscard), J. P. Duffield (Small Heath).

R. Edmunds (Birmingham).

H. T. Facon (Nottingham).

A. Gregory (Blackburn), C. Gresswell (Wandsworth).

E. Hill (Warwick), A. G. Hopkins, B. Hepworth (Kidderminster), H. C. Horsley (Gloucester), W. Hall (Clifton), Charles Hawksley (London), Lawrence Holt, Lawrence Hall (Liverpool), T. Hamer (Chowbent), W. J. Hoad (Horsham), A. Hudson (Chatham), Alderman Hingley (Cradley), W. E. Harris (Wolverhampton), J. Highfield (Kidderminster), J. S. Harding (Tarnworth), B. C. Hare (London), O. E. Heys.

J. Jackson (Chorley), W. Johnson (Hinckley), J. W. Jackson (Burnley), D. Jones (Lampeter), H. T. Jephcott (Oldbury).

R. Kay (Bury).

T. O. Lee (Birmingham), T. H. Lee (Bolton), B. Lewis (Richmond), G. H. Leigh (Monton), L. Lloyd (Kingswood).

F. Maddison, C. J. McKisack (Belfast), G. Massey (Moseley), C. Mantell (Preston), G. Mead (Northampton), F. W. Monks (Warrington), F. S. Mace (Tenterden), J. S. Mackie (Burnley), J. Mawson (Darlington), W. Moss (Loughborough), G. Mabbs (Small Heath), W. Middleton (Birmingham).

H. New (Birmingham), G. New (Evesham), W. Noble (Bolton), A. Nicholson (Hale).

R. Phillipson, W. F. Price, Lieut-Gen. Phelps (Birmingham), J. W. Pinkerton (Ballymoney), S. Peet (Congleton), W. Pillars (Moseley), J. Partington (Oldham), J. S. Pinnock (Newport, I.W.), A. G. Parkes (Kingswood), Ion Pritchard, (London).

Hans Renold (Hale), F. Robinson (Liverpool), Aldermen Royce, T. Rigby (Chesham), L. G. Rylands (Manchester), L. Redfern (Manchester), W. Robinson (Garston), T. F. Robinson (Pendleton), Hugh Rathbone (Liverpool), B. Royce (Mansfield), E. Robinson (Mossley).

W. H. Stephenson (Sheffield), W. H. Sutcliffe (Chorley), W. B. Speight (Oxford), John Sale (Northampton), J. W. Smith (Sheffield), O. Shimmin (Bury St. Edmund's), A. M. Stevens (Norwich), W. H. Scott (Bournemouth), W. G. Smith (Evesham), J. Sagar (Halifax), T. M. Salmon (Shifnal).

W. Tasker (Chester), E. E. Tarnley (Birmingham), A. S. Thew (Southport), Grosvenor Talbot (Leeds), W. S. Teasdale (Wolverhampton), W. S. Tayler (London), R. N. Tait (Gateshead), A. H. Varian (Dublin), T. F. Ward (Middlesbrough), W. Winbury (Kidderminster), G. W. R. Wood (Manchester), M. Warrington (Hyde), H. Wardle (Liverpool), G. Worrall (Congleton), J. G. Wakeham (Plymouth), J. Wigley (Pendleton), J. H. White (Mansfield), W. H. J. Winstanley (Stockport), A. Webster (Accrington), J. Willmot (Yarmouth), F. Wooley (Gee Cross), H. L. Wrigley (Lye), A. W. Whitehead (London), S. S. Woollaston (Birmingham), R. Williams (Warrington), and R. D. Williams.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

Annual Meeting.

THE annual meeting of the National Conference Union for Social Service was held at the Church of the Messiah Schools on Wednesday at 5.30. The Rev. P. H. Wicksteed was in the chair, Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., the President, being unfortunately prevented from attending, and the room was filled to overflowing. Miss Gittins explained that the Rev. R. P. Farley, joint secretary with her, was also unable to attend, as he had lately been out of health and was now taking a holiday.

Having read the minutes, which were passed, Miss Gittins presented the sixth annual report; the chief points of public interest appeared in our columns last week.

The financial statement was presented by Mr. Chas. Weiss.

Mr. Wicksteed, in moving the adoption of the report and the Treasurer's statement, said that when this union was started the impression made upon him personally was very strong that they had a quite exceptional amount of ability and zeal, trained skill and social, even technical, knowledge in almost every branch of social service in their community waiting to be utilised. It seemed that all this ability and zeal and information ought to be co-ordinated and made into a sort of ganglion that could collect, organise, and distribute knowledge and enthusiasm for the felt needs of their time. There was an obvious necessity for the formation of a more thoughtful and educated public opinion than that born of the agitating propaganda of this or that person who had got a panacea, and who was apt by and by to think more of his formula than of his cause. They hoped that they might tend to make their churches centres of this educated and tested public opinion, which would not wait for an election, or require to be stirred into activity by vote-catching party cries. They hoped, also, that they might make it felt that the country cared for those fellow-subjects in different parts of the world who were as yet inarticulate and unrepresented, and that there might be something in their midst corresponding to the record of the Quakers, out of which have arisen "concerns," as they are called, for righteousness or reform, that with clear, definite organisations pushed themselves forward, and made themselves felt until somebody took

More About "Annuities and Their Uses."

HOW TO COVER LOSSES ON CONSOLS AND SIMILAR SECURITIES.

The article entitled "Annuities and Their Uses," which appeared in these columns on February 3, proved to have a good deal of interest for INQUIRER readers, and many of them have given evidence of their interest in a practical way. Sir L— J— sent his cheque to the Sun Life Assurance Co. of Canada for £2,630 for an annuity of £500 per annum for his mother, Lady J—, aged 80. Sir T— A—, aged 68, with slightly impaired health, invested £10,000 a few days ago, and secured an annuity of £1,528 per annum, payable quarterly, and is arranging for a similar amount for Lady A—, his wife.

Many others are negotiating annuities for smaller or larger amounts.

The Advantage of Prompt Action.

Some of our correspondents have expressed their intention of making a purchase as soon as they can dispose of their Consols and similar securities to better advantage than at present. We would point out to such that the best way to make up their losses on these securities is to sell them at once and invest the proceeds in an immediate annuity. Thus suppose a male 65 years of age has £10,000 in Consols. He could at present sell out for £7,900. This would purchase him an annuity in the Sun of Canada of £882 8s., payable half-yearly, instead of the £250 income from his Consols. In one year he has made up over 6 points. In three years he is as well off as if he had held his Consols and they had risen to par. Who expects they will reach par in three years, or even ten?

The Purchase of an Annuity is Simplicity Itself.

Many of our readers are surprised to find what a simple transaction the purchase of an annuity is. It can be carried out in five minutes. You simply hand in to the Sun Life Assurance Co. of Canada a short proposal form with your cheque and proof of age, and are handed the bond in exchange—no brokers' commission, no stamp duty, no legal or other expenses. The receiving of the annuity instalments is even simpler. You need never put your pen to paper. We send your banker a cheque on the Bank of England, asking him to place the amount to your credit if he knows you to be alive. Is there any other investment that will give you so little trouble or anxiety?

A Word of Warning to Avoid Confusion.

Just a word of caution to our readers regarding the name of the Sun Life Assurance Co. of Canada. There are other companies with names somewhat similar. The great Annuity Company is the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada, known for short as the "Sun Life of Canada." This is one of the strongest financial institutions in the British Empire, with funds of nearly £9,000,000 profitably invested under Government supervision, and increasing £1,000,000 yearly. The income is over £2,300,000, and the surplus over and above all liabilities is £1,000,000. In speaking of the "Sun Life of Canada," please remember both ends of the name, "Sun" and "Canada."

Innumerable Methods of Applying Annuities.

The contingencies under which the provisions of an annuity may be applied are almost without number, and yet are simple and practicable in the extreme. A few more examples are given here which will illustrate the benefits and advantages to be derived from investing in the Sun Life of Canada.

A Wise Father.

A father, 69 years of age, had a son of 27 in law, and one of 29 in medicine. Both were struggling to build up a practice in London. The father realised that his boys were now more in need of financial assistance than they would be in later years, and after he had passed away. But his income, about £400 a year, derived from investments of £12,000, was just sufficient to meet his own requirements. If he gave his sons any of the capital, he proportionately reduced his income. He solved the difficulty by purchasing an annuity of £400, payable £100 a quarter. This cost him about £3,184 of his capital. The balance of £8,816, he divided equally between his sons, enabling the Doctor to move to Harley-street and the Lawyer to secure a remunerative partnership. Both are now doing well, and the father has the same income as before without the worry about investments. He has the satisfaction of having helped his sons to prosperity at a time when they most needed it, and of actually seeing the benefits resulting from his help. Is this not a better way than holding on till death?

Guaranteed Return of Capital.

Some purchasers who are desirous of providing for others by a return of part of their capital in the event of their own early death, have carried out the transaction as follows:—

A female, 54, deposits £1,000 and secures an annuity of £68 4s., payable half-yearly, and guaranteed 10 years. That is, the instalments are payable as long as she lives, but they will be continued for 10 years if she should die before the expiration of that period.

A male, 64 years of age, for £2,000 secures an annuity of £178 16s. on the same plan.

A female, 60, for £2,000, secures an annuity of £120 16s., but guaranteed for 20 years.

A male, 59, for £1,000, is granted on the same plan £64 10s.

Return of Purchase Money.

Here is another favourite example, showing how the purchaser of an annuity can protect the balance of the capital which he pays for that annuity in case he should die before his annuity instalments equal the amount of the purchase money.

A male, 68 years of age, for each £1,000 of purchase money, secures an annuity of £93. Should he die before his annuity instalments equal the amount of purchase money, the balance is at once paid to his executors or any beneficiary he may have named.

A male, 80, on the same plan, would secure an annuity of about £130 per £1,000, and a female of 80, £122 6s. annually.

Deferred Annuities.

A few examples are given here to show the amount of money which would be paid out in annual instalments by the person insured in order to secure an annuity for the rest of his or her life, commencing at a stated age.

In order to secure an annuity of £100 a year from the age of 55 till death, a male, 45 years of age, would pay 10 annual payments of £101 1s., or a lump sum of £810 14s. Similarly for £100 a year, beginning at 55, a female, 45 years of age, would pay 10 annual sums of £110 9s., or a lump sum of £887 8s.

A male, 30, for a single payment of £272

17s., or an annual payment of £16 7s., would secure an annuity of £100 a year, beginning at 60.

A Wife's Reward.

To secure a sure and definite income for life for his wife is the aim of every right-thinking man.

By ordinary methods this is not an easy thing to do. Assuming that money is worth 4 per cent., it would require a capital of £2,500 to yield an income of £100 a year. But one may never live long enough to get that amount together, or if one does there is always the possibility that the result of years of labour may vanish in so many weeks through bad investments. So that, after all your careful saving, your wife may still find herself penniless.

There is only one absolutely safe way.

We give here one or two examples, showing how, by means of the Sun Life of Canada, a husband can make certain provision for his wife and children should they survive him.

A husband, 30 (wife the same age) could secure her £100 a year should she survive him by an annual payment of £23 12s.

If the ages were 40 the annual payment required would be £29 10s., or if 50 £39 17s.

A male, 40, wife the same age, for a deferred annuity of £100 a year beginning at 60 would pay £73 12s. annually. Should he not reach that age the annuity will at once become payable to his wife. Thus, as long as either may live £100 a year is assured, the Company guaranteeing not less than 20 payments in any event.

The time is coming when annuities of this kind will largely take the place of the old form of life assurance. It is a more direct way of securing what is aimed at; that is a "provision" which should mean an income for wife or children.

Have You an Estate

You may combine a single payment life policy with the purchase of an annuity in such a way that your estate will receive back more than the purchase-money at your death, and you will yourself draw 4 per cent. per annum on the outlay, payable half-yearly during your life. This cannot be obtained from any other company. It is an excellent way of providing for estate duties, as the amount may be made payable direct to the Inland Revenue Authorities before probate of will.

Invalids.

Very few companies grant better terms to an invalid than to a healthy person of the same age. The Sun of Canada grants a large annuity according to the degree of impairment. For example, a lady, 59, was for £2,500 given an annuity of £750 (30 per cent.). The ordinary rate for a healthy female of that age is a little over 12 per cent.

All Enquiries are Confidential and are Answered Fully.

The space available will barely allow us to give INQUIRER readers a thousandth part of the different kinds of annuities, and old age pensions, which can be arranged through the Sun Life of Canada, but inquirers are always given full particulars, their communications being treated as confidential, and answered to the best of our ability. Enquirers should send the date of birth and the nature of the provision they wish to make to the Company at the Head Office for the United Kingdom, namely, 34, Canada House, Norfolk-street, Strand. Where it is doubtful as to just what kind of annuity or investment will best meet a particular case, a short explanation of the circumstances will elicit our best advice. Whereas we wish it to be clearly understood that an inquiry places the writer under no obligation, our large correspondence compels us at the same time to request that no inquiries shall be made from mere curiosity. We trust to return to the absorbing subject of "Annuities and their Uses" later.

J. F. JUNKIN, Manager, Sun Life Assurance Co. of Canada, 34, Canada House, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C.

P.S.—As to the financial strength of the Sun Life of Canada, see the insurance article in The Standard of March 2.

up the banner and urged the movement on. After six years, Mr. Wicksteed continued, they had to confess that as far as the realisation of their aspirations was concerned they came before the present meeting empty-handed. Why? They of the liberal faith were a strange people, a mystery to each other, and to those who came amongst them. Yet he would say that even if they could do no better than they had done he would still urge the society to go on, and remain proud of being the first President, for certain things had happened in the way they did happen among the members of their fellowship without their expecting them to happen. There had come about a great united movement on the part of the Social Service Societies of all the great churches, organised on a national scale, with a Bishop as the President, and it was because of what they had been doing quietly that this wider sphere had been entered upon. He hoped as many as possible would attend the Summer School at Swanwick in June. The previous gatherings had resulted in a new feeling of hope and elasticity, and if there was a decline of belief in regard to panaceas, or intellectual abstract formulæ, there had been a wonderful revival in hope and faith. They were determined to face the risk of serious experiments, and if they failed in one line they would try another, every failure being a step to something better. In moving the adoption of the report, therefore, he wished to say that, in spite of its apparent meagreness, and the disproportion between their aims and achievements, he rejoiced that the Society was being continued, and he believed it would produce good fruit and help in its way to establish the kingdom of God.

The Rev. J. C. Street seconded the resolution, which was passed unanimously.

The Rev. W. J. B. Tranter moved a resolution of cordial thanks to the officers, especially mentioning Miss Gittins, to whom they owed a large debt of gratitude. Although he knew they were living in critical times, as the report stated, he was greatly encouraged as he carried on his missionary work in Birmingham by the efforts of the society, and he wished them God speed.

The Rev. V. D. Davis said he was glad to second the resolution because he had had the privilege of taking part in two summer schools, and everybody who had been there knew that if the Society did nothing else it was thoroughly worth while. But it was a lamentable thing that it did not gather in more supporters. If they wanted to make their religion vital to-day it could only be achieved in doing such work as this, which was truly their way of salvation. They were grateful to those who had called them into the Social Service Union, and they owed more thanks than they could express to the President for the encouragement he had given them. The resolution was carried.

The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, chairman of the Executive Committee, said that the best thanks of the Union were due to Miss Lucy Gardner, hon. secretary of the Inter-Denominational Conference of Social Service Unions, for the extremely interesting exhibition illustrating the needs and methods of social service and social study which she had arranged at the cost of much time, thought, and self-sacrifice. Their gratitude was also due to the Art Students' Christian Union Missionary Illustrating Department for their kind services in preparing the charts.

This was warmly seconded by Mr. Burgess, and the meeting then terminated.

The officers for the ensuing year are as follows:—

President, J. F. L. Brunner, Esq., M.P.; Vice-presidents, W. Phipson Beale, Esq., K.C., M.P., Sir W. B. Bowring, Bart, Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, M.A., LL.D., Rev J. E. Carpenter, M.A., D.Litt., H. G. Chancellor, Esq., M.P., Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A., Rev. James Drummond, M.A., LL.D., Henry P. Greg, Esq., M.A., John Harrison, Esq., Philip H. Holt, Esq., Richard D. Holt, Esq., M.P., Rev. L. P. Jacks, M.A., Prof. Sir Henry Jones, LL.D., C. Sydney Jones, Esq. M.A., W. Byng Kenrick, Esq., B.A., Rev. S. H. Mellone, M.A., D.D., R. Robinson, Esq., Prof. F. E. Weiss, D.Sc., F.L.S., Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, M.A. Treasurer, C. Weiss, Esq. Joint secretaries, Miss Catharine Gittins, Rev. J. S. Burgess. Executive Committee, Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas (chairman), Mr. W. J. Clarke, Rev. Dr. Tudor Jones, Dr. Lionel Tayler, Mr. Harrop White, Mr. J. Waters, Rev. R. P. Farley.

EXHIBITION OF SOCIAL NEED, SOCIAL SERVICE, AND SOCIAL STUDY.

The interesting and extremely instructive Exhibition, arranged by Miss Gardner on the ground floor of the Church of the Messiah Schools, was visited during the Conference by many people, whose chief regret was that time did not permit of an exhaustive study of the valuable charts, photographs, books, pamphlets, and objects illustrating the dangers of certain trades and the iniquities of sweating which were displayed. To those who may not have given much previous thought to the social needs of our time, except in the way of a vague and unorganised sympathy for the poor, a great awakening must have come as they passed from court to court in this stimulating exhibition. We know, as a matter of fact, that the haunting horror of the pictures representing tiny babies suffering from malnutrition could not be shaken off by some—and not all of them women!—who had been made to realise for the first time how the lack of proper food and care in infancy works out in stunted and distorted bodies, and every kind of abnormality that can darken the shadows of the prison-house for the growing child. Scarcely less suggestive were the bunches of artificial flowers bearing labels from which we learnt that “the rate paid is 3d. a gross, 5 to 6 gross in 12 hours, weekly earnings about 7s., retail price, 2s. 9d. per gross.” Books dealing with eugenics, hygiene, social ethics, and practical housing bounded, and all that was required, as Miss Gardner pointed out in an interesting leaflet, to drive the lessons of this Exhibition home was “a little imagination and a little knowledge.” We hope this was supplied by all who visited it.

MINISTERS' PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

THE third Triennial Meeting of the donors, subscribers and beneficiary members of the Fund was held in Birmingham on Thursday evening, April 18, the Rev. Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter presiding. The reports, as published, for the years 1909, 1910, and 1911, and the summarised triennial report, as presented to the Conference, were adopted. A resolution was passed asking the managers to consider the desirability of publishing in the reports a list of the beneficiary members. The four retiring managers, the Rev. Dr. Carpenter, Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke, Mr. John Harrison, and the Rev. H. J. Rossington, were re-elected for a further term of nine years. A vacancy on the board caused by the resignation of Mr. Henry Lupton, was filled by the appointment of Mr. Robert Blake, who will serve for six years. The auditors, Mr. R. Mortimer Montgomery and Dr. C. Herbert Smith, were re-elected. Thanks were accorded to the Birmingham Committee for the use of the room and to Dr. Carpenter for presiding.

REPORT.

The Report of the Board of Managers presented to the National Conference was as follows:—

The number of policies in operation has risen during the last triennial period from 97 to 102, of which six have matured, two ministers being already in receipt of their annuities, and four more becoming entitled to theirs during the present year. Of these policies 59 are for both pension and insurance, 43 for pension only. Several policies have been re-assigned, without deduction, to ministers who had ceased to fulfil the conditions required by the Fund.

Three beneficiaries, unfortunately, died during the period under review. In the case of one who was insured under Table A, and of another insured under Table B, nothing was payable to the deceased's estate, as the insurance was for pension only, without allowance for premiums paid, and neither minister had attained the age of 65 years. The third was insured under Table G, which brought payment of £278 15s. to his representatives.

Assistance is given to four ministers who have insured otherwise than under the ordinary tables, for special reason in each case.

Two aged ministers are in receipt of small annuities from the Fund, to supplement other sources of income which enabled them to retire. Another minister was assisted in the same way for a short period, but, his circumstances having improved, he surrendered the annuity. A promised grant to a fourth minister in case of his retirement was not called upon, as he died at his post, full of years.

The annual subscription list, which originally stood at £313 2s., and for security's sake should be maintained at a level of at least £300, had gradually fallen, through death and other unavoidable causes, to such an extent that it became necessary to make a special effort to reinstate it. By the personal efforts of the managers this has been brought up to £297 7s. 7d., which includes the substantial sum of £64 12s. 7d. from 39 congregations—a fact which the Board particularly welcomes.

The capital of the Fund now stands at £25,701 11s. 3d.

The treasurer, Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke, 102, Bishopsgate, London, E.C., will be glad to receive new donations or annual subscriptions.

C. J. STREET,
Hon. Secretary.

AN exhibition, arranged by Mr. Herbert New and Mr. Lewis Lloyd, illustrating the history of Unitarianism in Birmingham and the immediate district, was held in the Queen's College Hall, Paradise-street, during the Conference. We hope to give a more detailed account of this next week.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Belfast: All Souls' Church.—For many local and personal reasons the loss of the Titanic has come very closely home to the members of All Souls' Church. On Sunday morning, April 21, a memorial service was held. The preacher was the Rev. G. Leonard Phelps, of Holywood, who made appropriate and sympathetic references to the sad and terrible event. At the close of the sermon, the organist, Mr. Drew Birch, played Beethoven's Funeral March in C.

Birmingham: Hollywood.—The funeral of Miss S. J. Taplin took place at Kingswood Chapel, Hollywood, near Birmingham, on Thursday, April 18. The large attendance of friends and members of the congregation bore eloquent testimony to the affection and respect in which she was held throughout a strenuous life, many years of which were devoted to the service of Kingswood people. The principal mourners were Dr. Taplin (nephew), Mr. Petts (cousin), Mrs. Jolly, Miss Busby, and Miss Carter. The service was conducted by the Rev. T. A. Gorton and the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold. A memorial service was held in the chapel on Sunday morning, conducted by the Rev. T. A. Gorton.

Boston.—Saturday last was a day of general mourning in Boston, consequent on the interment of the late Joseph Cooke. Mr. Cooke, who was in his 55th year, was a highly successful journalist. Beginning life under humble circumstances, he became principal proprietor of the Boston Guardian, and several other newspapers in the county. The Rev. A. G. Peaston officiated at the funeral. A memorial service was held on the Sunday evening.

Doncaster.—We regret to learn that Dr. Duff's large-hearted co-operation in the recent stone-laying at Doncaster has led a number of the Congregational ministers of Sheffield to dissociate themselves from his action, and to sign the following remonstrance with him:—"The undersigned Congregational Ministers of Sheffield feel reluctantly bound to express their deep regret that the warm and impulsive generosity, to which they would pay cordial tribute, of the Rev. Dr. Duff, M.A., of the Yorkshire United College, should have led him to lay a foundation stone of the 'Free Christian Church' under definite Unitarian auspices at Doncaster, seeing that this seems to imply the minor importance of the denial of the Deity of Christ. It should be remembered that Dr. Duff holds an important representative position as professor of a great college, and that his action is likely to make Congregationalists doubtful as to the teaching given to those preparing to be their ministers, it being difficult to understand how he can impress the students with the fundamental difference between Congregationalism and Unitarianism, whilst thus openly endorsing the latter. His action also gravely compromises all Congregationalists as adherents of the Evangelical Faith in the eyes of other Christian communities.—(Signed) E. Harland Brine, T. T. Broad, Thos. Dearlove, Martin J. Ffrench, G. E. German, Duncan Grant, W. A. Guttridge, C. G. Holt, F. Doddridge Humphreys, Walter Lenwood, Moses Perry, Henry Robertshaw, Thomas Warran, and F. W. B. Weeks." The protest is a singular confession of weakness. Men who combine robust conviction with generous Christian sympathies do not feel that their own faith is so easily compromised.

Leeds.—There were large congregations at Mill Hill Chapel last Sunday when the Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., of Boston, U.S.A., preached at both services. In the course of his morning sermon he said that our age was an inspiring one to the truly religious man, because never before had so much of human destiny come within the scope of human effort. If they meant to obey the will of God they needed not only knowledge of the new things, but also a knowledge of all the helps that had come down to them from the past. In that awful calamity which had come to the civilised world during the past week the first thought was the futility of effort, but more wonderful than that was the invention, so recent, by which help came. Such a thing could not have happened in the past but such things would happen still more in the future. Humanity was learning new lessons, and, in the light of them, would repent of its old mistakes. At the close of the service, Chopin's Marche Funebre was rendered by the chapel organist (Mr. Farrer Briggs), in memory of those who had perished in the disaster to the Titanic.

London: Stratford.—The 4th West Ham Troop of Boy Scouts held their first concert on Monday evening, the 22nd inst., in the school-room of the Unitarian Church. A full programme had been arranged, including fire and ambulance drill, signalling, &c. The colours presented in July last had recently been beautifully embroidered with the name of the troop by Mrs. Ellis. The Assistant Scout-master, on behalf of the boys, expressed their gratitude.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual conversazione was held at Mossley on Saturday last. At the evening meeting, the President, Mr. Radcliffe Firth, presided, being supported by Mr. H. J. Broadbent, the President of the Manchester District Sunday School Association, and Mr. A. Slater, the hon. secretary. The President referred in feeling terms to the terrible loss of life through the sinking of the Titanic. He gave a hearty welcome to Mr. Broadbent, who conveyed the greetings of his Association and gave a thoughtful and valuable address upon the present need for Sunday schools and the importance of the work of the teachers. An excellent entertainment followed. Two hundred persons were present.

Nottingham.—An enjoyable performance of Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron" was given in the schools, High Pavement, on the evening of April 18 by the High Pavement Choral Society. The choir acquitted themselves well, and supported by three excellent principals in Miss Edith Shipley, Mr. H. Gutteridge, and Mr. E. Wainer, all members of the Chapel Choir, secured a most pleasing interpretation of the work. The orchestral accompaniments were supplied by a capable band. Mr. T. G. Parkinson accompanied and Mr. Charles Lynn conducted. Three extra items included a "Hindoo Song" sung with excellent taste by Mrs. Griffiths.

Rotherham.—In spite of the fact that the pulpit at the Church of our Father is still vacant, the attendances at the services are well maintained and the various institutions flourishing. The congregation hope that the committee will soon find a suitable successor to Dr. Mellor and the church resume its normal state.

Saffron Walden.—On Tuesday evening, April 16, 1912, a tea party was given to celebrate a threefold concurrence of events in the life of the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, viz., his restoration to some degree of health after his recent critical illness, the golden wedding of himself and Mrs. Brinkworth, and their united birthdays which occurred at Eastertide. The Rev. J. A. and Mrs. Brinkworth were the guests of the evening, Miss Brinkworth and the Rev. and Mrs. J. B. Brinkworth being also present, and, amongst others, the Revs. J. Young and J. Anderson, Messrs. C. A. Tadmán (of Stansted), D. Miller, and E. W. Tanner. The Rev. J. Young took the chair, in place of Mr. Arthur Midgley, J.P., President of the Free Church Council, from whom a cordial letter was read. Mr. Brinkworth concluded the proceedings with a few words of heartfelt gratitude to God and to his people, and to all who had helped with the services during the long period since October, 1911, when he was taken ill.

Sheffield.—The Rev. C. J. Street, of Upper Chapel, Sheffield, having been greatly troubled with his throat during the past winter, has received leave of absence from his congregation for a period of some months. Until Whitsuntide he will be at Rhos, Colwyn Bay, and then goes to Switzerland for three months.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

SHAKESPEARE COMMEMORATION SERVICE AT SOUTHWARK CATHEDRAL.

At the Commemoration Service which was held in Southwark Cathedral on Shakespeare day, April 23, Mr. F. R. Benson gave a very fine address on "Shakespeare and the Fuller Life of the People." Taking a red rose from his coat, and holding it up as he stood at the lectern, the well-known actor described it as the emblem of St. George, of the national poet, and of the whole race. It was, he declared, the symbol of the fulness of Shakespeare's life. Its colour as of blood spoke of atonement and sacrifice, while the strength and suppleness of its stem that can withstand the storm typified our Empire-making race. In Shakespeare he saw one of the greatest of Empire-makers, but his vision of Empire was not exploitation; it was association and expansion. Mr. Benson believed the real brotherhood of man had been brought nearer by the song and poetry of Shakespeare. He pleaded for a new and joyous sense of life, for a reaction from the cold, calm reasoning of the nineteenth century, and appealed from the scientific to the romantic spirit. The heart of the people, he said, was still Elizabethan. This recalls his statement at Stratford-on-Avon, that "the democracy are striking for more poetry as well as for more play."

A PROPAGANDIST PLAY.

In connection with the National Health Week, which is being organised by the Agenda Club, a play in three acts described as "a dramatic pamphlet," by Mrs. J. A. Hobson, will be performed at the King's Hall Theatre on April 30. The play, which is entitled "A Modern Crusader," is the contribution of the National Food Reform Association, and is said by its author to be a study of village life and of home conditions in the country. "Although the surroundings are in some respects better in the country than in the town," she explained to a representative of "Woman's Platform" in the Standard, "one too often meets children in the villages as pale and as sickly as in any London slum, while the state of ugliness, uncleanness, and muddle to which even charming cottages are reduced after a few months' tenancy is enough to drive the landlord with ideals to despair. My little play deals with these 'conditions,' the hero being a young vegetarian doctor who has settled down in a modern English village." Tickets from 5s. downwards can be obtained from the National Food Reform Association, 178, St. Stephen's House, Westminster, to which all proceeds beyond expenses will be given.

DR. BLAKE ODGERS AND THE MIDDLE TEMPLE.

We learn from the Times that an ancient custom which for about 200 years had fallen into disuse was revived at the Middle Temple on Monday, when the Reader of Hilary and Easter terms delivered an evening lecture in the Hall after dinner. The office of Reader in each Inn of Court is of great antiquity, and is held by one of the Masters of the Bench, who in due order of rotation is elected to fill it. In ancient times one of the duties of the Reader was to deliver lectures to the members of the Society, and another was to give them a feast. The former duty for a long time has ceased to be observed, but the latter, in a modified form, has continued. For the present Hilary and Easter terms, the Reader of the Middle Temple is Dr. Blake Odgers, K.C., the well-known Director of Legal Education, and lecturer on law, and he decided, in addition to presiding at his Reader's Feast, to inaugurate a series of lectures of the kind which were formerly given by the Readers.

Ancient formalities, we read, were duly observed. Dinner in Hall took place at 6 p.m., and after dinner, at 7.45 p.m., members of the Inns of Court assembled to hear "Master Reader" deliver his lecture. Among those present were the Treasurer of the Middle Temple (Mr. J. H. Balfour Browne, K.C.), the Right Hon. Sir Samuel Evans, the Master of the Temple, Mr. English Harrison, K.C. (Chairman of the Bar Council), Mr. R. A. McCall, K.C., and Mr. R. D. Muir. There was a large attendance of members, who were most appreciative of the learned Reader's discourse. The subject chosen was "The Legal Quarter of London," and the learned lecturer traced with skill and in the most attractive manner the origin and rise of the four Inns of Court, and the origin, rise, and fall of the not less ancient but less fortunate Inns of Chancery. The lecture was listened to with the closest attention, and at its close a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to the lecturer. It is intended during the present and next term to have four additional lectures, each dealing with the history of one of the Inns of Court.

THE ROMANCE OF WORDS.

The study of philology often yields as many surprises as poetry and romance of which words are the raw material. We are reminded of this anew in glancing through the pages of Mr. Pearsall Smith's little volume on "The English Language" in the Home University Library, which has been published this week. There is, for instance, the word Cross, with all its religious associations. Crux was translated into Anglo-Saxon by the native word rod, which still survives in rood-screen and rood-loft. "Cross is a form borrowed by the Irish from the Latin crux," Mr. Smith tells us, "and spread by them in their great missionary efforts among the Danish populations whom they converted in the north of England. It appears first of all in northern place-names like Crosby, Crosthwaite, &c., and finally makes its way from the northern dialects into literary English. The word cross, therefore, which we employ in so many and often such trivial uses, is a memorial for us of the golden age of Irish civilisation, when Ireland was the great seminary of Europe, whence missionaries travelled to convert and civilise, not only the pagan north of England, but a large part of the Continent as well."

* * *

"The conversion of England," Mr. Smith continues, "meant, however, not only the introduction of a new religion. The flood of Christianity flowed from sources deep in the past of Greece and Asia, and brought with it much of the secular thought and knowledge which it had gathered on its way; and the union of England, moreover, to the universal church opened for our ancestors the door into the common civilisation of Europe. With the Bible came words redolent of the East, like camel, lion, palm, cedar, and terms of drugs and spices, like cassia and hyssop, and myrrh, which was one of the offerings of the Magi to the infant Christ. Gem, too, is a Bible word, and crystal, which our ancestors used not only for the mineral, but for ice as well, as they believed rock-crystal to be a form of petrified ice."

"THE GARDEN OF MANY WATERS."

There was an experiment, both quaint and charming, at the Passmore Edwards Settlement in Tavistock-place, yesterday evening, says the Times of April 23, when the masque, "The Garden of Many Waters," by Miss Alice Buckton, whose name is known in this connection by the morality play of "Eager Heart," was performed by the people of the Settlement and their children from the neighbourhood. It was a very simple allegory, teaching that the source of all good is to be found in the family, along the old lines of the mystery play. First Mr. John Croaker and Mrs. Grundy bemoaned the present age till driven off by the Shepherd and the Weaver, embodying Man and Woman's Work; and then the Spirit of the Hour found the children gardening and questioned them as to their happiness, till the Arts of Man, Commerce, Husbandry, Science, and the like, appeared, but none could tell the source of many waters until the far-off echo of "Hearthstone" was heard and the family in the home was revealed. An unseen choir sang to the chant of the organ, and the little masque was most effective. The educational purpose was perhaps patent, but experiments such as these are not without their value. They make a simple appeal, easily heard, and they might with advantage be adopted by other Settlements. At the close there was a procession to music; the evening meal was spread, and the performance developed naturally into "a social evening."

LONGSIGHT FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, MANCHESTER.

Appeal and Bazaar Fund, 1911-12.
Special Effort to Raise £1,250.

The Bazaar to be held
November 6, 7, 8 and 9.

In submitting our appeal we have the following objects in view:—

(1) LIQUIDATION OF DEBT.—On certain property belonging to the Church there is a mortgage of £550, the balance of an original mortgage of £850. The reduction has been achieved by the Congregation's own efforts from time to time.

(2) A NEW ORGAN.—We have hitherto struggled to maintain a good musical standard in our services. To this end we have been generously and effectively helped by an unpaid choir and organist. For the continuance of a reasonable efficiency we now require a new organ. The old organ has done splendid service; but it was not new when bought by us, and it has served us 28 years.

(3) RENOVATION AND REPAIRS.—The Church and Schools stand in real need of renovation. They are a splendid and substantial block of buildings, and attention paid to them now will be a genuine economy, likely to be felt for many years to come. Since the appeal was drafted the Sanitary Committee of the Corporation have given notice that the drainage requires certain alterations which will involve considerable outlay.

FOR THESE PURPOSES WE DESIRE TO RAISE £1,250.

The Congregation and Elder Scholars of the Sunday School have already promised donations amounting to the sum of £275. This is the first public appeal made for over 20 years, the congregation being entirely self-supporting. There are no endowments.

We are, yours faithfully,

JOHN HEYS, President.

DAN BAXTER, Vice-President.

HARRY ANGUS, Chairman of Bazaar Committee.

JOHN CHORLTON, Treasurer, 2, Beresford-road, Longsight, Manchester.

OLIVER H. HEYS, 8, Sunny Bank-road, Longsight, Manchester, Secretary.

C. H. CHORLTON, 38, Ashfield-road, Rusholme, Manchester, Secretary.

Contributions in money or goods, &c., may be sent to the Treasurer or to the Secretaries.

THE ETHICAL CHURCH,

46, QUEEN'S ROAD, BAYSWATER, W.

Sunday, April 28, at 11 a.m.

MR. HARRY SNELL.

"Mr. Eden Philpotts' Play: The Secret Woman."

" at 7 p.m.

Mr. G. E. O'DELL.

"Humanism in the Romances of Alexandre Dumas."

Wednesday, May 1, at 8.30 p.m.

Mr. G. E. O'DELL.

Shakespeare's "Othello."

Friday, May 3, at 5.30 p.m.

Mr. G. E. O'DELL.

"The Social Origins of the Decalogue."

ALL SEATS FREE.

HANDBOOKS OF RELIGION

Cr. 8vo, 150 pp. 2s. net.

THE JEWISH RELIGION IN THE TIME OF JESUS

By Dr. G. HOLLMANN, of Halle.

Cr. 8vo, 176 pp. 2s. net.

THE SOURCES OF OUR KNOWLEDGE OF THE LIFE OF JESUS

By Prof. PAUL WERNLE, D.Th., of Basle.

Cr. 8vo, 200 pp. 2s. net.

PAUL: Study of His Life and Thought

By Prof. Dr. W. WREDE.

Cr. 8vo, 144 pp. 2s. net.

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

By Prof. E. VON DOBSCHUTZ, of Strasburg.

Cr. 8vo, 160 pp. 2s. net.

CHRIST: The Beginnings of Dogma

By Prof. JOHANNES WEISS, of Heidelberg.

BOOK ROOM, Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by Christian Scientists.

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

EUSTACE GORDON

(Manager for the Ulster Unitarian Christian Association),

BOOKSELLER, BOOKBINDER,
:: and STATIONER, etc. ::

Printing Well and Cheaply Executed.

Bookbinding orders carefully dealt with.

Second-hand Books searched for and reported free.

Orders received by post receive prompt attention.

35, ROSEMARY STREET, BELFAST.

UNIVERSITY HALL,

Gordon Square, W.C.

(Between Russell Square and Euston Square.)

Service at 11.15 and 7.

PREACHER (both Services):

April 28, Rev. Dr. STANLEY A. MELLOR, of Warrington.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,
ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
Miss ORME. HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT
FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

COMMENCEMENT OF A NEW VOLUME!

Now is the time to start subscribing to

The Sunday School Quarterly.

Edited by J. ARTHUR PEARSON.

CONTENTS, APRIL, 1912.

Heroes of Faith—John Wesley, Theophilus Lindsey, Albert Thornhill, M.A., Children and the Cinematograph, Florence H. Ellis, The Evolution Theory, H. Waterworth, The Theory and Practice of Sunday School Teaching, A. Stephen Noel.

Dickens and his Message, R. K. Davis, B.A., The Women's League Fellowship Section, Grace Mitchell.

Notes for Teachers.—I.—XV.

T. F. M. Brockway.

D. A. S. E.

F. J. Gould.

H. Fisher Short.

Lillyblush, E. C. Higgins.

Philip Pinchett's First Sermon. A Lay Preacher.

Shelley's 'To Night.' W. Lawrence Schroeder, M.A.

A Training School for Sunday School Workers. Clara

By the Way.

[T. Guild.

Threepence net, Postage 1d.

London:

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION,
Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical, Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.

BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 135, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCs.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Reference kindly permitted to Rev and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z. INQUIRER OFFICE, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, LAYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE
& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

BLAIN & HANKINSON,

Pharmaceutical Chemists,

69, Market Street, MANCHESTER.

Continuing WOOLLEY'S Dispensing and Retail Establishment.

REMNANTS!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen. Big pieces for Teacloths, Traycloths, D'oyleys, &c., only 2s. 6d. per bundle. Postage 4d. Irish Linen Bargain Catalogue Free. Write to-day.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming new Irish Linen Spring Costume Fabric, "Flaxzella." Washable, durable, looks smart for years; fascinating designs. All new shades. Write to-day.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

REAL NAVY SERGE direct from Portsmouth. As used Royal Navy, 1/3½, 1/6½. Patterns free. Carriage paid.—JAMES BUCKLE, Serge Contractor, Portsmouth.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, April 27, 1912.

* Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

[ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.]

No. 3645.
NEW SERIES, No. 749.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 4, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.]

HANDBOOKS OF RELIGION

Cr. 8vo, 150 pp. 2s. net.

THE JEWISH RELIGION IN THE TIME OF JESUS

By Dr. G. HOLLMANN, of Halle.

Cr. 8vo 176 pp. 2s. net.

THE SOURCES OF OUR KNOWLEDGE OF THE LIFE OF JESUS

By Prof. PAULE WERNLE, D.Th., of Basle.

Cr. 8vo, 200 pp. 2s. net.

PAUL: Study of His Life and Thought

By Prof. Dr. W. WREDE.

Cr. 8vo, 144 pp. 2s. net.

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

By Prof. E. VON DOESCHUTZ, of Strasburg.

Cr. 8vo, 160 pp. 2s. net.

CHRIST: The Beginnings of Dogma

By Prof. JOHANNES WEISS, of Heidelberg.

BOOK ROOM, Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

THE ANNUAL MEETING will be held at Essex Hall on Thursday, May 16, 1912, at 8 p.m. Refreshments 7.30.

RONALD BARHAM, Hon. Sec.

PECKHAM.

SALE OF WORK

(in aid of Church Funds)

WILL BE HELD IN

THE SCHOOLROOM, BELLENDEN ROAD,

on Saturday, May 18, 1912,
at 3.30 p.m.

Contributions of any kind will be very acceptable.—Address, (Mrs.) A. HAYWARD, Sec. Ladies' Working Party, 93, Chadwick-road, Peckham, S.E.

OLD CHAPEL, DUKINFIELD.

ANNUAL SCHOOL SERMONS,

SUNDAY, MAY 5th.

Preacher: Rev. E. D. PRIESTLEY-EVANS (Bury).
Services: 10.45, 2.45, 6.30.

PEARL

ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,00
Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, Managing
G. SHRUBSALL, Directors.

A NEW LIGHT ON CHRISTIANITY

DIVINE LOVE VINDICATED

By H. W. SOUTHWORTH

A forcible argument for the part played by Satan in the history of human redemption.

The Aberdeen Journal says: "Genuine and whole-hearted. The writer has put much study into his effort."

The Christian World says: "Mr. Southworth thinks for himself, and has a right to a hearing. He urges his case with enthusiasm."

The Bookseller says: "An unusual and stimulating book."

EVERY THINKING MAN AND WOMAN should possess a copy of this remarkable book.

Crown 8vo, 320 pages, 3/6 net.
Post free, 3/9.

Send for descriptive pamphlet and catalogue of books.

JOHN LONG, Ltd., Publishers,
12, 13 and 14, Norris Street, Haymarket,
LONDON.

UNIVERSITY HALL,

Gordon Square, W.C.

(Between Russell Square and Euston Square.)

Service at 11.15 and 7.

PREACHER (both Services):

May 5, Rev. E. W. LUMMIS, M.A., of Cambridge.

DOMESTIC MISSION SOCIETY.

THE

ANNUAL MEETING

WILL BE HELD AT

Highgate Hill Unitarian Church,

ON

MONDAY, MAY 6.

H. G. CHANCELLOR, Esq., M.P., the three Missionaries, and others will speak.

Tea and Coffee at 8 p.m.

The Chair to be taken at 8.30 p.m. by F. WITHALL, Esq.

HENRY GOW, Hon. Sec.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL,

AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.

—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad. Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon). Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

TAN - Y - BRYN, LLANDUDNO.— PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

Sound Education under best conditions of health. Next term begins May 1.

For Prospectus and information apply to C. J. MONTGOMERY, M.A., Head Master.

The Inquirer.

April 27th contains the following:—

"Bergson and Theology." By Prof G. DAVES HICKS, Litt.D.

"Bergson." By Rev. L. P. JACKS, M.A.

"Christianity and the Moral Ideal." By Canon A. L. LILLEY.

"The Social Challenge to the Church." By Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

"Unemployment." JOHN WARD, M.P.

"Prayer." Rev. S. H. MELLONE, M.A., D.Sc.

"Loyalty in Religion." Rev. S. M. CROTHENS, D.D.

"Women's Work in the Churches." By Mrs. SYDNEY MARTINEAU.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, May 5.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. M. HOLDEN.
 Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. G. C. CRESSY, D.D.
 Child's Hill, All Souls', Weech-road, Finchley-road, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. E. E. COLEMAN, M.A.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D. Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11 and 7, Rev. R. K. DAVIS, B.A.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11, Rev. G. HAMILTON VANCE, B.D.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Mr. H. N. CALEY; 6.30, Rev. JOHN ELLIS.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15 and 7, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, M.A.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. H. Gow, B.A.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. CRITCHLEY, B.A.
 Ilford, High-road, 11 and 7, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Mr. WALTER RUSSELL.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11 and 6.30, Rev. F. HANKINSON.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 and 7, Rev. C. ROPER, B.A.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. GORDON COOPER.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. W. ROBSON, B.D.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. F. W. G. FOAT, Litt.D., M.A.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLOR.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, Sunday School Anniversary and Flower Services, 11, Rev. JOHN ELLIS; 3 and 6.30, Rev. J. ARTHUR PEARSON.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C., 11.15, and 7, Rev. E. W. LUMMIS, M.A.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
 Wimbledon, 27B, Merton-road, 7, Mr. WM. LEE, B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11 and 7, Rev. JOSEPH WILSON.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Angelsea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. FRED. BROCKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30, Supply.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. Wood.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. W. AUSTIN, M.A.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30.
 BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45, Scholars' Service; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.
 BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. V. D. DAVIS.

BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, M.A.
 BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND, B.A.
 BURY ST. EDMUNDS, (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. GEORGE WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CAMBRIDGE, Assembly Hall, Downing-street, 11.30, Dr. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, Litt.D.
 CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street, 6.30, Mr. J. COOTE.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BECKH.
 { DEAN ROW, 10.45 and
 { STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS, M.A.
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11, Rev. H. E. DOWSON; 6.30, Rev. E. H. PICKERING.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS and Rev. H. W. KING.
 HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. I. FRIPP.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. CHARLES CRADDOCK.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. D. ROBERTS.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11, Rev. E. S. RUSSELL, B.A.; 6.30, Rev. J. C. ODGERS, B.A.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, Rusholme, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WHITAKER.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. DOUGLAS WALMSLEY, B.A., of Windermere.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. ALEXANDER FARQUHARSON.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. ALFRED HALL, M.A.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. L. P. JACKS, M.A.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVERS.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11, Rev. J. W. COCK; 6.30, Rev. J. S. MATHERS, M.A.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. F. TURLAND.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Unity Hall Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11, Rev. G. B. STALLWORTHY; 6.30, Miss Woods. Subject, "Bergson."
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.
 Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.
 Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

MARRIAGE.

KENRICK—CHAMBERLAIN.—On April 26, at the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, by the Rev. J. Worsley Austin, Gerald William, younger son of the Rt. Hon. William Kenrick, The Grove, Harborne, to Ruth, sixth daughter of Arthur Chamberlain, Esq., of Moor Green Hall, Birmingham.

DEATHS.

BRADSHAW.—On April 28, at his residence, Greenmount, Heaton, Bolton, Jonas James Bradshaw, F.R.I.B.A., J.P., in his 76th year.

BROOKS.—On April 26, Jane, the wife of John Hall Brooks, of Caerfron, Ruthin, and Gee Cross, Hyde, and daughter of the late James Hibbert, of Ferndale, Gee Cross, and of Mrs. Hibbert, of Blundell Sands, near Liverpool.

COTTEN.—On April 21, at 13, South Terrace, Hastings, Lucy Cotten, aged 86.

A LADY, who has given her interest for many years to the needs of Poor Working Ladies, appeals for donations towards the same. Particulars given.—Mrs. HENRY WILSON, Farnborough, Kent.

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY."—Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda. Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 1½d.—1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to EDITOR, "Dove-stone," Denton-road, Gorton, Manchester.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	307	BOOKS AND REVIEWS :—		MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES :—
ROBERT BROWNING	308	A Study of St. Luke	314	National Conference	316
NATIONAL CONFERENCE PAPERS :—		Literary Notes	314	London District Unitarian Society	316
The Sunday School	309	Publications Received	315	The South-East Wales Unitarian Society	317
Our Domestic Missions	311			Announcements	318
CORRESPONDENCE :—		FOR THE CHILDREN :—		NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	318
The Social Challenge to the Church	313	Notes from "The High Nest"	315	NOTES AND JOTTINGS	319

 All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE dedication of the new Campanile at Venice, on St. Mark's Day, is an event of international interest, not only because Venice is a priestess of the healing influences of beauty to men and women of every land, but also because of the part she once played in moulding the destinies of modern Europe. The proceedings, which were marked by elaborate civic and ecclesiastical ceremonial, afforded a striking illustration of the growth of national feeling in Italy. The one cause for regret was that the authorities of the Vatican threw away a golden opportunity of abandoning their protracted and one-sided quarrel with popular sentiment and rational government.

* * *

In an article in The Times, Mr. Horatio Brown points out how deeply the fall of the Campanile was felt by all Venetians, for it summed up in a peculiar manner the history of their city, and how successfully the scheme of an exact reconstruction has been carried out. "The colour of the new shaft," he says, "is a little rosier than the old. The bell-chamber is an exact reproduction of the original. The five bells, except the largest, which was intact, have been refounded at the charges of his Holiness the Pope; and his name, perhaps for the first and only time, appears in conjunction with that of the King of Italy in the commemorative inscription. The attic above the bell-chamber has recovered its two lions of St. Mark, defaced at the time of the French occupation; the shell of the new pyramid is made of reinforced concrete instead of brick, the outer casing of copper and the ribs of Istrian and Verona marble are identical with the old; the angel has been recast, but is carefully modelled on the angel of 1822. In short, the new tower faithfully reproduces its fallen predecessor; and for all Venetians there can be no doubt that it is a joy to see 'the master of the house' at home again."

* * *

THE attempt to use the argument of sacrilege against the proposals for disendowment in the Welsh Church Bill has received what we can only describe as a smashing blow in the letters of Professor Pollard to The Times. He points out in precise detail how the founders of the Cecil family were enriched by gifts of Church lands, and laid the foundations of a prosperity which has continued to our own day in what is now denounced as sacrilege. Lord Hugh Cecil and his brother have made feeble replies which amount to little more than a plea that they are not responsible for their ancestors. To this Professor Pollard rejoins: "It is a question not of descent, but of inheritance. I agree with Lord Hugh Cecil that descent from a thief should debar no one from denouncing theft. But to my mind the inheritance and retention of stolen property should. This to Lord Hugh is foolishness. His view apparently is that the guilt of theft is wiped out by prolonged enjoyment of the proceeds. No doubt there is a Statute of Limitations, but I doubt its application in the moral sphere. However, I do not wish to stray from the path of history into the labyrinth of ethics."

* * *

IN view of the vehemence with which the "sacrilege" argument is being pressed in some quarters, it may be instructive to quote part of Professor Pollard's statement:—

"But for the claims to exceptional virtue and special historical knowledge implied in Lord Hugh Cecil's interjection," he writes, "there would be no reason for singling out his family. Lord Burghley himself was moderate in his acquisitions as in his policy. His emoluments were not excessive considering his services to the State; they were small, indeed, compared with the plunder secured by the pious founders of the ducal houses of Somerset, Bedford, Devonshire, Rutland, and Norfolk; and few were the noble families, Protestant or Catholic, which did not participate in this 'sacrilege' of the 16th century. When this Bill comes to be debated in the House of Lords, it may perchance abbreviate the 'sacrilegious' argument if noble lords reflect that the restitution to the Church of a tithe of the property that was taken from it by their ancestors would richly compensate it for the proposed disendowment of its four Welsh dioceses, and would establish more conclusively than any eloquence the sincerity of the horror they express of 'sacrilege.'"

* * *

IN the Upper House of the Convocation of Canterbury on Tuesday a motion calling upon Churchmen and Churchwomen and other Christian people to offer the most strenuous opposition to the Government proposal to disestablish and disendow the Church in Wales was carried by 21 votes to 3. The dissentients were the Bishops of Oxford, Hereford, and Lincoln. It is certainly rather remarkable to find the Bishop of London and others prophesying that the Bill would cripple the work of God in Wales, instead of pledging themselves to make good any loss of endowment. At a time when the Baptist denomination is trying to raise a quarter of a million in order to improve the position of its poorer ministers, the Church of England might cheerfully accept the task of doing at least as much for the Welsh clergy.

* * *

THE Bishop of Oxford, in giving his reasons for dissenting from the majority of the bishops, said that he believed nothing was more disastrous to the Church in Wales than that it should meet a proposal for Disestablishment and Disendowment with a blank negative. It appeared to him that the case for Disestablishment was irresistible, and Parliament was bound to take cognisance of it. He did not agree with some of the actual proposals for Disendowment, but some measure of Disendowment must accompany Disestablishment, because it could not be denied that the ancient endowments of the Church were given at a time when the Church held an altogether different position to the whole life of the nation compared with what it did now.

* * *

THE impressive service in memory of Mr. W. T. Stead, which was held in Westminster Chapel on April 25, occurred too late for any notice of it to appear in these columns last week. It was a remarkable testimony to his gift for friendship with all sorts and conditions of men, and his genius for arousing enthusiasm for noble and often despised causes of justice and humanity. In a beautiful address Dr. Clifford spoke of him as an undespairing fighter against every kind of pessimism. "His faith in God, and in great human causes, was magnetic." Women never had a braver knight than he. One of the chief aims of his life was to lift woman to a higher place and to kindle in her a true sense of her responsibilities. It was asserted, Dr. Clifford said, that he was one of the first editors to engage women on his staff on the same terms as to work and wages as men.

* * *

MANY old students of University College, London, will have seen the announcement of the death of Professor A. J. Church with sincere regret and will desire to pay a grateful tribute to his memory. He was not a great teacher, but he always bore about with him the atmosphere of the best classical scholarship, its passion for accuracy and its fastidious taste. As a translator he was unusually successful, and his version of Tacitus in which he collaborated with the late W. J. Brodribb will long keep his memory green. But he was still more widely known by his series of stories from Greek and Latin writers, in which he opened the golden gates of classical learning to generations of school-boys, and enticed them to enter as into the garden of the Hesperides. Perhaps few scholars of our generation have done a more useful work. Certainly none have achieved a more delightful success.

* * *

THE Bishop of Oxford was entertained on Tuesday evening by the National League of Young Liberals. In proposing his health Mr. C. P. Trevelyan, M.P., who presided, described him very happily as "a non-party man, but a partisan of great causes." In the course of his reply, the Bishop, who spoke of himself humorously as an aged clergyman, standing for various moral qualities, with possibly a rather weak head, but at any rate a kind heart and a sound conscience, dwelt specially on the failure of labour to obtain a fair share of the profits in the great industrial development of the past generation. He believed, he said, that the welfare of their country depended on their revivifying with hope the life of the country. There was no object which politicians needed to set before themselves more strenuously, deliberately, and seriously than that of restoring agricultural courage, initiative, and co-operation, and making the whole bulk of the agricultural population feel that they had a stake in the country and a position of dignity which nothing could take from them and which justified them in standing on their own legs and refusing to cringe to any one, whether squire, parson, or whomsoever.

* * *

THE problem to be faced, he continued, was different in its conditions in town and country, but it was the same in its fundamental character—the restoration to the great mass of the people of some sense of security, in the right to work, and to a proper and reasonable wage for their work. What had impressed itself most upon his conscience in Birmingham was the vast mass of the population who, while not engaged in "sweated industry," were living under conditions of such insecurity that any sort of change or fluctuation plunged them into destitution. Only under conditions of extraordinary heroism and virtue could a man living on these terms be expected to think it worth while to do his best. "To make our industry efficient," he said, in words which ought to be pondered very deeply, "the first thing we have to do is to consider the extent of reasonable justifiable hopelessness in which the great masses of the labourers at present live, and that an increase of hope for them would be an increase of efficiency for industry."

ROBERT BROWNING.

BORN MAY 7, 1812.

It is interesting to realise that the same year gave birth to the two distinctive humanists of the nineteenth century. DICKENS and BROWNING alike learned in the crowd to distinguish the individual, yet somehow always to keep him related to the whole. A broad human interest is the vital atmosphere in which their characters come to dwell, so that, although they single out types in their own peculiar and opposite ways, the intention of each is not so much to make us observe as to make us feel. Then over their scenes of the human comedy each flings the same warm glow of a very English moral sincerity and earnestness. Yet, in form, in brain-work, in training, experience, and expression, they are so far apart that except for the moment they are hardly to be thought of together. It would seem too incongruous to their separate groups of readers.

With the coming of May it is BROWNING's hour of apotheosis, and for a while we shall all be talking and reading of him, hearing strange revaluations, perfervid praise from the neophyte side by side with the measured criticism of the expert, and, through it all, probably realising more than ever the actual greatness of this strong calm poet, this craftsman of his art, this master alike of lyric and monologue. His inspiration, true of all the immortals, was Humanity. When he chose such titles for his volumes as "Men and Women," "Dramatis Personæ," or "Parleyings with Certain People," he was giving his own keynote. The one abiding interest of a man is his own race, its ideals, hopes, faith, struggles, failures. For a time he may imagine himself more attracted by other things; the developing field of a science, the material progress of a business, or lonely engrossment in an art may seem to blot out all common human concerns. But in the end he finds he was not made to live alone, and something inevitably brings him back to that "sweet human love," with all it means, that PARACELSUS, dying, discerned. To be an Aprile, a poet, he should never have lost touch with this—the fresh mountain-spring of song. BROWNING might easily have been drawn aside, for when he began to think of poetry as a life-work WORDSWORTH and the Lake School had the ear of men and were beginning that poem of Nature that was to grow for a hundred years, till it created a positive fashion, and town-dwellers dream of a country life they could not endure for one wet week. But, born in unromantic Camberwell, BROWNING was essentially a Londoner, a citizen. He knew and loved certain forms and phases of nature; there are passages in his poems that re-create with the inevitability of genius the "wind-swept gap in the Appenines," "the lark soaring up and up, shivering for very joy," the moment of an English spring when "blue ran the banks across, violets were born." Quite a selection of nature poems could be formed from his work, yet they would not reveal the essential BROWNING. For him one must peer at the faces of the men and women who form the visionary city of his creation. He learned the inexhaustible mystery of them as a boy; that night on the Dulwich hill, when for the first time he gazed long and wonderingly at the sky illumined by the city below, and felt the strange and varied energies pulsating there, was the opening of the magic scroll.

The browsing among his father's curious collection of occult books would encourage him in delving for strange qualities in the shadowy depths of human nature. And when to these were added the fire of SHELLEY and the moonlight of KEATS life became a boundless fairyland with the joy of surprise possible at every turn of the path. From that evening when the bundle of volumes by SHELLEY and KEATS (all easily first editions) were opened beneath the Camberwell trees, and the two nightingales BROWNING tells us of sang fittingly overhead, humanity, never hitherto dull and prosaic, became penetratingly musical.

One must have come upon BROWNING in the dawning of one's manhood in order fully to realise this. Then as one walked the Sussex lanes (or wherever it might be) book in hand—that tiny volume of Selections which opened the magic casement for so many poor but eager poet-lovers in those days—a rare company began to grow about one in the sunshine or the twilight. Each was as vivid as the folk one knows, but there were gleams of thought and feeling in them that made them just enough unlike all others to be a revelation of the infinite variety of the race, and of that precious gift of the true artist by which he creates what never has been but which we readily declare we have seen.

This perennial interest in man, with his hidden subtleties and complex psychology, undoubtedly affected BROWNING's form in expression. One does not look to the Teuton for style in any case; he is too occupied with his matter. So long as he can create his legend for you he will not mind with what clouds of words he envelops it; it may be he is natively fond of the immense vague, the mysterious margins that melt off to infinity, the dream-laden shadows of the Gothic sanctuary. BROWNING had not the Latin mind that delights in clear outline and sharp shadow, equally definite in the pillars of a temple, and in the doctrines taught there.

He will ramble leisurely, casually, through the undergrowth of a religious dialogue (as in "La Saisiaz," or "A Death in the Desert") without a thought of the Latin's clear ultimate decision. Many people are exceedingly hazy at the finish of a poem as to BROWNING's "meaning." But that is exactly his gift. He fills them with his own emotion: the same confusion, as of evening and dawn, that is on his soul is on theirs, shot through with the same threads of glamour and hope. He might have fully understood the "Futurist" painters, for he was their prototype; in his religious poems, for instance, we are not allowed to be outside observers, accepting or rejecting a finished scheme; we are actually "in the picture," as the futurists would say—that is, in the midst of the battle of ideas. The cross-currents of religious problems, the eternal perhaps that touches hands with yes and no, the soul's mysterious impulses, longings, and memories—all these flash the confusing colours of a moving prism through BROWNING's mind and our own. Writing in the one modern language capable of spiritual expression he uses it, in the religious sphere, almost entirely for mystical impression. One must accept the tone of each poem as the reflection of one deep moment; but to attempt the building of a system of doctrine out of them would be futile. He knew himself to be writing in a time of change; with 1789 all external authority was gone; the influences of the South Place group, W. J. Fox, Miss ADAMS, and the rest, had convinced him of this; an era of new movements had begun bringing upheavals in society; it was an age of dynamic prophets, from EMERSON in America to CARLYLE and RUSKIN here; and the researches of men like DARWIN and LYELL were giving men more trust in microscopes than in MOSES. That he was aware of his atmosphere hundreds of his lines show. He was not like NEWMAN from whose work you gather no single reference to any of his great contemporary peers. In "Bishop Blougram's Apology," in "Christmas Eve and Easter Day," and in numbers of other poems, BROWNING's allusions to the thought stirring in his own generation are clear and technical. In some of his portraits there is the look of the successful man of affairs, the merchant or the lawyer. There was this trait about him. He handled his material with the assurance only given by a certain measure of practical knowledge. When he wrote any poem on art there was a real technique behind it. Just as every artist has his own palette so BROWNING had his—gold, brown, red, with a unique use of black, solid and fierce for contrasts. In "Andrea del Sarto," we have the (somewhat refined) talk of the studio, and the one unforgettable phrase that defines Sarto for ever. His work in a Venetian sculptor's studio was of a piece with his practical nature, enabling him to model in his own art with the bold handling of one who knows the true uses of clay. The connoisseur's study of prints (as seen in "A Likeness") gives quality to the etched lines of many a verse. Dr. BERDOE has shown the curious medical and anatomical background which the poet possessed. And only a musical enthusiast, recalling the patient study under a theoretician that BROWNING enjoyed in his youth, could have woven semitones, C major, ninths, counterpoint, and "mountainous fugues" into stanzas.

Not less thoroughly did he read and meditate about religion—attempting to see it in its contact with every human concern. This alone would give him an enduring place on the English roll of poetry. Who could say how many have already been borne on his wings from the chill air of materialism, the aridity of SPENCER and MILL, into the golden realm of the soul? Doubts shall exist there; they may be, as BROWNING insists, the essential atmosphere of faith. In the days to come it may well be that men and women will gladly turn to BROWNING, as the reflection of their own inner confusions, desires, and hopes. From this athlete of song, the breath of whose being is the endless fight for the best, they will hear through the darkening hosts of doubt those world-old inspiring assumptions of God, the soul, and immortality, all illumined with the alpha and omega of BROWNING's poesy—Love, Human and Divine in one.

EDGAR DAPLYN.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE PAPERS.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

It often happens that a subject (not new in itself) all at once assumes a far more important position in the mind of the public than it ever held before. It is, as we say, "in the air."

In the present instance I refer to the necessity of good training and teaching for the young. This idea is, as I said, not new; indeed, it is very old, but it is becoming far more prominent in the world of thought at the present day than in the past. The vital need of suitable food for body and mind, wholesome surroundings, and wise and considerate teaching for children and young people has become the most pressing concern of the community to which we belong. As a consequence of this a whole field of literature has arisen dealing with child-nature in a scientific and also a sympathetic manner. It is, indeed, quite surprising how much one can now learn from these books about the treatment and management of children. After reading one of them, when my family were all grown up, the alarming thought occurred to me that I had not brought them up at all.

This is, I understand, the first time that the subject of my paper, The Sunday School, has been introduced on the occasion of the meeting of the Triennial Conference,

In the past it has dealt exclusively, I believe, with questions which concerned grown-up people who have, more or less, fixed habits and characters, and are much harder to move and impress in a lasting manner than are the young ones. I think you will all agree that it is right that some time and consideration should be given to the children and the youths and maidens of whom we have so many thousands in our Sunday schools. This innovation is further justified by the improved position which Sunday schools are occupying. Sir George Kenrick, when presiding at a conference of Sunday school teachers in Birmingham last November, said "he liked to think that, if anything had been lost as regards attendance at churches and chapels, it had been more than made up in the Sunday schools, and, viewing the amount of self-sacrificing work that was done there, he was full of hope as to the future of the race." That word hope expresses the great idea dominating this subject; if we can only realise what it means, what possibilities it involves, our work may succeed beyond our most sanguine expectations.

It is said that Michael Angelo, when passing by a quarry, observed a block of stone there, and exclaimed, "Send that to me, I see an angel in it." If he could see one in stone, can we not see and work out the angel in the child?

When I think of what can be accomplished by teaching the young, the picture rises before my mind of the old printer and publisher, Robert Raikes, standing in a street in a low part of Gloucester and watching the ragged children playing, with noise and riot, quarrelling, cursing and swearing in a horrible manner, and making the place a hell on earth. Feeling that something must be done, he started his Sunday classes with paid teachers, and himself took the children to the Cathedral services. It was surprising how soon this teaching and good influence began to bring about a complete change in the children, making the neighbourhood a heaven on earth compared with what it had been, and it was this success which encouraged this early reformer to extend all over the country the Sunday-school system.

When a neglected and half-starved child is taken from its miserable surroundings and well fed and cared for, a marvellous transformation takes place in its bodily condition; so, too, do the mind and heart quickly respond to good teaching and example and a wholesome, moral atmosphere. It is, then, this hopefulness, indeed, I might say this certainty, of a large measure of success in work for the young which should stimulate and encourage all who are engaged in it, and which should attract many others to this remunerative field of labour (would that all were equally so!). Some of the most distinguished men in our communion have taken part in this important work. Dr. Martineau, when minister at Little Portland-street, gave much time and thought to the Sunday school which he had helped to establish there, acting as afternoon superintendent, giving up the leisure of his Sunday evenings to preparation for the school, and holding fortnightly meetings of teachers at his own house.

In this city Dr. Priestley took a part in founding the New Meeting schools, to the great indignation of the High Church section of the community, who were aggrieved that this minister, not content with publishing trenchant attacks on their form of belief, should try to pervert the children around his chapel. Dr. Priestley took part in the teaching of the scholars. In those New Meeting schools I myself was a teacher more than fifty years ago, I think there may be some present here who were teachers there also. I do not know whether the original building was burnt with the chapel in the riots of 1791, but I remember the plain, whitewashed, unadorned appearance of the classrooms, and also the girl scholars arrayed in white linen mob caps and tippets. As an instance of the change of opinion in the Church of England since those days, I may refer to a speech of the Archbishop of Canterbury a few months ago, in which he paid a warm tribute to the improvement made in Sunday schools by Dissenters, and, certainly, our section of that body may justly claim its full share in that work. In considering the large subject which is the title of this paper, I can only give my own experience, whatever that is worth. Without any disloyalty to my old schools here, New Meeting and Church of Messiah, I must say that, when I was transplanted, some 45 years ago, to a more northern region, I found myself in a part of the country where the Sunday school has a greater hold on that portion of the community from which the scholars are drawn than I have met with anywhere else. Also the children, in larger numbers, remain in the school to which they become greatly attached, and continue there, some as teachers and some as scholars in the adult classes; even marriage, which usually cuts off so much activity outside the home, not always keeping them away from their beloved school.

It has been a part of their lives so long that they feel lost without it, and if they emigrate to distant lands, in thought they often return to it, and years after they have gone away letters come from them full of expressions of attachment to the old place to which they owe so much.

I sometimes think that the name Sunday School is rather a restricted one, for no school does the work it should do for the rising generation if its activities are confined to one day in the week. You need to touch the nature of the scholar at all points. How much more influence you can get over a boy if you regard him as a real everyday boy, and not only as a Sunday scholar, whose interest lies in learning hymns and reading the Bible and improving books, give him something to do, or to interest him, during the week which gets hold of his unregenerate nature, and you will be much more likely to make him attend to your Sunday lesson. The same may be said of girls; to a certain extent, but I must say that girls are more manageable than boys, and have a more natural aptitude for being what we call good, though having been a girl myself (a very long time ago) perhaps I ought not to say this.

At our school at Gee Cross the activities carried on in the week evenings, under the general superintendence of our Sunday School Committee, form a long list. There are the singing class of about 50 members, which has existed for 40 years, the Guild, the young men's and the girls' ambulance classes, the minister's teachers' class, the Discussion Society, the young men's club, the girls' gymnasium, the Boys' Brigade, the children's evening, the football club, and social parties at intervals. All these activities form an important part of the life of our young people, as I know they do in many other places where the school is the centre of interest outside the home, making for many a second home, and bringing brightness and interest into the routine of the everyday working life. In a large town, no doubt, conditions being different, it may be difficult to keep members of a school in close connection with each other in this way, but where it can be done it is important to provide such a sphere for their energies in a pure moral atmosphere.

By this means the definite religious work of the Sunday school will be strengthened and its members will remain in it longer.

This result is of the greatest importance, for it is on those who have passed early childhood, and are beginning to grow up, that we should concentrate our most earnest efforts. When these have passed from the discipline and influence of day school, and begin a more independent life, then it is that they want help and guidance the most. The authority of their parents has diminished, their characters are still unformed, and new temptations are presenting themselves, but they are at an age which is very susceptible to religious influences, and their Sunday school may become their salvation, keeping the current of their lives in the right direction, creating healthy interests, and awaking reverence in their souls for all that is high and noble, and for the things that are small and humble as well. Reverence, too, for their bodies and for all the laws of God that govern them, a deep feeling of responsibility for their own lives, and for those in the future to whose lives they may pass on a portion of their own. A new light is dawning, making a truer and more reverent way possible of teaching our young people the right use of the growing powers within them. Helpful books are published which can safely be put into their hands, teaching the purposes of God in their sex powers, and there are suitable opportunities in the Sunday school of using this literature, and of instilling right ideas on these subjects. Let us not shrink from using them as they arise!

Much, however, as good teaching may do, there is also immense benefit to be derived by bringing young people into companionship under pure and healthy moral conditions. It is natural to the young to respond to what is good, and just as breathing pure air destroys the impurities in our bodies, so does the moral and religious atmosphere, created by the association of people brought together by the earnest purpose of achieving some good end, insensibly bring about a wholesome condition of the inner life, making it a second nature to instinctively choose the right, so lessening the unnecessarily hard struggle which those in less favourable surroundings have to make to overcome evil. Such an environment creates good ground for the planting of religious ideas, and we should give our scholars every encouragement to become members of the church that supports their school. How does the church support the school? Is not the interest of the congregation often only shown by a money contribution? It was so, to a great extent, when we first went to Gee Cross, but a change is coming about. Cannot a closer bond be created? Cannot the school be looked upon as the department for the younger portion of the congregation irrespective of the class to which they belong? This, it seems to me, is the aim we should set up as our ideal. I know that various objections will be raised to it.

(1) The difficulty as regards the association of children and young people of different grades of society.

(2) The fact that parents of education and leisure can teach their own families.

(3) The frequent inadequate supply of good teachers, and other deficiencies in the Sunday school.

Let us take these objections in turn.

(1) In the case of congregations where considerable differences of class exist objection may, naturally, be made by the parents on account of want of cleanliness, fear of provincial pronunciation, and the acquirement of bad manners. But I would point out that year by year the younger portion of the (so-called) working classes are greatly improving in all these respects, at least this is my experience. I see clean, well-dressed, well-behaved members of our Sunday school (coming, some of them, from very humble homes), but with bright, intelligent faces, and with a certain amount of cultivated taste, and I begin to think, is not the time approaching when these class distinctions should begin to be less strongly marked, and perhaps in time disappear altogether?

(2) As to the better off and better educated parents teaching their young people on moral and religious subjects. Well, do they? Some do, no doubt, but is it not difficult in the sort of way in which Sunday is now spent in these homes to get opportunities, or give fixed times to such teaching? Then again I can understand that a parent might find difficulties, and feel some hesitation in dealing with such subjects with those with whom they are in constant association, and, it may be, that example and silent influence are more congenial to them. I believe the fact of joining with others in a class often helps to multiply and increase the impression made by what is being taught or discussed, and, to that extent, school may have an advantage over home teaching.

(3) The inadequate supply of good teachers, and other deficiencies of the Sunday school. This objection can, of course, only be met by their improvement, and may not the remedy be, to some extent, found in the attendance of better educated children who will take an interest in the school, and will grow up to be teachers in it? We see, too, on all sides the spirit of progress being manifested in this field of labour. Grading in the junior departments is proving a success. Systematic schemes and outlines of lessons are being issued in larger numbers, and on more varied subjects, so that teachers are no longer dependent on their own limited supply of knowledge and ideas. The teachers themselves are being taught in ministers' classes by courses of lectures from experts, and the Birmingham University has offered a fine example by instituting classes and examinations for Sunday school teachers. There is also the helpful and stimulating summer school at Oxford. In these and other ways our schools are gaining in efficiency, though there remains yet much to be done.

I cannot help thinking that one way in which our schools and churches might be brought more into touch with each other is, if in cases where the minister has a Bible class for the younger members of his congregation, that class might be carried on as part of the school work.

I know that conditions vary, and I do not assert that this and similar changes could be brought about all at once, but I think it is worth considering whether it is not desirable to have such an aim in view. We all know that in the land from which we get so many stimulating and progressive ideas—I refer, of course, to America—the children of our congregations form the Sunday school. The objection will doubtless be urged that social conditions are so different there, but as class distinctions become modified here these differences will tend to disappear. As regards the young people in our congregations, when they join in good work, or social meetings with members of our school of their own age, but of a different social position, it is an advantage to all concerned. Mr. Dowson and I have found no better friends or intelligent associates than among many of those who are not to be met in what is called "Society."

Then as regards the present condition of unrest, of dissatisfaction and discontent in our midst, is there not a tendency to deal too exclusively with this state of things with a view to the increase of the material possessions of the individual? In helping to counteract this too exclusive aim I believe that Sunday schools are a real power in our land, and may become a greater one, imparting knowledge that encourages right thought and exerting influence in forming honourable and reliable characters. These should go hand in hand with the natural desire for the good things of this world, and will be the means of bringing about a better state of society. Mazzini says, "Improve yourselves, institutions will follow." Let us see to it that our schools are brought up to the needs of the present day, and that the instruction given is of real value to the scholars, touching their very lives, giving them higher interests and ideals and a fuller life, helping them to solve the great social problems in whose just solution lies the great hope of the future.

I will conclude with the words of a distinguished citizen of Birmingham, Sir Oliver Lodge. He says: "The subject matter with which the Sunday school teacher has to deal is the greatest and most magnificent of all, for I understand religion to be not a narrow thing. There is no real distinction between secular and sacred."

OUR DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

BY THE REV. J. C. BALLANTYNE.

NOT a religious enterprise finding its only sphere in the homes of the poor, having no central building, no chapel, no school of its own, but a Church, within whose walls is found a home indeed for its members—this is the modern Domestic Mission, whose work we have now to consider.

It is well known to all those who are acquainted with the history of the Missions that several distinct stages have marked their development since the day when the success of Dr. Tuckerman's "Ministry at Large," in Boston, Massachusetts, inspired a number of our Church workers in England to embark upon a similar enterprise, and the Rev. J. K. Philip commenced his labours in Spitalfields, London.

Dr. Tuckerman's being a visiting ministry only, with its services in the homes of the poor, he required no church, and we are told that, at its inception, the first London Mission partook of a somewhat similar nature; but soon the second stage was reached when a central building was secured for services and for Sunday school.

A little thought and a little knowledge of the conditions of our large industrial centres at that time—80 years ago—will serve to explain the coming of the third stage in the evolution of the Domestic Mission; for in moving about as they did among the poor, seeing for themselves the sordidness of many of the homes, coming in direct contact with want and illness, dirt and wretchedness, unemployment and bad employment, the Missionaries, if they were gifted at all with tenderness of heart, could not fail to concern themselves to a very large extent with material relief, with the procuring of goods, money, employment and medical help as well as with the religious and moral condition of their neighbours. The work of "Social Reform" was not then, as it is now, the daily occupation of hundreds of disinterested men and women in every large city; homes were not open then as they are now to inspection in the interests of their inhabitants and of the community at large; the Missionary, discovering peculiarly difficult and necessitous cases, knew of few societies that would investigate and remove the trouble and its cause; the State had not then taken to itself the powers which it now wields in the interests of cleanliness, health, sanitation, &c., and the Missionary, in many cases, took upon himself work which would now be shared by many expert authorities.

And parallel with this development came the commencement of many societies and clubs in connection with the Mission centres—societies for providing pleasant social intercourse and recreation in wholesome surroundings, for encouraging thrift and the wise expenditure of money, for the physical and intellectual training of the young, and so forth. I shall not stay to inquire how many of the Missionaries through the long period of this stage gave more of their time and thought to their cases of poverty than to the work of bringing the influences of religion into the home—for the question of course, cannot be put that way. But we may surely ask it thus: Unless he were gifted in exceptional ways, how could one man attend to all the minute details in the relief of the multitude of human difficulties and troubles brought to his notice, and to the supervision, if not the conduct, of classes and societies, and, at the same time, deepen and mature his intimacy and communion with God, and his power of giving expression to the majestic and ennobling truths of religion? Well is it for us of a later day that the old order of things is fast altering, and that it is now possible for the Missionary to lay down a great load of care for men's worldly condition and affairs, and to devote more and more of his time to the work for which he is peculiarly called and fitted.

"Hard-hearted," do you say? "Our duty is to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, and relieve the distressed?" Understand me well; there are still many cases where the Missionary is required to work alone and in such ways as his own judgment directs; he must still keep in his heart affection and tender sympathy towards suffering; nay, he must seek out those in trouble and see that somehow relief is brought; but if he looks about him carefully, he will see how many devoted men and women in his own locality and in central organisations are willing to come forward to his aid with special gifts, special training, and greater knowledge of special circumstances than his. Think of the number of agencies to which he can look for guidance, for information, for help, or into whose care he can often entrust his cases, so far as their material and bodily distress is concerned—institutions and help of various kinds for the aged, blind, the deaf and dumb, for cripples, lunatics, inebriates, epileptics; or, again, the labour bureaux and apprenticeship associations, the hospitals, convalescent homes, &c., not to speak of the Charity Organisation Society, whose officers are willing to work along with ministers of all denominations.

All this, I say, makes it possible for the Missionary to devote more and more of his time to his own peculiar task.

"But what is this peculiar task?" is the question often put to us. The whole community has now been stirred to action by the cry of the wretched and oppressed, the sick and the sad; the hearts of all men have been touched with sympathy, and soon the State itself will so enter upon this work of social reform that the Missionary will no longer be required. What is his special and peculiar function, that he should still linger on?"

This be our answer. Men's hearts have been stirred by a cry. But why has that voice gone up so loud at last that all are listening and hastening to answer the cry? Is it not because men and women have begun to feel within a hunger that must be satisfied—not for food; that is comparatively easy to deal with nowadays—but a yearning hunger for the free expression of the noblest faculties of the soul? To rouse this yearning, to make that hunger more acutely felt, this is the task of the Institutional Church worker whoever he may be; and that work must still go on if the Kingdom is to be won, for unless that life within men is quickened and somehow challenged forth into expression, there can be no Godward advance.

I have made it clear that I attach great importance to the work of relief from anxiety, poverty, and sickness, but it is a work which can be given more and more into the hands of the community working through suitable civic agencies. A more important task—to raise in men a sacred thirst—is the peculiar honour and duty of the missionary. Yes, more important. There were poor men in the days of the Master, and so far as I know he had little to give them; but into their souls he flung his challenge—that was of primary importance. As Emerson says, "... the reforming movement is sacred in its origin"; there are benefactors who hope "to raise man by improving his circumstances; by combination of that which is dead, they hope to make something alive. In vain. By new infusions alone of the spirit by which he is made and directed can he be re-made and reinforced." Dr. Martineau also concludes that "Private repentance, individual moral energy, deep personal faith in some great conception of duty or religion, are the pre-requisites and causes of all social amelioration."

It was said once by Cotter Morrison, by way of a taunt, I suppose, that "Religion cares more for the souls of men than for their social welfare," but Dr. Martineau's words are a good rejoinder, "Let us not glorify the body of civilisation, and overlook its soul." Oh, how often do we see cases of men in receipt of all kinds of assistance, monetary, medical, and so forth, yet hall-marked as failures because the heart has not been touched, the longing not kindled for the Kingdom. And oh, how often do we who work among the poor meet with those who in the midst of want and suffering hide within heroic hearts that are open on the Godward side. First comes the kingly Gospel with its giant wings, and then "all the civil virtues in her train."

On! piercing gospel, on! of every heart,
In every latitude thou own'st the key.
From their dull slumbers savage souls shall start,
With all their treasures first unlocked by thee.

The need for wise legislation and for wise legislators is great, and our churches can be trusted to do their duty in supplying the nation's needs in that direction—H. G. Chancellor, J. F. L. Brunner, John Ward. If we do our work in stirring the heart to want the things that are more excellent, then, and not till then, can their work be done.

Now the Institutional Church minister is peculiarly placed in the number and extent of his opportunities for awakening this nobler hunger of the soul, as a consideration of the three branches of his work will amply testify.

Firstly, his visiting. I believe it is the custom for many earnest and devout ministers to abandon almost entirely, in making their visitations, the reading of hallowed literature and the practice of prayer; these things they believe are not wanted except in the Church services; many congregations would resent their introduction elsewhere; they have a flavour of sanctimoniousness and Chadband, and are too presumptuous. But, even with such criticism, the Domestic Missionary need never abandon these sacraments. Were he acting as a relieving officer there might be a taint of insincerity, a pretence of welcome for his ministrations; but "let his alms be hope and joy," and the welcome is genuine and sincere. In the midst of the daily routine, which sometimes seems so monotonous and purposeless, hearts are lifted to a higher level, and find expression for a faculty of communion with God, perhaps seldom exercised, man and wife are brought more closely together, a new purpose, a new courage and cheerfulness enter into the home, and with these the suggestion of a fuller, larger life: that is the point, the bringing to birth the desire to widen the borders of the tent of life.

And, secondly, in his Institutional work. From homes where there is not so much blackness and wretchedness as greyness and drabness, from work that is often uncongenial and wearisome, lacking in interest and any spirit of enterprise, there come to his clubs and classes men, women and children, each inarticulately pleading, "'Tis life whereof our nerves are scant . . . more life and fuller that I want;" and in these meetings, if they are wisely conducted, we find again the awakening of the deeper life. There are young lads, for example, whose work in "print shop" or factory goes on in a groove, from day to day, with the same monotonous grind, never bringing into play their finer sensibilities, their nobler faculties, warping their natures and taking from them well-nigh all resilience and spontaneity, and in the Institutional Church (when we can get him there), all that is most excellent within him is encouraged forth into action.

On one occasion I called on a large employer of labour, to consult with him as to whether he could not arrange for the boys in his works to have more leisure in the evenings and a larger "paid" holiday in the summer. For three months several lads had been made to work late almost every night in the week. Before I left, we had cause to speak of one particular boy and his chances of promotion, and his master said, "Yes, he's a very good lad, always willing and capable, but there's one thing I wish you could do for him—put a little more spring into him." But translating it into my own terms, that was just what I had wanted to do, if the employer had only given me a fair chance.

The Institutional Church wants to secure such lads several nights in every week, and to make each one realise that he is not a mere machine, that there are within him faculties and abilities which it would give him great joy to express. The Church wants him to get to know himself better, to become acquainted with the divine within him; for, as Browning says,

"To know
Rather consists in opening out a way
Whence the imprisoned splendour may escape,
Than in effecting entry for a light
Supposed to be without."

And it can be done—sometimes in unexpected ways. On a simple excursion from London to Hampton Court, a little mite of a girl walked along hand in hand with her teacher, very silent and full of wonder; and then suddenly she said, "Oh, teacher, are we still in England?" Her eyes had opened upon a land of dreams, a world larger than her own, and of infinite possibility, and for a moment at least she had known the "joy of paths untrod." In many ways it can be done; for example, by agencies for inculcating the simple virtue of thrift, the principle of the man who dedicates the things, the acts, the hours of to-day to the attainment of some good higher and worthier than that to be gained here and now, and that associative thrift which brings with it the realisation that the good of one is the good of all. Or, again, in clubs and classes for physical development, for the teaching of ambulance, life-saving, &c., and for the wise use of the leisure hours of working men; societies where there is ample opportunity for the growth of comradeship, for the expression and discussion of opinion, for self-government, for the love of music and the other arts, and so forth.

Let it not be said that the conduct or supervision of such work warps and hampers a religious worker. On the contrary, in each and every branch of such activity the Minister finds that men, women and children are being roused from apathy; they are being encouraged to the wise use of their leisure time—of which we trust they will claim a larger amount in the near future; but as a further outcome they are being prepared for the reception of the great central truths of religion. Time and again, in the experience of every Mission worthy of the name there is witnessed in some man or woman the awakening into consciousness of that inner life that longs for utterance and for expansion; men and women become interested onlookers, then comrades, then workers, and then worshippers; for worship is a joy and a strength to the awakened soul that has felt the call of the infinite within and eagerly seeks an atmosphere wherein that life may bud and blossom in all its fulness, aspires after communion with the deep in other souls that calls unto the deep in his own, and with the great Father of all.

To the Institutional Church Minister of to-day each week brings with it a cycle of glad and engrossing work, every element uniting with every other in a truly harmonious whole. He often longs for more helpers; he chiefly longs, and this every day, for greater depth of sympathetic insight, greater love for the unattractive and unloving, and a more robust faith in the divine laws; but he has at his hand an organisation wonderfully adapted to his needs, with all its varied means of approach to the hearts of men, for touching them to finer issues and for quickening their sense of the need for harmony with God.

The work is a grand work, and all its best achievements are still in the future; but it has developed in such a way that the ordinary training for the ministry is not sufficient in itself to equip men for its service. Greater specialisation is necessary than is possible at our theological colleges, and, further, a period of probationary insight into the life of the poor, and of practical investigation into the industrial and social conditions of our time is urgently required for those students who, having completed their college course, feel the call of this work, yet "fight shy" of it owing to their uncertainty as to its demands.

And, therefore, I plead again, as I have appealed before, for the institution of a Scholarship, to enable men on leaving our theological colleges to enter upon a year of such specialised study, attaching themselves more or less closely to one or other of our Institutional Churches, but still more closely to some recognised Sociological College, and holding themselves answerable still to their college committee. The sum required is not large for an experiment of one year; the scheme has been approved whole-heartedly by the Manchester College Committee, and by all the Domestic Missionaries present at the recent Conference held in London.

I had almost said that all we waited for was the monetary support, but that is not so. We wait for men of the true spirit to carry on the work, and to open up new fields for similar enterprise. Just think of it, our great centres of industry increase in size and our less fortunate brethren are to be found in countless quarters. But do we keep pace with the increase? There are many agencies for material relief, increasing in number and in efficiency—but does the number of our churches in such quarters increase? We hear rumours that some may be closed.

We have come to the conclusion, for ourselves, that we need something more than mere material things; that for us fulness of life is not to be gained from food and clothes and comforts alone; but how do we think of "the poor"? There is danger here of a more grievous class distinction than any to which reference has been made in this Conference.

These men and women have souls; they too need the strength, comfort, inspiration of religion and of united worship of God, and we plead for men ready to take up the work of religious teachers among the labouring classes, whose mental outlook, whose attitude of soul and whose actions are of such paramount importance in the life of to-day. We want men with a wide knowledge of the social and economic conditions of our times, if possible with actual experience of business life, and of the barriers that seem to rise on every side therein, to prevent the free flow of the best in the soul; men literally possessed by a conviction of the power of the love of God to fill life full for every man, to unlock its hidden treasures and liberate its imprisoned splendours, and make it all gloriously worth living. O ye churches, we plead—give us men!

"God give us men! Tall men, sun-crowned!"

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

THE SOCIAL CHALLENGE TO THE CHURCH.

SIR,—My attention has been drawn to your issue of the 27th ult., containing a report of a paper read by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas at the Birmingham Conference. In that paper he drags me in for a wildly worded censure, and although a press controversy is, as a rule, a profitless thing, and replying to attacks nothing but vanity, I crave of you in this instance to allow me to comment upon the paper in question. It is a very remarkable illustration of clerical criticism. It begins with those references to myself blared forth like a war whoop; and it ends in the very worst form of sickly sermonising. Mr. Lloyd Thomas could not have read the speech I delivered in Manchester (I suppose it is to that he refers) or he would have found that the definite part of his paper is merely a wordy expansion of the very point which I was trying to make. I have always warned the Church against becoming political. I have appealed to her against becoming cheap by pleasant services, or futile by retreating into a degrading sensualism through one of the many forms which are being adopted to-day, the chief of which is called Catholicism, and which, unfortunately, is invading the Unitarian as well as other places of worship. Those of your readers who desire to see in our country a Christian church, which is to be the soul of national life, must have read with mournful despair the outpouring of meaningless, high-sounding words which Mr. Thomas offered as a contribution to the subject he was discussing. It is just that kind of preaching which withdraws from the Church to-day those of us who are tired of meaningless sentimentality in religion, and who are asking for a faith which, whilst preserving all the beauty of poetic appeal, nevertheless has some of the backbone of the Old Testament prophets. At Manchester I tried to test in relation to a great national crisis the sermonisings of leading churchmen. Their words are just as fine as Mr. Thomas's, and the grand result upon national conscience was practically nil. I have no objection at all to Mr. Thomas's sermons, but I do object to Mr. Thomas misrepresenting me in order to try and criticise me. Furthermore, I have never criticised the Church without taking care to state that there are movements springing up within it of the most encouraging promise.

Yours faithfully,

J. RAMSAY MACDONALD.

3, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

May 1, 1912.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

A STUDY OF ST. LUKE.

St. Luke, Evangelist and Historian. By Herbert McLachlan, M.A., B.D. Manchester: Sherratt & Hughes. 2s. 6d. net.

THIS book exhibits that soundness of scholarship and independence of judgment which the readers of THE INQUIRER have learned to expect from Mr. McLachlan. At first sight, the volume appears to consist of a series of essays in New Testament criticism; and it is critical work excellently well done. Mr. McLachlan knows his literature thoroughly, marshals his details with skill, and handles the technicalities of his subject with the ease of a master and the lucidity of a born teacher. But the critical work serves as a background for the presentation to the reader of a stimulatingly fresh and living portrait of St. Luke. It is a book for the layman as well as for the specialist. The personality of an evangelist is usually well concealed; so effectually, indeed, that for the ordinary reader he is a nonentity; he doesn't count; he is an editor, or a compiler; he stands largely outside his work; it doesn't come through him; he simply handles material; for all the difference it makes, St. Mark might just as well be called Ur-Marcus, or even Q. The man might be nothing but just a Source. And this prevalent feeling about the evangelist helps to establish the fatal tendency to regard the New Testament as a mere treatise, not a living message, to exalt theology over life, to emphasise the mechanical inspiration of the letter.

He renders great service who gives us a sound text, but greater service he who gives us a living man behind the text. Mr. McLachlan attempts to do this for St. Luke, and with real success. The chapters on Luke the Humourist, the Letter Writer, the Reporter, the Diarist, and Luke and his friends, bring us quite close to a thoroughly vital and human personality. With true psychological insight, and with great acuteness in seizing upon hints that lie here and there, Mr. McLachlan presents us with a man not only of literary attainment and scientific culture, but of original mind, deep human sympathy, impressive simplicity and sincerity, radiating joy from a bright and genial disposition, and with a broad outlook upon life. He calls him the "Great-heart" of the New Testament writers. He discloses a very lovable man. An exact observer, yet as faithful to the spirit that burned within his breast as to the facts he records. Magnanimous and warm-hearted as a friend; full of compassion for the weak, and of hope for the world; conspicuous in Christian virtue.

To introduce us to this man, and to help us to feel the reality of him, is a real achievement; and while it is important to know that he was familiar with the Wisdom of Solomon, and that the "Western" text has great original value, these things fall into the second place. We now know Luke as a man, and his Gospel will mean more to us on this account.

There is no little original work in this small volume. "Luke the Humourist" is a refreshing line of thought, though surely Mr. McLachlan omits one of the best examples in illustration of his theme when he fails to refer us to the excellent story of how Paul extricated himself from a scourging by his retort to the pompous Chief Captain, who "with a great sum" had obtained his "citizenship," "I am a Roman born." That was a silencer! We can almost see the Captain taking a deep breath! Professor A. S. Peake writes a short introduction, and no attentive reader will fail to endorse his warm commendation of a valuable contribution to our knowledge of the Lucan writings, and particularly of the writer himself.

E. W. LEWIS.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE first volume of the Centenary Edition of Browning's works will be published by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. on Tuesday. This special edition will be in two volumes, and will include all the poems contained in the previous complete editions of 1888-9 and of 1896, with the addition of a few short poems of various dates not hitherto taken into the collected editions. The text followed is that of the last edition supervised by the poet (that of 1888-9), with the correction of a few oversights, and the arrangement is as nearly chronological as is practicable. To each volume Dr. Frederic G. Kenyon, C.B., Director and Principal Librarian of the British Museum, will contribute introductions, biographical and bibliographical, showing the position which each poem holds in Browning's life, the circumstances of its composition, and its historical setting (if any), but not attempting to give a commentary upon its contents. All the various facts and items of interest bearing on the poems and scattered over many sources—some not easily available—have been gathered together in the hope of giving the reader such information as he may be expected to desire, while saving him the trouble of research.

* * *

AMONG Smith, Elder & Co.'s other announcements is "A History of Modernism," by the Rev. Alfred Fawkes, who is specially qualified by his previous experiences as a Roman Catholic priest to tell the history of this religious movement from the inside.

* * *

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & Co., LTD., have in preparation, and will shortly publish, two new volumes dealing with religious subjects. The first, entitled "Rays of the Dawn; or, Fresh Light on Some New Testament Problems," is by an anonymous writer. It commences with a sketch of the recent progress of thought from a material to a spiritual standpoint, and then gives explanations of the phenomena which attended the life of Jesus as recorded in the Gospels. The book is the outcome of the spiritual experiences of an earnest mind, and the author believes that the work will point the way to a better understanding of the inner life of the Scriptures.

THE second book from the same house is entitled "The Unity of Faith," and consists of a symposium by a number of representatives of the various religious denominations. The work has been compiled under the editorship of Mr. Geoffrey Rhodes, and includes chapters from his pen. Many works have been written to show the common ground of the world's religions, and to advocate the fusion of the various creeds, but most of these have been the work of a single author. In the present book each Church speaks through the person of an accredited representative. Among the contributors we notice the name of the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, of Wandsworth.

* * *

THE Poetry Society is giving a dramatic matinee at the Court Theatre, on May 10, in commemoration of the Browning Centenary. Mrs. Kendal has arranged a programme selected from the works of the poet, and the President of the Society, Mr. Forbes Robertson, will return to England in time to take part in the performance. An ode has been written by Mr. Alfred Noyes for the occasion, and Mr. John Dent is publishing a book of words.

* * *

THE programme of the Summer School of Theology, which will be held at Oxford from July 22 to August 2, has just been issued. The Inaugural Lecture will be delivered on Monday, July 22 at 8.30 p.m. by the Very Rev. the Dean of St. Paul's. There is a long and distinguished list of lecturers, including Canon Rashdall, the Principals of Manchester and Mansfield Colleges, the Rev. W. E. Addis, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, Professor Kirsopp Lake, of Leiden, Professor Söderblom, of Upsala, Dr. Moffatt, Dr. J. E. Odgers, the Rev. R. T. Herford, Professor Percy Gardner, and Professor J. H. Moulton. In connection with the school a soirée will be held at Manchester College, and there will be special sermons on July 28 at All Saints' Church, Manchester College, and Mansfield College. The fee for the complete course, embracing more than fifty lectures and classes, is £1, a generous guarantee of the Hibbert Trustees enabling the committee to offer the advantages of the School at the lowest possible charge. Application for tickets should be made as early as possible to the Secretary, Mr. Champlin Burrage, B.Litt., Manchester College, Oxford, from whom information about lodgings can be obtained.

* * *

THERE seems to be a peculiar appropriateness, both personal and local, in an announcement sent to us by the Rev. Kentish Bache, to the effect that Wakefield's "Silva Critica," 5 parts, 1789-1795, from the library of the Rev. Samuel Bache, 1804-1876, have been bound in one volume, and presented by his family to the Bishop of Birmingham, Dr. Russell Wakefield, and his successors in perpetuity.

* * *

THE official biography of Professor W. Robertson Smith, who died in 1894, and a volume of his lectures and essays, will be published early in May by Messrs. A. & C. Black. After the lapse of so many years, his biographers, Dr. J. Sutherland Black and Mr. George Chrystal, have been able to treat the critical period of Scottish Church history with which Professor Smith was associated with great fulness and frankness. The volume of "Lectures and Essays" includes reprints of less accessible papers, selections from class lectures, and several essays hitherto unpublished, of great theological interest.

* * *

THE price of the Great Writers Series, published by the Walter Scott Publishing Co., has been reduced to 1s. net. This is a companion series to the popular "Scott Library," and among the contributors to it are Mr. Birrell, Lord Haldane, Mr. Gosse, Mr. Austin Dobson, and other notable writers.

* * *

AN edition of Cardinal Newman's "Verses on Various Occasions" has recently been published in Longmans' Pocket Library, and some further interesting additions will be made to it during the next few weeks. Mr. J. W. Mackail's "Life of William Morris" will be issued in two volumes, containing the complete text, and having a frontispiece to each volume. That to Vol. I. will be a portrait of William Morris, and in Vol. II. will be given a view of Kelmscott Manor, by Mr. E. H. New. William Morris's "News From Nowhere" will also be issued immediately, and the second series of "Voces Populi," by F. Anstey, of which the first series was included in the Library some time back. This will contain the original pictures from Punch, by Mr. Bernard Partridge.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

MR. A. C. FIFIELD:—A Modern Crusader: Florence Edgar Hobson. 1s. net. Ballads, Songs, and Poems: Eveline Young. 1s. 6d. net.

MESSRS. LONGMANS, GREEN & Co.:—Modern Science and the Illusions of Professor Bergson: Hugh S. R. Elliot. 5s. net.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co.:—The Kingdom of God: William Temple. 2s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Contemporary Review, The Cornhill Magazine, The Harvard Theological Review, The Nineteenth Century, Young Days, The Vineyard.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

NOTES FROM "THE HIGH NEST."

I.

No, High Nest is not a fancy name, just invented to serve as a suitable address from which to write what some young readers call "birdy papers." It is a quite true name, and you may see it in any large-scale map of the Lake District. Every morning, from Easter to Michaelmas, a black and yellow coach drawn by four horses leaves Keswick for Windermere, which is twenty miles to the south. For a while the coach road runs beside the bright little river Greta, which comes merrily down from Thirlmere, the high-lying lake five miles ahead. The clatter of sixteen hoofs startles the grey wagtails, which love to hunt for insects on this part of the river. There is a flash of brilliant yellow as they rise to seek refuge further down the stream, for there is little grey about this wagtail except on head and back. At Chestnut Hill the road curves away from the river, and the delighted passengers find themselves on a sort of terrace overlooking the valley of Keswick.

Such a view is theirs! They see at once the greater portion of two lakes, Derwentwater and Bassenthwaite, practically encircled by mountains. When three road ends are reached the coach turns again to face a very stiff incline. The driver pulls up. "Now, gentlemen," he says, in a quiet but somewhat firm tone, "if you will get down and walk for five minutes, the horses can take this hill nicely. Yes, ladies, you shall have the ladder if you wish to walk too, but you needn't all get down." The coach with three ladies, one old gentleman, and a pile of luggage, is quite enough load for this steep climb, but the horses are allowed to take it gently, and the whip is idle. Up trudge the passengers; a few grumble, but most of them enjoy the walk, and the beautiful natural wood which borders it on the right. Some of them know well that a sharp look-out is likely to be rewarded by the sight of one or more squirrels feeding on a high bough, with bushy tail curled over the head; or leaping, with that same tail outspread, from one tree to another.

The crest of the hill gained and Helvellyn brought into view, the walkers climb into their seats again. The road is level for a few rods; just where it begins to slope steeply down into the next valley, a dark red gate is reached standing at the foot of a fine beech. On the gate you read, painted in white, "The High Nest."

If, like me, you are lucky enough to be able to make High Nest your abode for a while, you enter that gate knowing that you are leaving motor dust and noise behind you, walk leisurely past a little plantation of larches wearing week-old tassels of green, through another gate, and under a short avenue of fine trees to an old-fashioned creeper-clad house, with a verandah, also creeper-clad, and a delightful banky garden.

The tenants of the house tell me that on old maps it is marked as "Piet Nest." The Cumbrian calls a magpie a piet. No magpies have nested here for some years, but very many other birds build in and round the garden. Breeding is rather late in the north, and it is as yet too early to expect many kinds of nests, but a few yards from the window where I write there is a good-sized one in which lies a clutch of greenish-blue eggs, closely spotted and mottled with red-brown. On them sits a very dark brown bird with a pale orange-coloured bill. She is a black-bird. Her mate, whose colour agrees with his name, is never very far away. You may also know him for a cock by his bill, which is a much warmer orange than the hen's.

It seems pretty certain that at least one pair of robins has set up house-keeping on one of the primrose-decked banks near by, but there has been no time to track them to their nest. I am too busy looking after less common birds. It is not the robin, though, but the chaffinch which is the commonest of all birds about here. I have already found several chaffinches' nests, some incomplete, but, so far, none containing eggs. The cocks with bright slate-blue heads and copper-red breasts are to be seen on every side. Many of them are courting sober-coated hens, and very amusing it is to see one of these handsome little fellows when a rival cock comes near him. He turns away from the hen to whom he has been twittering in low soft tones, and facing the other bird with legs firmly planted, body lowered and bent forward, and the feathers on his head erected crest fashion, he dares him to come near his lady-love. The affair often ends with a fierce scuffle in the air.

I cannot call the song of the chaffinch pleasing, but, if persistence in song be a merit, then indeed this songster would come off with the prize. You hear it begin as a mere stutter about the second week in February when the alders and willows are beginning to show signs of early bloom. Gradually the syllables are added to, till the perfect complement is attained. The bird pitches on a high note and rattles down the scale in a staccato manner, thus: "tsip-tsip-tsip-turrrl-turrrl," ending with "tissi-ear" given less rapidly. You have the song ringing in your ears all day, in the quieter streets of the town where these birds join the house sparrows in picking what Cowper, the poet, calls "their nauseous dole" from the droppings of horses; in the yews and sycamores that shelter the village inn; in the wild cherry tree of the lower fells—a tree now one mass of fragrant white blossoms that show up the singer's gay colours. At first one feels a sense of relief when suddenly the song stops midway, and its place is taken by the metallic alarm-note of "pink" or "spink." If the birds descend to rather low boughs and seem to hurl their notes downwards, you may take my word for it that a cat has appeared on the scene. Chaffy is not fond of dogs, but he fears and hates cats, and will keep up that sharp "spink, spink," until pussy either departs, or curls round and goes to sleep; but let her so much as raise her head, or stretch a leg, and again the cry is taken up; for Chaffy and Co. have arranged that sentries shall be on duty during that nap. It will not surprise you to hear that "spink" is one of the local names of this bird.

High Nest looks down upon a stretch of marshy land which is perfectly flat. On this patch of rough moist land, and on the fells rising beyond it, curlews breed. The curlew is a rather large bird. It measures 21 inches. Birds are measured from the tip of the bill to the end of the tail. As the curlew's bill is somewhere about five inches long, and a good deal curved, it is not as big a bird as the figures might lead you to imagine. Its nest is a few grasses or leaves laid in a slight hollow, sheltered by a tuft of grass or heather. The bird is wild and shy. Its main colours are those of the soils and withered vegetation among which it builds. Reddish ash, pale, and dark browns tone well with dead bracken, dry rushes, and last year's growth of coarse faded grass stalks. One cannot say that this bird has any song. Its language is an oft-repeated ringing call, a little shrill, but never harsh. "Courlie," or "curlui" is a poor imitation of this wild free cry, but print can get no nearer. The cry is heard on the slightest approach of danger, the bird rising and flying rapidly, the white triangular rump patch well displayed. It you go near the nest they will pretend to be injured, so that your attention shall be drawn to them and cause you to overlook the little hollow with the four pointed eggs. The ringing call is so expressive of the wild freedom of mountain moorland that it fell strangely indeed on my ears when I heard it in quite different surroundings. It was a sultry summer afternoon in one of our smoke-dimmed northern manufacturing cities. I was crossing the city park with its dusty trees, whose bark seemed to need a scrubbing brush if it was to show any colour but black. Under my feet was city grass, grimy and dusty too. I was wishing we kept our town air cleaner by means of consuming our smoke, and thinking longingly of pure air and clean trees such as I am enjoying at High Nest, when the unmistakeable "courlie, courlie" of the moor-loving bird rang out quite near me. It turned out that there was an aviary in the park, and among other feathered prisoners I discovered a somewhat drabbed curlew. Those of you who are true bird-lovers, and who think that liberty is pined for by even the best tended cage-birds, will not wonder that for once that ringing call of "courlie, courlie!" gave me pain instead of pleasure.

EMILY NEWLING.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

THE EXHIBITION AT QUEEN'S COLLEGE HALL.

AN interesting feature of the Conference proceedings at Birmingham was the exhibition illustrating the history of Unitarianism in that city and the surrounding district, arranged by Mr. Herbert New and Mr. Lewis Lloyd, in the Queen's College Hall. Birmingham has played no small part in the struggle for religious liberty, and the valuable collection of photographs, books, portraits, eighteenth-century sermons, pamphlets, MSS. and other objects of archaeological interest which had been placed on view for the benefit of the visitors served not only to recall the "good old times," but to remind us of the opposition which unorthodox thinkers had to face in the time of William Russell and Dr. Priestley. In many respects things have greatly changed since that time, for which we can only be thankful; and yet the title of a sermon on "The Duty of the Rich to the Poor," preached at the first annual collection for the New Meeting Schools in November, 1789, has a curiously familiar ring about it, and we are not yet such a pacific and contented people that we can afford to smile at a printed address to "all true friends of the Town and Trade of Birmingham" entreating them "to forbear immediately from all riotous and violent proceedings." Still, we do not stone our prophets to-day, or throw their furniture out of the window, as did the rabble who razed the Old Meeting to the ground, and battered down the walls of Fair Hill after the unfortunate dinner in commemoration of the French Revolution on July 14, 1791, which was deemed to be such treason to the King.

There was a truly Hogarthian picture of the burning of Fair Hill in the Exhibition—an engraving from a sketch made on the spot, which depicted the crowd carousing in front of the house while goods and chattels were being ruthlessly destroyed. To turn from this to the discourse on "The Duty of Forgiveness of Injuries," which was intended to be delivered soon after the riots by Dr. Priestley, is to realise in some measure what a patient and long-suffering man he must have been. In a brief survey of the history of the New Meeting and the Church of the Messiah, written by Mr. New, to whom so many of these interesting relics of the past belong, an account is given of the exciting times that resulted in Priestley's going to America. Mary Russell's description of the behaviour of the execrated divine is quoted. "No human being could, in my opinion," she says, "appear in any trial more like divine than he did then. Undaunted he heard the blows which were destroying the house and laboratory that contained all his valuable and rare apparatus and their effects, which it had been the business of his life to collect and use. All this apparatus, together with the uses he had made of them, the laborious exertions of his whole life, were being destroyed by a set of merciless, ignorant, lawless banditti, whilst he, tranquil and serene, walked up and down the road with a firm yet gentle pace that evinced his entire self-possession and a complete self-satisfaction and consciousness which rendered him thus firm and resigned under the unjust and cruel persecution of his enemies, and with a countenance expressing the highest devotion, turned as it were from this scene, and fixed with pure and calm resignation on Him who suffered the administration of this bitter cup."

The pictures included some fine portraits of eminent Birmingham worthies, an engraving of "The Reverend and Learned Mr. Richard Baxter," some water-colour drawings of old chapels in the Midlands, and one of the few prints of the facsimile copy of the Original Covenant of the Protestant Dissenters, worshipping at Angel-street Congregational Church, Worcester, dated 1687, bound in vellum. Among other exhibits were a superbly bound copy of Theophilus Lindsey's Liturgy, with Apostles' Creed, &c., four silver communion cups of 1782, lent by the Church of the Messiah, some memorials of Sarah Bache, including an ivory miniature, several medals struck on various notable occasions, a watchman's rattle used during the Birmingham Riots, and (to come to more modern times) a bust of Geo. Dawson. The memorials of Dr. Priestley outnumbered all the rest. Among these we noticed a faded and discoloured diary (perhaps the most valuable thing in the Exhibition) which belonged to him, and still testifies alike to his piety and precision. The entries are neatly made in ruled columns, partly in longhand and partly in an obsolete shorthand, and are quite legible; but the little book, which has lost a portion of its binding, and is said to have been picked up on a rubbish-heap, has the appearance of having been scorched by fire.

It was impossible not to feel some regret that this extremely interesting collection could not be permanently kept together and housed where those to whom the history it illustrates is of peculiar interest might have easy access to it. There is much to be said, of course, for certain articles being acquired (those, at least, which are not family possessions) by public libraries or museums where they can be studied, together with other records of the times to which they belong; but, grouped together as we saw them at Queen's College, they certainly seemed to possess a special significance which made it appear desirable that as many as possible should be preserved in their traditional historical surroundings.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETING.

THE fourth annual Young People's Meeting organised by the London District Unitarian Society was held at Essex Hall last Saturday evening, April 27. A large number of young people connected with churches in the London district assembled, and the meeting was encouraging and enthusiastic. Dr. W. Blake Odgers, President of the Society, occupied the chair, and he was supported by the Rev. W. H. Rose, Mrs. Classon Drummond, Mrs. Odgers, the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson (District Minister), the Rev. T. A. Wing, (Meadville College, America), and Mr. R. Bartram (hon. secretary). Amongst those present were the Revs. W. Tudor Jones, A. H. Biggs, Douglas W. Robson, R. K. Davis, Chas. Roper, G. C. Cressey, W. H. Ballantyne, Messrs. A. Savage Cooper, A. A. Tayler, R. M. Montgomery, and A. Wilson. Miss D. I. Osborne (Finchley) officiated at the piano.

The Chairman based his remarks on "London District Unitarian Society," and the first word of that title, "London," gave opportunity for interesting references to parishes, boundaries, and counties; and the exact position and a short account of Essex Hall, which was in the county, but not the City of London. Unitarian places of worship were not all grouped together, but were scattered far and wide in the "district," like outposts. "Unitarian" at different times meant different things, and as young people they ought to be able to give a reason for being Unitarian. Why were they Unitarian and not Church of England, Congregationalist, or any other denomination? They were not Atheist, because as rational beings they believed there was an All-powerful and loving God; that the great world was not made by chance, but that there was a guiding principle and force. Neither were they Agnostic, because they knew there was a God, that right was right, and wrong, wrong. Nor were they Roman Catholic, inasmuch as that Church demanded that its members should believe what its priests told them. The Unitarian was free, and would not submit to dictation in belief. Each one must decide for himself. They were not Church of England, because that Church believed in the doctrine of the Trinity and expected its members to believe in certain creeds, and, if they did not do so, they would perish everlastingly. They were not orthodox Dissenters, because the latter believed in the doctrine of Atonement. They were Unitarians because they believed in one God and Father of all. They decided their points according to the light of Reason, and the things that good men and wise had written. They believed in man; that the human race had marvellous possibilities before it. And on the last word, "Society," Dr. Odgers concluded by saying that many of the Unitarian churches were isolated, some were weaker than others, and it was a good thing that they should be kept in closer touch with each other under the care and with the help of a Society. That was why there was and ought to be a London District Unitarian Society.

Mrs. Clason Drummond spoke of "The Inheritance of Our Free Churches," and emphasised the responsibility of carrying on the work of the churches. She thought that at times the young people did not quite appreciate the full value of their inheritance. Converts had fought their way to it through much difficulty, but those born and brought up in the faith had always possessed it, and anything else seemed impossible. They were free to think as they chose, and came together out of sympathy and not because they were bound to do so. There was great responsibility in carrying on the work that had been handed down to them, and it was for them to see that that responsibility was fully realised and carried forward. They were often accused of coldness and lack of emotion, and the speaker thought that the accusation was not without foundation, for often they were too silent and afraid of showing emotion or speaking of their thoughts. Coldness and lack of emotion were not inherent qualities of a Free Church, but rather a lack of realisation that full freedom was of a dual nature. The freedom of the Church was incomplete without the freedom of the individual soul, and the conventionality of silence often fettered their churches. Individuals met together, but did not like to speak. They were afraid and left it to the ministers. Besides the freedom which was theirs by inheritance, there was the other freedom of the soul which each must win afresh, that they might come into the perfect freedom of the sons of God who stand upon their feet that He may speak to them.

The Rev. W. H. Rose spoke of "The Place of Amusement in the Christian Church." He believed in amusement and recreation and that they had their place in the church, and ought to be connected with the church. During the last generation there had grown up what was known as Institutional Churches, and many people were concerned as to the objects and aims of those institutions. He felt that a Christian Church consisted of men and women who gathered together for the purpose of strengthening, developing, and encouraging the religious life. If the Christian Church did not achieve that, it was failing in proportion as it did not do so. If with all the Institutions connected with the Church there was lack of attendance on the Sunday, that church was a failure. The church was not a success if institutions were flourishing throughout the week, but on Sunday, or at the Sunday school or the services, there was lack of attendance. All their young people should realise the joy and gladness that would be theirs by cultivating the habit of worship on Sundays. The church did not exist primarily for Institutional work, but for something higher, truer and nobler, the development of the best life within them. He urged the young people to be loyal to their church, not for the amusements it provided, but for the higher life which it would develop within, and to be loyal to the denomination to which that church belonged.

The Rev. T. A. Wing, speaking on "Christian Fellowship," said that the Christian Church existed for the single end of fellowship; fellowship in belief, in open mindedness, in truth, and in human sympathy and kindness. Kindness was the soul of a living church and kindness implied knowledge one of another. It was often said that a church, represented the highest and the most important things in human life. If that were true, he who was a Christian must be interested in it, must take a part in it, and do his share for the sake of his own soul, his God, and his fellow man. When people agreed very much about anything, they sought sympathy and joined forces for the accomplishment of what they desired. That association was the simplest and the most universal in the world. In every department of human life success depended upon the co-operation, help and sympathy of somebody else. What was more natural than that those who believed in the spiritual, and who hungered for truth and wished to discover the secrets of human life, should join heart and hand with others having the same feelings, aspirations, and hopes? They were often inclined to the opinion that there were too many difficulties in the way, and the speaker admitted frankly that there were difficulties, but there was nothing in the world worth while that was not difficult. Were man a little more critical of himself and more considerate of his brother, putting Christian conscience first, he would become more mindful altogether of somebody else. If loving kindness prevailed and all obeyed the sovereign law of God, there would be in their churches a rich and noble human fellowship. The speaker concluded with the message that they might be more helpful than they had been, for there was nothing so vital, so Godlike, so magnificent as that they should help people to think, to feel, to see, to solve the problems of life, and to find their way, with mutual, tender, high-minded human sympathy.

Questions and suggestions were here invited from the meeting, and Mr. Ronald Bartram (Unity Church) suggested that the young people's interest in the work of the London District Unitarian Society might be shown in a practical way. A collection was made at the door at the conclusion of the meeting, and heartily responded to.

Mr. Ernest Spillman (Stratford) made a suggestion that an annual outing of the young people connected with all the churches should be arranged to some place like Oxford, which Mr. Tarrant, jun., supplemented. Miss Tarrant (Wandsworth) hoped that a report of that meeting would be made to all their Young People's Societies. Mrs. Odgers added a few words on behalf of Temperance, and Mr. Cowlin (Peckham) remarked upon Band of Hope movements and the opportunity for the help of young people. All the suggestions were noted by the Chairman, who then called upon the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, District Minister, to speak. Mr. Pearson emphasised previous remarks upon loyalty, sincerity, steadfastness and fellowship, and asked the young people present to bear their witness to the spirit of inheritance. That Young People's Meeting was going to increase in numbers and in driving force that would count in life, and in the life of the churches, and in the lives of those who belonged to the churches or were on the fringe of the churches. Let them believe in the Spirit, trust it, and work with it, and achieve for themselves and their fellows a bigger freedom than their fathers had handed down to them.

The meeting closed with a hymn and the benediction.

THE SOUTH-EAST WALES UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

At West Grove Church, Cardiff, on Monday, April 30, were held the annual meetings of the South-East Wales Unitarian Society. The following were appointed officers for the ensuing year:—President, Mr. John Lewis, Pontypridd; vice-president, Mrs. Reed, Swansea; secretary, the Rev. J. Park Davies, B.A., B.D., Pontypridd; assistant secretary, the Rev. E. R. Dennis, Pentre; treasurer, Mr. Ernest D. Williams, Aberdare.

After luncheon, kindly provided by the members of the Cardiff Church, addresses were delivered by Mrs. Reed, Mrs. Fox (Cardiff), Mr. L. N. Williams, J.P. (Aberdare), and the Rev. Simon Jones, B.A., of Swansea, on the "Past, Present and Future of the Society." The latter reported that he had succeeded in raising the sum of £500, the goal they had fixed for the celebration of the society's "coming of age"; that the sum would now be vested in trustees, and the income therefrom devoted to the work of the society.

The evening meeting was addressed by Mr. D. Llenfer Thomas, stipendiary magistrate of Pontypridd, and the Rev. D. Delta Evans, London, who represented the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Mr. Llenfer Thomas's subject was "The Challenge of the Social Problem to Unitarians," and in the course of his address he said he would have hesitated to promise to speak on that subject, had he known that the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas had spoken on it so recently at the National Conference at Birmingham, whose utterances he had just read with the utmost satisfaction and pleasure. He quoted from Theodore Parker and the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed to show that the social problem had exercised the minds of Unitarians in the past, but if he was right in his judgment, and he approached his subject as a very sympathetic critic, he thought the cultivation of personal virtues, of justice, integrity, purity, philanthropy, &c., had been emphasised to the neglect of the communal or social qualities, evidence of which might be found in the feeling sometimes expressed by Unitarians that man can worship God in the street, the workshop, or on the mountain.

He ventured to appeal to them as men and women who had bravely faced problems in the past, such as the effect of science on the Bible, religion, &c., and had found a stronger faith their own to face this problem also with equal courage. Many of them had leisure, education, and ability, and could be of immense advantage at the present moment. Their free and undogmatic faith should be an asset of inestimable value in allaying that suspicion which is often felt against organised religion.

Mr. H. Woolcott Thompson, in proposing a vote of thanks to the speakers, expressed the pleasure the members of the Cardiff Church felt in receiving a visit from the Society. Mr. L. N. Williams seconded the vote, which was carried with great cordiality.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

THE ninety-sixth Public Anniversary of the Peace Society will be held at the Mansion House, E.C., on Wednesday, May 8, 1912. The chair will be taken at 3 p.m. by the Right Hon. Joseph A. Pease, P.C., M.P. (President), supported by Lord Bishop of Hereford, Lord Alverstone (Lord Chief Justice), the Lord Advocate (Mr. Alex. Ure, M.P.), Lord Avebury, Lord Courtney, Lady Courtney, Sir Herbert Roberts, Bart. M.P., Mr. Philip Snowden, M.P., the Rev. Canon W. L. Grane, and many others.

THE Eighth Annual Peace Congress will open on May 15 at the Caxton Hall, Westminster, and continue till the 18th. A considerable programme has been arranged, including four conferences on Education and Peace, Commerce and War, Armaments and Labour, and International Arbitration. At these conferences a number of special questions will be introduced by well-known speakers. The chairmen of these meetings will be Sir James Yoxall, M.P., Mr. Gordon Harvey, M.P., Mr. J. Ramsay Macdonald, M.P., and Sir John MacDonell. Amongst those taking part in the discussions are Mr. Noel Buxton, M.P., Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, Mr. Geo. Greenwood, M.P., Mr. W. H. Dickinson, M.P., Mr. H. Nuttall, M.P., Mr. E. T. John, M.P., Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., Dr. Chapple, M.P., Mr. Philip Snowden, M.P., Mr. Percy Alden,

M.P., Mr. J. Allen Baker, M.P., Mr. C. W. Bowerman, M.P., Mr. J. Rowlands, M.P., Mr. George Barnes, M.P., Mr. George Radford, M.P., Mr. Keir Hardie, M.P., Mr. W. Thorne, M.P., Canon Grane, Canon Horsley, the Dean of Worcester, Lady Barlow, Sir Ernest Tritton, Sir Edward Boyle, Baroness de Laveleye, Dr. T. J. Lawrence, Principal Estlin Carpenter, Mr. J. A. Hobson, Mr. F. W. Hirst, Monsignor Benson, Mr. I. Zangwill, and a large number of delegates from all parts of the country, and from all kinds of organisations in sympathy with the Peace Movement.

In connection with the Congress the Bishop of Lincoln will preach in London, on May 14, at St. Martin's-in-the-Fields; Monsignor Benson will preach on International Peace in Westminster Cathedral on May 19, and Mr. J. M. Robertson, M.P., is to preside at a meeting of the Rationalist Peace Society in the small Queen's Hall on Sunday, May 19.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Astley.—The annual school sermons were preached on Sunday last by the Rev. J. J. Wright, F.R.S.L., to large congregations. The anthems were sung by an augmented choir. The children sang special hymns, and the collections for the day amounted to £22.

Belfast.—At a special meeting of the General Committee of the First Presbyterian Church, Rosemary-street, held after morning service on Sunday last, the following resolution was passed:—"We, the members of the General Committee of the First Congregation, Belfast, desire to place on record a deep sense of the loss the above congregation has incurred through the death of the late Mr. Thomas Andrews, jun. Even more would we express the most heartfelt sympathy with his bereaved widow and child, and with his parents and the members of his family. May they, along with the other precious memories they will cherish concerning him, find much comfort in the thought of that heroic sense of duty which impelled him to the very last to think and act for others rather than for himself. And we pray that in their great bereavement they may be strengthened and consoled by the faith that death cannot separate from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

Bolton.—A sale of work was held at the school of the Halliwell-road Free Church on Saturday afternoon, April 27. It was opened by Mrs. L. Cropper, of Eagle Brow, the Rev. J. Islan Jones, M.A., presiding. The receipts amounted to £20 11s.

Boys' Own Brigade.—On Tuesday evening last, April 30, there was held at Stamford-street Chapel the annual gymnastic competition for the Marian Pritchard Memorial Shield. The Brigade President, Mr. Ronald P. Jones, occupied the chair, and Mr. Barrow-Clough, of Guy's Hospital, acted as judge. Teams were entered by the 1st Company (Stamford-street), 3rd Company (Mansford-street), and 5th Company (Dingley-place), and after a very close and well-contested competition, the President announced the marks gained as follows:—

	Rars.	Horse.	Physical Drill.	Total.
1st Company	309½	255½	288	853
3rd "	313½	235½	303	852
5th "	314	246½	299	859½

The Shield was therefore awarded to the 5th Company amidst applause from all present, conquerors and conquered alike.

Gateshead: Resignation.—The Rev. William Wilson, who has been the minister of Unity Church for three and a half years, has tendered his resignation, which has been accepted, and will terminate his ministry on the first Sunday in May.

Gee Cross.—The annual meeting of the congregation of Hyde Chapel was held on April 23. The treasurer's statement of accounts showed that the adverse balance had been reduced by about £60. After the committee's report had been read and adopted and three fresh members had been elected by the chapel committee to fill vacancies caused by death, and the officers re-elected, reports were presented by the Sunday school, women's society, &c., and by delegates to the Provincial Assembly and National Conference at Birmingham. The latter was one of the most interesting features of the meeting, the delegate (Mrs. J. C. Hibbert) presenting a most interesting and graphic account of the proceedings.

Hastings: The late Miss Cotton.—On April 21 the Hastings Free Christian Church lost an old member, Miss Lucy Cotton, in the 86th year of her age. For thirty-seven years she had been connected with the Hastings church and shown the deepest interest in its welfare. She was a faithful supporter through good and evil times, and her loss will be deeply regretted. On April 24 a funeral service was held in the church, conducted by the Rev. S. Burrows, assisted by the Rev. H. W. King, and on Sunday morning last a memorial service was held and a sermon on "The Eternal Weight of Glory" (2 Cor. iv. 17) was preached by the Rev. S. Burrows.

London Lay Preachers' Union.—A very lively and instructive meeting of the Union was held on Monday, April 29. After a brief devotional service conducted by Miss M. Francis, the chair was taken by the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson. Mr. A. M. Stables, of Forest Gate, opened a discussion on the "Brotherhood Movement." Mr. Stables was both critical and sympathetic towards the movement. He thought it contained an element of pandering to popular sentiment at the expense of depth of religious feeling. The P.S.A. meeting sometimes quite overshadowed the church which initiated it. On the other hand a large amount of good work was done through clubs of various kinds in connection with the movement, and the meetings did often attract and hold men who were not reached by ordinary religious services. Mr. Colyer followed in a somewhat similar vein, whereupon the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson took up the discussion, and gave an earnest vindication of the "Brotherhood" as he knew it. The discussion was continued by Miss Francis, and Messrs. Fyson, Capleton, Kinsman, and Sands. The Rev. W. H. Drummond entered a plea against a tendency which one or two of the speakers had shown to belittle the very real brotherhood of the Church itself.

London: Stepney.—On and after Sunday next, May 4, the time of evening service at College Chapel is to be 6.30, instead of 7, as formerly. The monthly conferences on religious topics (first Sunday) will begin at 4.30.

Middlesbrough: The late Miss Emma Honor Fallows.—We regret to announce the death of Miss Emma H. Fallows, which took place on April 25 at the age of 74. She was the youngest daughter of the late W. Fallows, J.P., who is still referred to as "the Father of Middlesbrough," so important a part did he play in the development of the town, the river Tees, and its industries. Mr. Fallows and his family were largely responsible for the commencement of Unitarian worship when the town was little more than a hamlet. Throughout her long life, Miss Fallows has been actively associated with all the agencies of the church, teaching in its Sunday school for over thirty-three years, and identifying herself with all its interests. Even her deafness, which made it impossible for her to hear a single word spoken from the pulpit, never interfered with her regular attendance at the services. She had a pure and singular devotion to her church and her faith, and Christ Church is much the poorer through the loss of one so loyal to its aims and welfare. The deepest sympathy is felt with her eldest sister, who survives her. The funeral took place on April 27 in the presence of many representative townsmen, who thus honoured the memory of one of their oldest and most respected citizens.

Mossley.—Successful Sunday-school anniversary services were held last Sunday. The Rev. H. Fisher Short conducted morning service and Mr. Fred Maddison preached to crowded congregations in the afternoon and evening. The collections were over £52.

New Zealand: Auckland.—The Rev. R. J. Hall writes in his calendar for April:—"It will not, I think, be denied that we have received substantial benefit and made some advance as the result of the visit of Mr. and Mrs. Wooding. Are we going to make that benefit a permanent possession, or are we so slack that it will be dissipated and in the end be merely a memory? Admitting that the interest and enthusiasm during the visit were exceptional, it is open to us to convert our exceptions into normal happenings, since we recognise the results to have been good. If we will but direct it into useful channels there has been enough energy generated during the past fortnight to launch successfully many winter activities. When that energy has been exhausted I shall hope that interest in the activities for their own sake will have arisen to keep them moving still to better things. To the entire congregation I suggest that our benefit from the Sunday services is in proportion to the amount of interest and thought we give to them. Put no seed into the ground and it is vain to expect a crop. Put little interest into the services and what can be looked for save empty dissatisfaction. For our own welfare let us consider the level of attendance during the past fortnight as our future normal and remember that 'not failure, but low aim is crime.'"

Northampton.—At a Mayoral reception held in connection with the centennial meetings of the Northamptonshire Congregational Association, the Rev. W. C. Hall attended by invitation, and spoke, after the representation of the Free Church Council, expressing the congratulations and goodwill of the Northampton Unitarians.

North-East Lancashire Sunday School Union.—The annual musical festival of the Union was held at Todmorden last Saturday afternoon. The attendance was very good, and the solos and choruses were splendidly rendered, and reflect great credit on those responsible for the programme. The Rev. W. G. Topping, of Accrington, conducted the devotional service, and the President of the Union, Mr. A. Webster, gave an address on "Harmony." The conductor was Councillor T. Greenwood, and Mr. A. Barker presided at the organ.

Rochdale.—A beautiful marble tablet has been placed on the north wall of the Unitarian Church between the nearest window and the organ to the memory of the late Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Heape. The inscription runs as follows:—"In memory of Benjamin Heape, J.P., eldest son of the late Robert Taylor Heape, of Rochdale. Born, July 24, 1843; died, February 7, 1909. He was a life-long member of this church, one of the Trustees, and, in succession to his father, was for twenty years Chairman and Treasurer of the Trust. Also of Annie Jane Heape, his wife; born August 14, 1847, died December 12, 1904. This tablet has been erected by their children."

Sheffield.—Upperthorpe Chapel has been observing Health Week by special sermons and addresses. Last Sunday the Rev. A. H. Dolphin spoke on "Health—Individual and Social" at the morning service, and in the evening Mr. W. Sinclair, President of the Sheffield Health Association, gave an address on "Health and Holiness." On May 1, Dr. Sophia M. Witts lectured on "The Health of Children."

Torquay.—Notwithstanding the fact that the amount raised so far, £2,545, is much smaller than had been hoped, the committee of the congregation of Unity Church has decided to let the contract for building the new church to Messrs. E. P. Bovey & Son. The work has already been commenced, and the builders engage to complete it by the beginning of September. The architects are Messrs. Bridgman & Bridgman, of Torquay. The cost of the building will exhaust the money that has been received, leaving nothing in hand for furnishing the church and school-room, and several other necessary matters. An earnest appeal is made for further help, which we commend especially to any of our readers who have visited Torquay for health or pleasure.

Wakefield.—The Choir Festival at Westgate Chapel was held on Sunday, April 21, when Mrs. W. T. Davies, M.A., preached morning and evening. The collections amounted to nearly £7.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE LATE MR. JUSTIN MCCARTHY.

The late Justin McCarthy was a most lovable man, and a genial and happy companion, as incapable of losing his temper or becoming a bore as he was "pre-scientific" and indifferent to money. "Though, in a sense, a man of the study," says the Manchester Guardian, "he had seen life in two hemispheres, and had enjoyed it. He was never ill at ease, he had known all sorts and conditions of men, and he remembered them all. He found time to read everything and to talk to everybody. If may be said of him, with absolute assurance, that he never willingly wronged or pained any living thing. If he had no particular enthusiasms, he had no bile. He never wrote a bitter sentence. He never consciously put himself in another man's way. There was a fund of real chivalrous good-feeling in him, which was sometimes taken advantage of by men who were not worthy to black his shoes. A true Irish patriot, the Irish cause loses in him one of its most effective and unselfish servants."

* * *

"One who knew him" writes, in reference to his marriage, "Mr. McCarthy was a Roman Catholic, and Miss Allman a Unitarian, but the difference of religious opinion helped rather than hindered their devotion to each other. In these early days his marriage to a clever and high-minded woman was an important element in his social and literary success. . . . He knew books, but did not know things. He knew politicians, but he did not know politics—except Irish politics. He was essentially the man of letters. It used to be said of him that he had come down to the office from 'the seventh heaven of invention,' where he had been living among the scenes and people with which his imagination was dealing, and he had to wake up to the common world of politics and newspapers. But in waking up he brought with him a little of the glamour of the world of dreams, and wrote as a novelist and a man of large reading rather than as a soldier in the strife. This striking faculty of vivid and minute recollection of what he had read was of immense use to him as a literary lecturer. He would go down, say, to Edinburgh, to lecture on a literary or dramatic or even an historical subject. He went off without any preparation, arranged his ideas as he travelled, prepared, as Robert Hall said, 'a channel for his thoughts to run in,' and then spoke off the lecture without a note."

A CHILDREN'S GATHERING AT WINCHESTER.

A most attractive programme has been arranged for the Children's Gathering at Winchester, on May 6-9, in connection with the Parents' National Educational Union. There are to be walks and talks, scouting expeditions, addresses on delightful subjects such as "Fairy Tales and Arthurian Legends," and "The Time of the Singing of Birds," folk songs, morris dances, and a Historical Dress Party, in the course of which a procession will be formed, and Mrs. Clement Parsons will give the children a few descriptive words concerning the personages taking part. On Tuesday there will be a service in the Cathedral, when the Dean will give a special address. The annual meeting of the Union is announced to take place at University College, London, on May 14, when the Head-Master of Rugby will give an address on "Some Educational Ideals," and the Hon. Mrs. Franklin will make a short speech on the Children's Gathering. The chair will be taken by the Earl of Lytton.

STRINDBERG AND THE WRECK OF THE "TITANIC."

On the Continent, as well as here (says the Manchester Guardian), the story of how the band on the Titanic played "Nearer, my God, to Thee" has made a deep impression. In Stockholm the celebrated August Strindberg is slowly dying of cancer; at intervals, when he feels better, he reads the newspapers, and he was specially interested in the details of the disaster. When he first read about the band he was so struck by the report that, in spite of his weakness, he got up from his bed and dragged himself to the piano and improvised for some time on the pathetic tune of the hymn. It is also interesting to note that, according to a letter of one of his friends in a German paper, one of his regrets at his impending death is that he will not be able to carry out his plan of making a dramatic story of the British coalminers' strike.

A BUST OF JANE AUSTEN.

The name of Jane Austen will always be associated with Bath, which was her home for several years, and the scene of some of her best stories, and it is quite fitting that a bust of her, the gift and work of Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, should have been placed in the historic Pump Room which she so often visited. Miss Austen immortalised Bath in two of her novels—"Northanger Abbey" (for which a Bath publisher paid her £10, and then had not the courage to print the MSS.), and "Persuasion," yet it was not so much the scenic beauties of the place and neighbourhood that attracted her as its social atmosphere, and the manners and foibles of those who frequented the town. A landscape was, for Jane Austen, merely the background for the incidents and personalities she knew so well how to describe, and her vein of gentle satire had very little to do with the passionate love of nature which is characteristic of many modern writers. As a writer in The Times reminds us, she did not deal with great situations, deep sentiments, or stirring passions. In her letter declining the amazing suggestion of the Prince Regent and his librarian that she should write "an historical romance illustrative of the august House of Coburg," she says: "I could no more write a serious romance than an epic poem. I could not sit seriously down to write a serious romance under any other motive than to save my life; and if it were necessary for me to keep it up and never to relax into laughing at myself or at other people, I am sure I should be hung before I had finished the first chapter." That was Jane Austen's way, to laugh at herself and other people, and in the process of doing this she managed to make her descriptions of fashionable folk and their extraordinary activities redolent of the place they inhabited, without giving the least impression of having carefully worked up the local colour.

"HEALTH WEEK" THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY.

The National Health Week, which ends to-day, should bring home to English men and women in a convincing way the necessity for carrying on with vigour the great work of preventing disease by attacking at their source the evils which cause it to spread. It is part of the campaign, as yet only partially organised, against unhealthy social conditions and habits of life and diet which is being waged in so many different ways, and under so many different banners. Meetings have taken place this week in nearly 200 cities, towns and villages, exhibitions have been held, or educational visits paid to hospitals, public nurseries and other similar institutions, and much importance has been attached to the special instruction given to children in the elementary schools. At Warrington arrangements were made for all the factories to be stopped for half an hour on a certain day in order that the workpeople might have an opportunity of listening to informal talks on health and hygiene.

THE ETHICAL CHURCH,

46, QUEEN'S ROAD, BAYSWATER, W.

Sunday, May 5, at 11 a.m.

Mr. C. DELISLE BURNS, M.A.

"The Dreams of an Earthly Paradise."

" at 7 p.m.

"What is Religious Knowledge?"

Wednesday, May 8, at 8.30 p.m.

Dr. JOHN OAKESMITH.

"Browning's Place in English Poetry."

Friday, May 10, at 5.30 p.m.

Mr. G. E. O'DELL.

"The Positive Commandments."

ALL SEATS FREE.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,

ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
Miss ORME. HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

EUSTACE GORDON

(Manager for the Ulster Unitarian Christian Association),

BOOKSELLER, BOOKBINDER,
:: and STATIONER, etc. ::

Printing Well and Cheaply Executed.

Bookbinding orders carefully dealt with.

Second-hand Books searched for and reported free.

Orders received by post receive prompt attention.

35, ROSEMARY STREET, BELFAST.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by Christian Scientists.

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.

BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 135, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCs.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Reference kindly permitted to Rev and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z, INQUIRER OFFICE, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, LAYSARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

TO LET, Furnished, near Bournemouth, Lady's superior, well-kept house. Very pleasantly situated in select road on good elevation. Close to station, near church, shops, picturesque golf links. Piano, croquet, gas-cooker, plate, linen. Perfect sanitation. Fare, tram or train to Bournemouth, 2d. Small, careful party, 2½ guineas. Bargain. Trustworthy servant left.—Address C. P. INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE
& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

REMNANTS!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen. Big pieces for Teacloths, Travcloths, D'oyles, &c., only 2s. 6d. per bundle. Postage 4d. Irish Linen Bargain Catalogue Free. Write to-day.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming new Irish Linen Spring Costume Fabric, "Flaxzella." Washable, durable, looks smart for years; fascinating designs. All new shades. Write to-day.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

REAL NAVY SERGE direct from Portsmouth. As used Royal Navy, 1½, 1/6. Patterns free. Carriage paid.—JAMES BUCKLE, Serge Contractor, Portsmouth.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, May 4, 1912.

* Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3646.
NEW SERIES, No. 750.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 11, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.]

HANDBOOKS OF RELIGION

Cr. 8vo, 150 pp. 2s. net.

THE JEWISH RELIGION IN THE TIME OF JESUS

By Dr. G. HOLLMANN, of Halle.

Cr. 8vo, 176 pp. 2s. net.

THE SOURCES OF OUR KNOWLEDGE OF THE LIFE OF JESUS

By Prof. PAULE WERNLE, D.Th., of Basle.

Cr. 8vo, 200 pp. 2s. net.

PAUL: Study of His Life and Thought

By Prof. Dr. W. WREDE.

Cr. 8vo, 144 pp. 2s. net.

THE APOSTOLIC AGE

By Prof. E. VON DOBSCHUTZ, of Strasburg.

Cr. 8vo, 160 pp. 2s. net.

CHRIST: The Beginnings of Dogma

By Prof. JOHANNES WEISS, of Heidelberg.

BOOK ROOM, Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

THE ANNUAL MEETING

WILL BE HELD AT
Essex Hall, Essex Street, W.C.

ON THURSDAY, MAY 16, 1912.

Speakers: Dr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., President; CHAS. HAWKSLEY, Esq., President of the B. & F. U. A.; Rev. H. GOW, B.A., President of the Provincial Assembly; F. D. BOWLES, Esq., H. B. LAWFORD, Esq., Rev. J. A. PEARSON and others.

Tea and Coffee, 7.30 p.m. Chair to be taken at 8 p.m.

RONALD BARTRAM, Hon. Sec.

PECKHAM.

A SALE OF WORK

(in aid of Church Funds)

WILL BE HELD IN

THE SCHOOLROOM, BELLENDEN ROAD,

on Saturday, May 18, 1912,

at 3.30 p.m.

Contributions of any kind will be very acceptable.—Address, (Mrs.) A. HAYWARD, Sec. Ladies' Working Party, 93, Chadwick-road, Peckham, S.E.

PEARL ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000

Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHRUBSALL, } Directors.

OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS FOR THE NONCONFORMIST MINISTRY.

DR. WILLIAMS'S TRUSTEES offer for open competition Undergraduate Scholarships, tenable in the University of Glasgow only; and Divinity Scholarships for Graduates, tenable in any approved School of Theology or University. The scholarships are open to students of all Denominations preparing for the Nonconformist Ministry. For particulars apply to the SECRETARY, DR. WILLIAMS'S LIBRARY, Gordon-square, London, W.C., before May 30.

SAMUEL JONES FUND. — The Managers meet annually in October for the purpose of making Grants.

APPLICATIONS must, however, be in hand not later than WEDNESDAY, JUNE 12, and must be on a form to be obtained from EDWIN W. MARSHALL, Secretary, 38, Barton-arcade, Manchester.

Presbyterian Chapel, Newbury, Berks (1664-1697).

For more than 200 years the Old Meeting at Newbury has stood for freedom and progress in an isolated situation, and has strenuously upheld Unitarian principles. It is one of our oldest places of worship, and is greatly in need of repairs and beautifying. It is intended to hold a Sale of Work on Wednesday, June 26, and the members of the congregation, who have been working during the past year, have accumulated a stock of saleable goods, but not sufficient to realise the amount required. They earnestly appeal to sister churches to help them with goods, money, and patronage—which will be gratefully acknowledged by the Hon. Sec. and the Treasurer, Sale of Work Committee, Miss STILLMAN, Marsh Cottage, Newbury. Mrs. NEWELL, *Arthur Road, Newbury, and the Minister, Rev. RICHARD NEWELL.

* Note change of address.

UNIVERSITY HALL,

Gordon Square, W.C.

(Between Russell Square and Euston Square.)

Services at 11.15 and 7.

PREACHERS:

May 12—Morning: Rev. F. H. JONES, B.A. (Librarian of Dr. Williams' Library, London).

Evening: Rev. GORDON COOPER, B.A. (of Mansford Street Mission).

„ 19.—Rev. DENDY AGATE, B.A. (of Altrincham).

„ 26.—Morning: Rev. HERBERT MC-LACHLAN, M.A. (Warden of the Home Missionary College, Manchester).

Evening: Rev. H. D. ROBERTS (of Hope Street Church, Liverpool).

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL, AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.

—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad.

Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon). Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

NEAR PARIS, Penylan, Avenue

Ernest Renan, Montreuil s. bois, Seine. High, shady grounds. Mme. DAVIES, née Mirault (French teacher), receives boarders, holidays or otherwise. Trams all parts Paris.

CROW'S NEST.—Mr. E. W. LUMMIS

proposes to take a party to Eastern Switzerland in August. Inclusive cost: a fortnight abroad, 14 guineas; a month abroad, 19 guineas. Persons wishing to join should write early to 15, Green-street, Cambridge.

The Inquirer.

April 27th contains the following:—

“Bergson and Theology.” By Prof G. DAWES HICKS, Litt.D.

“Bergson.” By Rev. L. P. JACKS, M.A.

“Christianity and the Moral Ideal.” By Canon A. L. LILLEY.

“The Social Challenge to the Church.” By Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

“Unemployment.” JOHN WARD, M.P.

“Prayer.” Rev. S. H. MELLONE, M.A., D.Sc.

“Loyalty in Religion.” Rev. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D.

“Women's Work in the Churches.” By Mrs. SYDNEY MARTINEAU.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, May 12.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN.
 Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. G. C. CRESSEX, D.D.
 Child's Hill, All Souls', Weech-road, Finchley-road, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. E. E. COLEMAN, M.A.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D. Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11, Rev. Dr. DAWES HICKS; 7, Rev. R. K. DAVIS, B.A.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11 and 7, Rev. ARTHUR HURN.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Rev. JOHN ELLIS; 6.30, Mr. W. R. HOLLOWAY.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15 and 7, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, M.A.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. J. E. STRONGE.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. CRITCHLEY, B.A.
 Ilford, High-road, 11, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.; 7, Rev. JOSEPH WILSON.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Rev. Dr. TUDOR JONES.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11 and 6.30, Rev. F. HANKINSON.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 and 7, Rev. C. ROPER, B.A.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. F. H. JONES, B.A.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. W. ROBSON, B.D.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. F. W. G. FOAT, Litt.D., M.A.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLOR.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Rev. GORDON COOPER; 6.30, Rev. JOHN ELLIS.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C., 11.15, Rev. F. H. JONES, B.A.; 7, Rev. GORDON COOPER, B.A.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
 Wimbledon, 27b, Merton-road, 7, Mr. Wm. LEE, B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11 and 7, Rev. JOSEPH WILSON.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. FRED. BROCKWAY.
 ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30, Supply.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. WOOD.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. JAMES HARWOOD, B.A.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30.
 BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45, Scholars' Service; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAM JONES, M.A.
 BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. V. D. DAVIS.

BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, M.A.

BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. GEORGE WARD.

BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.

CAMBRIDGE, Assembly Hall, Downing-street, 11.30, Rev. E. W. LUMMIS, M.A.

CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street, 6.30, Mr. P. E. HART.

CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.

CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. CHARLES PEACH.

{ DEAN ROW, 10.45 and
 { STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS, M.A.

DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GNEVER.

DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.

EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.

GEE CROSS, 11, Rev. H. E. DOWSON; 6.30, Rev. E. H. PICKERING.

HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS and Rev. H. W. KING.

HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.

LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. HERBERT McILACHLAN, M.A., B.D.

LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30.

LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.

LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. CHARLES CRADDOCK.

LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. G. TOPPING.

LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. S. RUSSELL, B.A.

MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, Rusholme, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WHITAKER.

MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. DOUGLAS WALMSLEY, B.A., of Windermere.

MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. ALEXANDER FARQUHARSON.

NEW BRIGHTON and LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. ALFRED HALL, M.A.

NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.

OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. E. I. FRIPP, B.A.

PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.

PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.

PRESTON, Unitarian Church, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVERS.

SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. F. H. VAUGHAN, B.A.

SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11, Rev. J. W. COCK; 6.30, Rev. LEONARD SHORT.

SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.

SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. NICOL CROSS, M.A.

SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.

TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11, Rev. G. B. STALLWORTHY; 6.30, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.

WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

RE-ENGAGEMENT as Housekeeper or Secretary - Housekeeper, lady's or gentleman's household; experienced, capable, highest references; or would manage Institution or Club.—Address C., 20, Alyth-gardens, Golder's Green, London, N.W.

NURSE - ATTENDANT seeks re-engagement. Disengaged June 15.—BISS, 44, Montpelier-rise, Golder's Green.

CLEANING or CHARING.—A couple of days' work per week wanted by member of one of our London Missions, who has, for years, done work of this kind at houses of well-known members of our churches. Highest references can be given.—Apply to "X," INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-strand, Strand, W.C.

A LADY, who has given her interest for many years to the needs of Poor Working Ladies, appeals for donations towards the same. Particulars given.—Mrs. HENRY WILSON, Farnborough, Kent.

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY."—Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda. Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 1½d.—1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to EDITOR, "Dove-stone," Denton-road, Gorton, Manchester.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	323
VERSES : Browning's Centenary	324
THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT :—
Our Sources of Refreshment and Renewal	325
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS :—
Browning's Teaching on Immortality	326
Robert Browning in Relation to his Age and our Own	327

A Closer View	329
The Royal Academy	329
CORRESPONDENCE :—
The Social Challenge to the Church	330
FOR THE CHILDREN :—
Notes from "The High Nest,"—II.	331
MEMORIAL NOTICE :—
The late Mr. Samuel Bourne	331

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES :—
London Domestic Mission Society	332
Hope Street Church, Liverpool	333
Moral Education and the Curriculum	333
British and Foreign Unitarian Association	334
The Sunday-School Association	334
NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	335
NOTES AND JOTTINGS	336

 All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE birth of Robert Browning a hundred years ago was fittingly commemorated on Tuesday by the service in Westminster Abbey, where the poet lies buried. Many people visited the Poets' Corner during the morning, and the stone was covered with wreaths, laurels, and palms which had come from societies or individual admirers in many parts of the United Kingdom and America. The short service included special music by Sir Hubert Parry, Sir Frederick Bridge's setting of Mrs. Browning's "He giveth His beloved sleep," and the "Allegro Spirituoso" by Galuppi. A meeting was held afterwards in Westminster College Hall, presided over by Lord Crewe, at which addresses were given by Bishop Boyd Carpenter, Mr. Ernest Hartley Coleridge, grandson of S. T. Coleridge; Miss Emily Hickey, one of the founders of the Browning Society, and others. The Council Chamber of Caxton Hall was crowded in the evening, when a meeting under the auspices of the Academic Committee of the Royal Society of Literature was held, Mr. Edmund Gosse being in the chair. Sir Arthur Pinero, who spoke on "Browning as a Dramatist," pointed out rather drastically that Browning had utterly failed to conquer the stage, his method of unpacking the human heart with words being wholly unadapted to the comprehension of a theatrical audience. Mr. Henry James, who rarely appears in public, delivered a fine address upon "The Novel in 'The Ring and the Book,'" which was full of subtle phrases and instinct with exquisite feeling.

At the College Hall meeting Bishop Boyd Carpenter took the audience into his confidence as to the manner in which he had learnt to understand and appreciate

Browning. It was, he said, the result of reading him aloud, and he believed it was true of all poetry that its meaning and beauty were never fully brought out and conveyed to the mind unless it was read aloud. "If when we read alone and in silence we are moved to admiration or feel our emotions deeply stirred," he said, "how much more vivid are our impressions when the words which moved us are interpreted by the living voice. Then the ear adds powerful witness to what the eye has reported. Indeed, if we reflect, is it not to the ear rather than to the eye that the poet appeals? Else, what is the significance of metre, accent, rhythm, and rhyme, if they are not meant to be musical measures of which the ear is the true arbiter?"

PROBABLY most true lovers of poetry follow habitually the practice which the Bishop commended to his hearers, and we believe that it is one which would bring unexpected delight to many who assume too easily that they cannot understand or enjoy even the lyrics of Browning. So much depends on the vibrations of the voice and the thrill of emotion, on "the glimmer, the fragrance, the spirit of all intense literature" which lies in its rhythm, and which the written word cannot convey adequately to any save the most sensitive minds. "I have just heard a poem spoken with so delicate a sense of its rhythm," wrote W. B. Yeats years ago, "with so perfect a respect for its meaning, that if I were a wise man and could persuade a few people to learn the art I would never open a book of verses again."

THE news of the death of the Bishop of Truro will be received with feelings of deep regret far beyond the limits of the Anglican communion. It may be truly said of him that he owed his position not to his eminence as a scholar or a theologian, but to the strength and range of his popular sympathies. As vicar of Gras-borough for thirteen years, he identified himself prominently with the cause of the agricultural labourer, and later, in Liverpool, he upheld the ideal of Christian citizenship with a breadth of view and a courageous optimism which won the deep respect of men of all parties and creeds. As a Christian Socialist he was the lineal descendant of Maurice and Kingsley, whose influence moulded both his theology and his social dreams. But he also sat at the feet of Mazzini, and became the ardent interpreter of Mazzini's message of patriotism, with its lofty moral appeal to a generation which was beginning to forget. Perhaps a remote bishopric and the work of an administrator were hardly the best reward for gifts of this special quality; but it is something that they should have been recognised in high places at all, where average opinions and ecclesiastical prudence are usually held to be essential to high office.

THERE was a note of warning in Mr. Asquith's speech at the annual dinner of the Central Association of Bankers on Wednesday night, which was none the less significant because it referred to facts which have become the commonplaces of every discussion on national affairs. We refer to his remarks about those "signs in the industrial sky which ought to warn us against a temper of complacent optimism." Although the past twelve months had made up a year of almost unexampled prosperity in British trade, "rarely in the experience of the memory of any of us," the Premier said, "have the relations between capital and labour been more severely strained, especially in those industries whose regular continuance is the indispensable condition of the welfare and even of the life of our country."

REFERRING to the railway strike of last year and the coal strike of the present spring, Mr. Asquith continued:—"May I say to you in all seriousness that the recurrence of incidents such as these makes it our duty—the duty not only of the Government but equally of the great business community and all you who represent the bankers of the United Kingdom and are the centre and mainspring of its business—to look beneath the surface, not to be dazzled or misled by mere figures, but to distinguish between the money and the real value of advances, whether in wages or in progress, and above all to study our economic fabric, with all its indefinite and ever-growing complexity, not piecemeal but as a whole.” The dissatisfaction in South Wales owing to the disagreements which have taken place in connection with the meetings of the District Board under the Minimum Wage Act, and the resentment caused by Lord St. Aldwyn’s ruling in favour of the owners’ proposals, reminds us that such public utterances are not merely idle talk, and that they are based on a state of affairs which still gives cause for disquietude and earnest thought.

* * *

THE Bishop of London, in his Presidential address at the opening of the London Diocesan Conference, took up a vigorous and uncompromising attitude in regard to the recent strike which brought his hearers back to essential facts, and, we hope, helped them to realise the absolute dependence of all human beings alike on the divine forces which supply us with the necessities of life. The coal, he said, did not belong to the owners or miners; it was God’s coal which He had stored up through long ages for His children of to-day. The owners represented those who had sunk, and, he supposed, were sinking, vast sums in making that coal accessible. The miners were the men without whose brawny muscles and trained skill that gift of God would also be shut away from us. They were jointly a band of God’s children, holding the coal “in trust,” to distribute it to His other children. Was it conceivable that, if the question was looked at from that point of view, no solution could be found?

* * *

AND if they did not look at it from that point of view, whose fault was it except the fault of the Christian Church? The Church ought to have preached more effectively to both classes the Gospel of Christ, and the measure of the disaster was the measure of their failing. Many better men than himself would disagree with him, but he held strongly himself that the first charge upon any industry ought to be the wages of the people who carry it on—that they had seen too many fortunes made with sweated labour; that it was a Christian principle that “the labourer is worthy of his hire,” and that if an industry could not be carried on except at starvation wages, it was morally better for the nation that it should not be carried on at all.

BROWNING’S CENTENARY.

HEART of the World! Its every piston beat
In thy great bosom
Broke out to music, for the strong or weak;
Yea, and we heard the voiceless victim speak,
And at thy song saw even the Desert blossom
Woman and child,
Down-trodden to death, looked up at thee and smil’d.

Harp of a thousand strings! Each influence fair,
Grace of wild grasses
On wind-swept fields, all heaven—thy native air
The human soul, are thine—the star is a stair,
And the whole earth stands still when Pippa Passes.
The noble and poor
Were friends, and none knocked vainly at thy door.

Rounding the cosmos in its comet sweep,
Thy wisdom tells us
Marvels of waking hours or mystic sleep;
What sky unscaled by thee, what dreadful deep
Not sketched at first in Saul and Paracelsus?

Sordello sung
The earliest notes, whereon worlds after hung.

Stern tragedies of truth, Strafford and Charles
Joust in death’s tourney,
And at their mighty heels the whipt pack snarls;
Duchess meets beggar-maid, lords jostle carls—
Earth is thy stage, and like the sun’s thy journey.
Nothing too small,
Nothing too great—thy kingdom gathers all.

Blot in the ‘scutcheon, beauty ’midst the mean—
Some ray supernal,
And upon frailty battlements that lean;
While out of shadows common and unclean,
Foul dust and dregs, shine forth new shapes eternal.
Men’s banners wave
Round thrones, but heaven’s o’er one Grammarian’s Grave.

Thou universal man! Rabbi and clown
Fifine, all ages,
Monarch and monk, the scholar in squalid gown;
Youth’s love and laughter, eld with puckered frown—
All climes and seasons, march across thy stages.
Lost Edens glow
And live again, to vanish at cockerow

Abt Vogler, Sludge and Setebos, the Pope,
Giuseppe, Guido,
Muckrake and crown, the pearls and hangman’s rope
Come at thy call, but nothing without hope—
Aye, lurks in damndest crime some saving credo.
Infernos, death,
Give up their secrets, at thy magic breath.

Heart of the world! Even as with Prospero’s wand
Rose new creation,
So didst thou summon realms from the Beyond;
And, that no soul should ever quite despond,
Thou hast for each some separate revelation.
That giant form,
Which played with children, yet could ride the storm.

By Shakespeare’s side, co-equal, dost thou sit
At fame’s white portal;
Thou maker of fresh heavens and earths, most fit
With Homer and Dante from the infinite
To open windows vast, and be immortal.
Through rosy rents
In thy great heart, we win new continents.

F. W. ORDE WARD.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT

OUR SOURCES OF REFRESHMENT AND RENEWAL.

BY THE REV. JOHN HUNTER, D.D.

"He shall drink of the brook in the way; therefore shall he lift up the head."—Psalm cx. 7.

TRADITION has ascribed this Psalm to David, but it is, perhaps, better understood when we read it as the production of one of David's devoted followers. To treat it as one of the Messianic Psalms and believe that it finds a certain true and large fulfilment in Jesus Christ, we are not required to ignore or deny its basis of contemporary fact. The higher reaches of the human imagination are ever full of prophecy, and no prophecy of scripture, we are told, is of private or particular interpretation.

In the latter part of the Psalm the King is represented as engaged in conflict. At a wayside stream he quenches his thirst, and is thus enabled with revived ardour to continue the pursuit of the enemy. "He shall drink of the brook in the way; therefore shall he lift up the head." In the olden days of warfare and travel what a thing of beauty and blessing was the brook by the way! And to-day, as yesterday, it is a true and lovely symbol of all those influences, natural and spiritual, which refresh and renew the inner life.

In this strange pilgrimage that we call human life, what traveller does not sigh, now and again, for the brook by the way! The great human necessities are not confined to any condition or time, yet it would seem that never, as now, was there such need of the influences which refresh and restore. How restless and intense our life! How killing the pace! How constant and keen the conflict! How many temptations to forget the early dream and inspiration, and to let the fine power and ardour of youth waste away into vulgar prudence! How soon we begin to mourn over the fading of enthusiasm, even in the best work, and the loss of freshness of spirit in dealing with the duties involved in the manifold relations of life. How much there is around us, not only to quicken thought but to dissipate it, not only to arouse energy, but to exhaust it! There are special seasons also, times of strain and trial, when zest and zeal pass away, and duty wears the forbidding look of drudgery, and we walk slowly and wearily where once we marched swiftly and full of hope.

Brooks by the way! The heart asks for them, and the God in whom we trust, the Shepherd of our pilgrimage, has placed them within our reach. The wilderness of our discipline is not a dry and waste howling one. It has its Elims, as well as its Marahs, its green pastures and quiet waters, as well as its valleys of the shadow of death. How they abound, these springs and streams of refreshment, these good and gracious influences which take the fever and fret out of the heart, restore the soul, renew the beauty and joy of life, and make us feel in every part of our being the healing touch of the Infinite Strength and Peace!

(1) In one of his letters, Nathaniel Hawthorne speaks about bathing himself in

"the refreshing waters of solitude and open-air nature," and there is no season of the year in which we may not find this source of rest and refreshment for the mind and heart. The Creation may always be our recreation. To be in love with this beautiful world is to be at the secret source of many a noble pleasure. To have a mind and heart open to the highest impressions of the natural universe, to be able to enter into the life of a summer or winter day, to enjoy a night of stars, to feel the beauty of a flower, the grandeur of a storm, the spell of the wide waters or the high mountains, is to have abundant means of recovery and renewal always nigh at hand, whenever we feel the need of calling ourselves off for a while from the excitement and strain of the daily conflict. It is true, nature does not yield the sympathy which the passionate human heart requires, but insensibly she helps her lovers to bear their burdens and to find rest in God. We are quickened and comforted by outward things more than we know. The sun and moon and stars, unaffected by our little controversies, rebuke and soothe us as we gaze on their tranquil glory. The mountains bring peace and our fretfulness is carried away by the rushing river at our feet. Not only in the synagogue did Jesus find refreshment, but in the lilies of the field, in the sunset sky, among the hills and by the lake of Galilee. In his suggestive journal, Amiel, describing a country walk taken when a dark and troubled mood was upon him, thus writes: "The sunlight, the green leaves, the sky, all whispered to me, 'Be of good cheer and courage, poor, wounded one.'" We are all at times poor, wounded ones, needing all the refreshment and healing we can find. And,

"What simple joys from simple sources spring."

The quiet ministry of nature, the play of natural influences upon us, may be full of renewing grace. Beyond the satisfaction of taste and sentiment, this experience which we call contact and communion with nature, may be a gain to the whole spiritual being; soothing and relieving mental pain, quickening a more hopeful spirit, nourishing all finer feelings, and, like every deep human experience, taking the soul into the presence of the Eternal.

Let us make the most and the best of this source of refreshment and renewal. We are sent into the world, not only to solve its problems, fight its battles, and put away its sin by the sacrifice of ourselves, but to find joy and rest; and through rest and joy, the deepening and enlargement of our life. There is a religious as well as an irreligious worldliness. "All things are yours, . . . the world and things present."

(2) In the familiar saying of Herder, in his last illness: "Give me a great thought that I may refresh myself with it," we find the suggestion of a second source of refreshment and renewal. We have at our constant command the greatest thought, the highest wisdom, the finest feeling of the teachers and leaders of mankind. The world's best literature abounds with thoughts that are full of pure refreshment and healing life. If the supreme test of inspiration be the power to inspire, then, how many inspiring books it is, or may be, our privilege to know—books which transfigure the world to our thought, give a noble and divine interpretation to life, furnish the mind with new interests, refresh and renew the heart, and are an open road to the purest and most enduring of earthly enjoyments. The joy which Longfellow said he found in the sympathetic study of Dante is within reach of all. Almost any day and hour we may leave the hot and dusty highway and the field of contention, for the peace and freshness of some great book that ministers to all that is best in us. Why should life be the dry and thirsty land it is to so many, when all around us in shining garments stand the poets and prophets of God, waiting to lead us to fountains of living waters?

It was a saying of Matthew Arnold that the noblest nations are those which know how to make the best use of poetry. It is pitiful that so many of us, in the rush of our lives, leave ourselves with such little time for the reading of our finer poetic literature. Our characters are suffering in consequence. Like religion, we need poetry which is, indeed, a part of religion, to save us from the tyranny of influences which vulgarise and harden life. We need it for instruction, for it is, as Wordsworth said, the breath and finer spirit of all knowledge: we need it above all for the refreshment and joy it yields,—the refreshment and joy of elevated and elevating thought.

(3) In the first book of Samuel we read that, "When the evil spirit was upon Saul, that David took an harp and played with his hand: so Saul was refreshed, and was well." Not only literature, but all true and noble art may be an influence that soothes the healthy, as well as the sick and morbid mind, and be, not only the opiate, which, alas! it too often is, that induces a base forgetfulness, but a pure and blessed source of refreshment in earnest souls. What wonderful power music and song, eloquence and painting, have always had to move the souls of men! By ministering to the higher nature they reinforce mind and body, and by quickening the spiritual imagination remand much of what would otherwise disquiet and dishearten, to its own obscurity and insignificance. There is no more desirable a thing than a good hobby. The violin and organ, for instance, have been to many a brook in the way that has refreshed and nourished an ideal life.

(4) Let a sentence from George MacDonald point out another river of the water of life at which we may often drink and be refreshed: "To know a man who can be trusted will do more for one's moral nature than all the books of divinity that were ever written." The beauty of the outward world is full of divine help, but there is more beauty and more inspiration in living excellence than in the fairest natural scenes. Wonderfully refreshing is the heart's speech of the truly wise and good, but more beneficent is the brave thought when it becomes the brave deed, and more live-giving the Divine Word when it is made flesh and dwells among us. How rich the requicken- ing and renewing influences which come from the presence and example of men who lift clearly before us the nobler ideals of life; from the memory of the faithful dead, and from the biographic page!

Bright affluent spirits, breathing but to bless,
Whose presence cheers men's eyes and warms their hearts,
Whose lavish goodness this old world renews,
Like the free sunshine and the liberal air.

Blessed beyond all price is the friendship that stimulates us to do our best, that is potent to dispel morbid broodings, to cheer and brighten life, and that helps us even by its unconscious influence, to look at things in a larger and better way. And there we find the truest use of the study of biography. Every good and faithful life with which we become acquainted is a positive addition to our moral power, to those influences which in days of depression, when stupor creeps over us and weariness, revive hope and arouse energy. Take Sir Walter Scott as he is revealed to us in his Journals and in Lockhart's Life. It is hardly possible to touch this man's life at any point without receiving some new accession of life to ourselves; without learning the wisdom of taking things as they are and making the best of them; without feeling our own cares lightening and ourselves girt up for the toilsome march.

(5) The wise and religious culture of the home affections will disclose many brooks by the way, full of the very water of life that flows from the throne and heart of God. When the Heavenly Father ordained that we should live in families, He placed within our reach sources of happiness and strength that from age to age have been as springs in the desert. It is in the home we must seek to cherish and renew our best life. We are far from having exhausted its possibilities. We lose much that is refreshing indeed if we neglect to cultivate its quiet and simple pleasures. We must not get too fond of outside excitements and sacrifice the family to week-end change, to evenings at clubs, concerts, and theatres, and the like. Let us have as many quiet evenings and quiet Sundays at home as we possibly can. The late John Richard Green wrote just before his death: "What seems to me to grow fairer as life goes by, is just the love and tenderness of it, the laughter of little children, the simple talk by the fireside, and the quiet, helpful companionship of true and tried friends."

(6) "What do we live for, if not to make life less difficult for each other?" is a saying of George Eliot's that indicates another pure and unfeigned source of refreshment and renewal. Sympathy gives us new interests. It is impossible to feel life dull and vacant if we fill it with unselfish cares and helpful activities. We must have our share of the sorrow and bitterness of life, and grow familiar with the pain of sacrifice. It is a discipline we cannot spare, if we would be perfect. But in our darkest and most depressed hours there is always one source of comfort nigh at hand—we can do something for others. There may be seasons when we cannot find help for ourselves, but there is no season when we cannot give help. And this giving of help will, in due time, bring its reward. Soon shall we prove, in our own experience, the truth of the Saviour's word, "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

Shakespeare, you may remember, makes Orlando say, "O how bitter a thing it is, to look into happiness through another man's eyes!" But we must cultivate the very opposite feeling and learn to rejoice in another man's happiness as if it were our own. A woman who had known sore straits and great adversities once said: "When my own life was barest and saddest, the sight of other people's good fortunes always gave me pleasure." To have and to keep sympathy like that is to have a real share in all the good things that are going, to be partakers in the gladness of men and women and children everywhere.

(7) "There is a river the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God, the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High." We must seek, as our fathers did, the perennial springs of refreshment that are to be found in the private and public ordinances of religion. The excitements and exhaustions of modern life make this duty even more imperative. Industry and enterprise are good; but life is not only action, it is thought and feeling also. We do ourselves the greatest wrong if we allow our activities to crowd meditation and prayer out of our days, and to rob us of the secret of rest in God. To have depth and elevation and tranquillity in life, and the aim kept high and the impulse true and steady, it is absolutely necessary for mind and heart to have constant access to the Source of inspiration. It is a moral calamity to lose the meditative and worshipful spirit. Reverence, faith, and aspiration are the springs of noble and fruitful living. Sunday and the Church stand for our highest life. They invite us to drink of waters that rise from cool and unpolluted depths. They offer an opportunity of finding that truest rest and recreation which come through mental and spiritual quickening and uplifting, and of verifying the word of prophecy—"They who wait on the Lord shall renew their strength."

(8) "Come unto Me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest—Take My yoke upon you and learn of Me, for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls." This invitation, so large and sweet and tender, and which needs to be made clear and impressive to each succeeding generation, is an invitation to seek refreshment and renewal through trust and obedience. In the fellowship of Jesus Christ we lose our ignorant and guilty fears and our selfish and vexing cares: we find a Heavenly Father; we learn to take a gracious view of life, even of its hardest circumstances, and to be at peace with things; we come to love the will of God and to rejoice in the good of others, as if it were our own; we enter into the Saviour's sense of immortality, and are persuaded that in the body and out of the body we are compassed about by the atmosphere of Infinite Love. What can refresh the weary heart and life like the spiritual persuasions, the great trusts and hopes which are the secret of Jesus, and which He communicates to all who put themselves under His influence and seek to live in the communion of His spirit? How the words, spoken more than nineteen centuries ago near Jacob's well, interpret our spiritual experience to-day! "Whosoever drinketh of the water I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into eternal life." Yes! It is the joy and the glory of Jesus to lead us to Him who is the Giver, the ultimate Giver, of every good and perfect gift, the unseen Source of all our happiness and peace. "All my springs are in Thee." "My heart and my flesh faileth, but God is the strength of my heart and my portion for ever."

(9) The late Dr. Max Müller quotes in one of his letters a very ancient prayer of two friends: "May God protect us both and may He enjoy us both." Let us seek to have this sense of care for the joy of God. To hold our lives at so exalted a level that the Father Himself might be glad in them, is to be free of the House of many Mansions, partakers of the blessedness of the universe.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

BROWNING'S TEACHING ON IMMORTALITY.

THE clearest note in Browning's philosophy is his optimism. Now, to minds overwhelmed by the contemplation of the appalling suffering of the world there is nothing more repellent than the shallow optimistic theorising which makes light of misery that does not touch the theoriser, and talks glibly of exaggeration in notions of the woes of others; and there is nothing less convincing than the facile faith which seems to be maintained chiefly by the evasion of arguments which tell against its conclusions. Browning's optimism, however, is not of this kind. It is not gained by a refusal to look at the dark side of things. There is nothing too dreadful in life to be portrayed in his poems; records of sin and horror abound in his pages, and have sometimes repelled readers who take up his works for the first time. Nor does he ignore the considerations to be urged on the side of his adversaries: no critic can taunt him with shallowness of thought. When we ask the grounds of Browning's optimism in a world where evil so often seems triumphant, we find that it depends for its force on his firm belief in immortality. "God's in His Heaven, all's right with the world!" says the peasant girl, Pippa, in her simple piety, and Browning the Philosopher echoes her view, because of the heritage of immortality to which the men and women of the world are born. With him, good and bad cannot be weighed against one another, cannot be in any way understood when immortality is left out of account. The future life is not thought of as a means of remedying inequalities that without it would be unjust: it is no mere scheme of rewards and punishments, but it interfuses our present life, completely changing its significance, so that what seems only harmful is recognised at last as merely good in the making. Given this, values are altered: "Worst were best, defeat were triumph, utter loss were utmost gain."

The stress laid upon the doctrine of immortality runs through all Browning's work, and numerous passages bearing upon it will at once occur to the memory. In "Old Pictures on Florence," from the very imperfections of modern humanity the uplifting thought is drawn that development unlimited still lies before us. Something created perfect has no future before it, no further development is possible; but immaturity argues growth, and plus the imperfect may rank as greater than any present completeness—"the Artificer's hand is not arrested with us." Our nature is for eternity.

"We are faulty—why not? We have time in store."

In the well-known "Rabbi ben Ezra," the Rabbi teaches that the very disappointments and disillusionings of life bid us hope. Immaturity of power, failure to achieve, are promises of a finer future:

"What I aspired to be
And was not, comforts me."

In "Saul" we have the same idea when David says:—

"'Tis not what man Does which exalts him, but what man Would do."

In the "Grammarian's Funeral" again we are shown that the great spirits of earth work not for time, but for eternity.

But if the thought of unending progress supplies the key to some of the most perplexing of all Life's riddles, how is it that it is not made plain to us that our earthly life is but a stage in the great career of our souls? Why should Immortality be a glorious hope rather than a proved certainty? This is the main question debated in the beautiful poem of "La Saisiaz." While staying one autumn at La Saisiaz, above Geneva, Browning and his sister had with them as guest a lady who died suddenly one night of heart disease. The shock drove the poet to examine afresh the grounds of his faith, and, in the midst of the beauties of mountain and lake, he turned again to probe into the mysteries of life and death.

It is the hope of immortality, he declares, that makes our present life worth leading, it is this hope alone that makes it possible to believe at once in the infinite power and the goodness of God. Without it

"There is no reconciling wisdom with a world distraught, Goodness with triumphant evil, power with failure in the aim."

Without it he is bound to admit that sorrow and not joy preponderates in life. But "Only grant a second life I acquiesce

In this present life as failure, count misfortune's worst assault
Triumph, not defeat, assured that loss so much the more exalts
Gain about to be. For at what moment did I so advance

Near to knowledge as when frustrate of escape from ignorance?

Did not beauty prove most precious when its opposite obtained,

Rule and truth seem more than ever potent because falsehood reigned?

While for love—oh how but, losing love, does whoso loves succeed

By the death-pang to the birth-throe—learning what is love indeed?

Only grant my soul may carry high through death her cup unspilled,

I shall boast it mine—the balsam, bless each kindly wrench that wrung

From life's tree its utmost virtue, tapped the root whence pleasure sprung,

Barked the bole, and broke the bough, and bruised the berry, left all grace

Ashes in death's stern alembic, loosed elixir in its place!"

But if the perception of life as unending progress so completely changes the outlook, would it not, Browning asks himself, be the greatest gain to suffering men and women if they had an intuitive certainty of a future life as clear as that of the existence of their own souls and of God? He answers that our world would at once lose its importance. Life on earth would no longer be prized, and in times of disappointment and rebuff man would gladly escape from it to the realities beyond. It is through our struggle here that we grow mentally and morally. But the struggle would be shorn of reality with the end of the fight always clearly in view. We discern dimly now that good must conquer in the end, but to see good plainly victorious would be a different matter. There would be no virtue in doing good, when it was patently to a man's profit to act rightly. As things are, it is the liberty of doing evil that gives doing good a grace, but under the new conditions free-will, which makes man what he is, would become a meaningless phrase.

It is the same view that the Christian believer reaches in the poem of "Easter Day," when he says that with the issues before our eyes no real choice is possible, and right conduct is no more to be praised in the moral life than the drawing of breath.

So though man is great and his lot happy through his hope of immortality, he is a greater being and not a less because immortality is discerned through the eye of faith, and is not grasped as an assured certainty.

In moments of exaltation, however, Browning shows that a clearer vision may come. In his hour of rapture he makes the musician, Abt Vogler, attain the assurance

"There shall never be one lost good!

What was shall live as before;

The evil is null, is nought, is silence implying sound;

What was good shall be good, with, for evil so much good more;

On the earth, the broken arcs: in the heaven a perfect round."

This confidence is for the rare moments of ecstasy. For our daily needs, a great probability is all that is wanted.

EMILY COX.

ROBERT BROWNING IN RELATION TO HIS AGE AND OUR OWN.

THE Centenary of Robert Browning's birth, celebrated last Tuesday, invites us to think of his teaching, and to consider the relation of his age to our own. The prevailing note of his poetry was optimism. He was not a man who took life easily, and lived immersed in beauty, apart from the struggles of men. He was a stern and rugged warrior; he found life often difficult and painful; he was ever a fighter, one who knew the power of temptation, the weakness of the will, the dangers of the conflict. He was a man who had loved and sorrowed much. He was not, indeed, much concerned with social miseries and injustice. Misery in the mass did not appeal to his imagination or his sympathies. Like Shakespeare, he did not distinguish between the masses and the mob. "One half Rome" and "the other half Rome" were terms expressing folly and incompetence. It was the individual life, in all its complexity, with all its possibilities of ruin or of victory, with its subtle temptations, its varying temperament, for which he cared. In separate men and women, with all their bewildering differences and contradictions, with all their ever-varying temptations and conflicts, he found his theme and never-ceasing interest.

He had read widely and deeply in the hearts of men and women. He knew their littleness, their power of self-deception, their strange perversities and prejudices. He knew also the power of love and sorrow and self-sacrifice to redeem and purify. He had a vision of purity and strength and beauty after which he never ceased to yearn and strive, and which he found living and working through all the mistaken efforts, and through all the ignorance and weakness of mankind. He was an optimist in his judgment of men in that he saw something divine in all, something that can never be content with base and earthly things. He found God in humanity amidst all its weakness and its failures, stirring them to an endless striving after the unseen and eternal, giving them hopes which no selfish pleasures could realise, and calling them to press on to an ideal beauty, and an ideal good. The supreme Reality for him in life and death was God; he did not fear any final loss,

"There shall never be one lost good": he rested with serene trust on the truth of things, and was confident that truth was altogether good. He "never doubted clouds would break."

There is something—I will not say antiquated, because that suggests outworn—but a little strange to many modern minds in Browning's optimism. The Victorian period in which he wrote is in some ways different from our own. Those of us who are middle-aged look back upon that period with a certain regret, and remember what Browning was to us in our youth. He came to us as a revelation, almost like a modern Bible, solving our difficulties, inspiring our lives, giving us ideals of love, calling us to fight for truth and goodness, filling us with a sense of the beauty and grandeur of existence. He revealed us to ourselves. He gave us calm faith and lofty visions. He expressed our half-formed thoughts and the dim feelings of the heart. He does not do this to at all the same extent for the present generation. They are inclined to think him too positive, too subtle, and too remote from the needs and longing of their present life. The present generation of young men and women have no poet of the same power as Browning and Tennyson, who can do for them what those poets did for us middle-aged people twenty or thirty years ago. There is no one who, in any striking way, sums up the spirit of the age and interprets it for them in its largest, noblest sense.

A writer in the Times recently expressed the difference between the Victorian age and ours in a suggestive manner. "We admire," he said, "the great Victorian writers with a despairing envy of their certainty about many matters which fill us with doubt. It seems to us that this certainty gave them an unfair artistic advantage, especially as we cannot feel that it was always well founded, and as it has left so many problems for our solution. We must not complain of the absence of great poetry amongst us, for poetry being in its nature emotional is inconsistent with great intellectual uncertainty. It expresses man's sense of values, and in a time like ours, when there is a general questioning and revision of values, the very material of poetry is wanting. It thrives no better than trade in a revolution. Poets must not attempt to express an uncertain sense of values with lyrical certainty."

At first sight it seems curious to call the Victorian age an age of certainty. It was a time of change, of much intellectual excitement, of endless inquiry, and of sharp diversity of opinion. It was a time of bitter conflict of thought: churches, philosophers, scientific men, and even politicians, were more clearly divided from one another than they are to-day. The High Church fought with the Low Church, the Anglican with the Nonconformist, the Protestant with the Catholic, and the Christian fought with the atheist in a spirit of bitterness which no longer exists.

In philosophy you had materialists far more aggressive and determined in trying to destroy the bases of religion than you have to-day. In Science you had Darwinians and anti-Darwinians; in politics, the issue between Liberals and Conservatives was not a difference between particular measures, but a clear-marked line of principle. Even Agnosticism, the name and to some extent the spirit of which was the creation of the Victorian era, was a positive affirmation. It was not mere vague doubt and uncertainty. It was a definite statement that nothing could possibly be known of God, and that the only thing for wise men was to concern themselves with this present life, and make the best of it. The age was marked by great diversity of positive opinion, by much cleavage and antagonism between sects and parties and classes. Each section was deeply convinced of its own rightness, and in this sense it was an age of certainty, but there was a confusing and multitudinous variety of certainties.

Looking deeper, however, I think we find other wider certainties, not perhaps embracing everyone, but representing what may be called the spirit of the age. It was an age which believed for the most part in liberty, democracy, education and progress. Whether men were religious or materialistic, they looked out into the future with a great hope. They believed in giving every man his chance. Only set men free, only teach them the truth, only unveil the secrets of nature, of whose working so many marvellous discoveries were made in the Victorian age, and a new and happier society will be created on this earth. Deal with each person separately, make them self-reliant, give them knowledge, train their faculties, and then leave them alone to fight it out in the stern battle of life, and all will be well. The watchword of the time was, as Mr. Gladstone said, Emancipate, emancipate. Set men free.

That old book (now nearly forgotten) of Smiles on "Self-Help" expressed a good deal of the spirit of the time. It was an appeal to the individual. It said to him, You can succeed if you choose. Only be resolute, wise, self-reliant, temperate, and you may be confident of victory. Men had a strong faith in education, competition, and in all personal qualities. They believed in conflict, they believed that the good were rewarded, and the ignorant and foolish punished. This interest in the individual, this faith in the individual, this confidence in the value of conflict, this sense of the separateness of life, this atomic theory of man, is voiced by Browning. He believes in individuals, he sees the regeneration of the world through individuals, he glories in the warfare of humanity. God and the Soul are the supreme realities for him.

"God is, thou art. The rest is hurled To nothingness for thee."

In this sense the Victorian era was an age of certainty. It was intensely interested in individuals, and through its great novelists and poets it expressed its interest in men and women and its belief in their divine possibilities. Psychology was the favourite study of the philosopher, the poet, and the novel writer. Through accurate knowledge and through individual effort the world would be redeemed.

What can we venture to say about our own age? It is not an age of fatigue or dullness. We malign and misunderstand our age if we charge it with satiety or mere uncertainty and doubt. But there is a certain disillusionment. We do not believe in education, or in democracy, or in self-help, or in competition, or in conflict with the same serene confidence as the leaders in the Victorian period. We do not believe in the power of science to solve all problems and to create a new earth full of peace and power. Neither the laws of science nor the laws of ethics seem to us so unalterable and so satisfying as they did to the mid-Victorians. We do not each one hold our own theologies, or our own denials of theology, with such absolute confidence. We have more sympathy with other forms of thought. The lines of division between sects and schools of thought and political parties are not so sharp and clear. We do not assert or deny with such positiveness. We do not expect to bring about the Millennium very quickly by science, or by the victory of one form of theology over another, or by universal education.

And further, we are conscious of great dangers which press upon us with an urgency that was not felt by men thirty or forty years ago. Mr. Winston Churchill, in his penetrating and masterly speech on the Home Rule Bill a few days ago, expressed those dangers very strongly. "We are confronted in these times in which we live and upon which we are entering with two tremendous groups of questions, one internal, the other external, both full of such profound gravity and import that party strife is hushed in their presence. We have to face the growing discontent of the immense labouring population of this country with the social and economic conditions under which they dwell. We have somehow to create for them decent and fair conditions of living and labour. We have also to guard and maintain our interests and position in a world filled with mighty nations and empires whose minds and energies are turned more and more each year to the science and preparation for war."

That is a new situation, and it makes us anxious and troubled. We do not see our way. We are deeply impressed by external threatening powers, and by an insurgent life pressing upon us which we do not see how to handle. We are inclined to forget the strength and importance of the single man in our anxious thoughts about the mass. We are surrounded by apparently unmanageable forces. We do not see men so much as individuals. We see them in the gross, in vast, bewildering, multitudinous strength. The change is comparable to the change wrought by passing from the Ptolemaic to the Copernican system in astronomy. Just as the world then seemed to become a speck of infinite unimportance, instead of being the centre and cynosure of the universe, so now individual man becomes a speck of no power or value in relation to the vast forces of insurgent humanity.

For such an age as ours, Browning, with his deep faith in the individual, with his sense of the heights and depths in man, with his confidence in the value of the single soul, is of great importance.

It is not only the writers who express the spirit of the age whom we should read. We need to study those who express vital truths which belong to all the ages. He recalls us from the external to the internal, from the general to the particular, from feeling overmastered to a sense of mastery.

We need to feel to-day, amid the press of circumstances, in the hurry of life, in the dangers of society, in the largeness and complexity of our problems, the greatness of the human soul, the power of love, the guidance of the ever living spirit of God. Browning expresses this in noble, rugged, passionate sincerity. He was a man who was very sure of God. He was certain that life was good and death was good. He can help us to a deeper security and a calmer trust. He brings us back to the things of the soul, and it is in the soul that God speaks most clearly, and that the way of life for nations, as for individuals, is most clearly to be found.

HENRY GOW.

A CLOSER VIEW.

SOME of my friends have been so much interested in a recent experience of mine that I think possibly a good many others may be. The story will, at least, help to fill in a touch or two in our mental portrait of the poet whose centenary is celebrated as I write.

In anticipation of this centenary I ventured to announce three Sunday evening addresses at our church, dealing in turn with Browning as a Writer, as a Student of Human Nature, and with his Thought of God and the World. At the close of the second service (April 28) a stranger shyly approached me and expressed his interest and pleasure in the subject matter of the address, for he had known Browning personally. At once the words of the poet came to my lips:

"Ah, did you once see [Browning] plain,

How strange it seems and new!"

The gentleman said he had indeed seen and known Browning intimately; for seven years or so he had been with him every day. Well, how did he stand the test of such intimate knowledge? No man (says the cynical lie) is a hero to his valet. "I was his valet," said my friend.

And thus it was my good fortune to meet with first-hand evidence—not of the writer as posed for the public, but of the man in his home, in his study, and in the daily walk and conversation. No doubt all this may seem trivial to a certain type of student, but some of us would give much to have just such details concerning men whose greatness we must acknowledge, while we regret the scantiness of information about them. If in Browning's case there is no lack of testimony, thanks to his sociable temperament, every little more may be welcomed by and by. Out of a considerable mass of reminiscences thus available, I will only reproduce here a few of the things that seem the more picturesque and really characteristic. Readers may note with advantage that the period referred to covers the production and publication of the "Aristophanes" and "Æschylus" poems, the "Inn Album," and "La Saisiaz."

Perhaps it is best to emphasise at once the general impression gained in the conversations I have had with this gentleman. Without pretending to special literary knowledge, he is clearly a deeply-attached admirer of the poet as a man, and nothing seems to vex him more than the shallow impertinence of people who after Browning's death sought him out to pry with idle, if not indeed malevolent, curiosity into his habits and disposition. It is a truly reverent memory he has of his master. Taken into Browning's service as a country lad who had followed the plough at nine years old and picked up his rudiments at night-school only, he met surely with the rarest blessing in coming into close personal contact with so wise and stimulating an employer. Browning selected books for him, talked to him, encouraged him to aspire, sat to him for his first attempts as an amateur photographer, and when young manhood had been well-reached insisted that his life must take a bolder turn. "I shall not live for ever," he said; and so the attendant went forth to seek his fortunes as a photographer, with such good result, though after no easy discipline, that his artistic skill has placed him well in the front and secured a Court appointment. Before Browning set out on his last visit to Venice he called once again on his young friend, and it is a happy consequence that we have in the last photograph of the poet thus secured the most characteristic picture of him, this witness says, as he used to sit in his study. Is it without significance that though urged by some fussy persons to reproduce the picture at once on the death of Browning shortly after, his grateful protégé felt this would be something like sacrilege? It was not till long afterwards that he decided to issue copies.

He tells me that Browning was extremely regular in his daily work. Rising at seven or earlier he would at once get to composition. "It seemed as if he had dreamed it, and must get it down at once." Now and again you would hear him rise from the desk and walk a step or two, then more it might be, with occasional stamps—as if he were enacting the scene for himself. At times his agitation was intense; at other times he was all brightness and cheeriness—I suggested "lyrical," but my friend would not be responsible for that! After bath and breakfast he would skim the papers; then he worked on from ten till one. He often sat in such concentrated application with the sheets on his desk, resting on his right elbow and gazing fixedly and long, that the attendant might go in and out half-a-dozen times and not be noticed. Now and again he cast a glance up at the shelves—"He had a great many old books, Bibles and things, that looked like tumbling to pieces"—and would be specially pleased when the youth interpreted his wants and brought to hand the volumes he looked for. If the mood took him he would hardly stop for lunch, but with a hasty adjournment into the next room for a little light food, milk pudding or the like, he would get back again to the desk. But usually he did not work in the afternoon or evening.

No; although very fond of music, and never missing a "Monday Popular" when in London, he did not himself practise playing. But one rather quaint thing he did. Often, when meditating his work, he had a sort of tiny dumb-piano on his table, and would finger up and down the mute keyboard as if thinking out the piece and getting the run of it.

He took very little wine, and did not smoke. His only exercises were a little with the dumb-bells and a great deal of walking—the latter, however, appears to have been chiefly for the purpose of visiting friends. There was no particular oddness about his appearance; in general he would not be noticed by passers-by—"just a gentleman, ordinarily dressed," that was all. Yes, there was one thing the people in the house smiled at: as soon as the master got to the gate he swung his umbrella, which he always carried, so as to lie sloping up his right arm, and so set forth. In height he was a good medium, but distinctly of a strong frame.

His health was excellent, "he was so regular." His complexion was noticeably dark.

His talk was most interesting, and often very impressive. The attendant does but bear out common testimony when he says both men and women were delighted to have him in their midst. "Do come," the invitation would run accompanying the card; "the evening will be quite flat without you." When they had friends in he would, if asked, read from his own poems—his voice being clear and rather of the tenor quality. When people came asking the meaning of this or that passage he would in general meet them most patiently and attentively, then he would read the lines "in character"; that, he would say, gives you the key. "Put yourself into the person speaking; most people only read on the surface." One busybody, whom Browning found really intolerable—his name is well-known, but shall not be given here—was sometimes told brusquely, "go and read the poems yourself and you'll see!" As a rule, no one could be long in his company without realising that this was really a remarkable man; there was so much "depth" in his sayings, he seemed to have "thought so much." His judgments of others, even the worst, were singularly discriminating and lenient—at least so far as this witness ever heard. As to his kindness to those who had to do with him, it was often most touching. For instance, on one occasion he insisted that his valet should not sit broiling out on the box in the summer heat beside the coachman, who was "older, and could stand it"; and so the youth was made to sit inside with his master. Similarly, on cold wet nights driving home from functions—"You'll come in with me," he said. From year to year, the poet's birthday was remembered by a gift of flowers that often brought tears to his eyes. His favourite flower was the narcissus.

W. G. TARRANT.

Wandsworth, May 7.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

By most people "The Coronation of their Majesties, the King and Queen," by Mr. J. H. F. Bacon, will be regarded as "the picture of the year" at the Royal Academy. It not only occupies the most prominent place in the long room, but seems to dominate the whole Exhibition, accentuating the feeling one usually has at Burlington House that here, at least, the established order reigns perpetually, and the old does not, in any real sense, give place to the new. It is a tour de force, a painstaking piece of work done to command, and for that reason it leaves us cold in spite of its gorgeous colouring, the dignity of the central figure, and the successful portraits of the bishops which really give the impression, not usually to be obtained from pictures of this kind, that the men are of more importance than their clothes. There is, however, something curiously unreal about the whole scene, and the serried rows of coronetted personages ranged round the dais, which is emphasised by the inert and expressionless figure that is supposed to represent the Queen. We are glad to see that Mr. Llewellyn has treated Her Majesty more kindly in the large portrait hanging beside the Coronation picture, which is to have Luke Fildes' portrait of the King as its companion early in June. In another room is the large portrait of King George on horseback, by Mr. Georges Scott; and there is also Mr. Cope's "H.R.H. the Prince of Wales" (a pathetically boyish figure, robed in satin and velvet), and the uncompromising picture of the "Investiture at Carnarvon," by Mr. Christopher Williams, recalling one of the hottest days of a long hot summer, to sustain the sentiment of loyalty which was quickened by the events of last year.

It is a relief to turn to such a homely picture as Arthur Hacker's "Imprisoned Spring," if only for the brightness of the bunch of buttercups, though the girl's yearning face brings in the eternal note of sadness which we would not forget if we could. Elsewhere you come across "Flare and Flutter" and "Westminster Abbey," by the same painter, both very interesting and impressionistic studies of night-effects in London, the former admirably conveying the kaleidoscopic appearance of Piccadilly Circus on a wet night, when its flaming lights are blurred with rain. Then there is the delicious sun-flecked gloom of the forest in "The Picnic," by Mr. George Henry; the Watteau-like vistas of Mr. Charles Sims' "The Shower" (one of his characteristic fantasies, with the drollest little Cupid tumbling about in the wet grass in the foreground); Sargent's arresting and vivid "Bringing down Marble from the Quarries to Carrara," and the beautiful "Breakfast in the Loggia," from the same hand; David Murray's two pictures of "Sacro Monte d'Orta"; J. W. Waterhouse's "Penelope and the Suitors," which we heard being elaborately explained by a middle-aged lady to an elderly gentleman, who evidently did not know his Homer; Tom Mostyn's "The Child," a riot of red and russet foliage; the late Edwin Abbey's "Education of Isabella the Catholic," with its fine grouping of the nuns, and the brilliant insouciant face of Isabella in her rich scarlet mantle; Garnet Wolseley's sunny picture of happy childhood, "The Sand Castle," and the quaint "Lady Diana Manners as the Prado Infanta" (by Sir Phillip Burne-Jones), inevitably recalling Velasquez. Admirers of Sir L. Alma Tadema will appreciate "Preparations: in the Coliseum." The grapes, pomegranates, eggs, and yellow plums heaped up in old silver dishes, the crimson roses and pink petals strewn on the cool marble, the grave-faced attendant in a leopard skin, holding a fringed napkin, are painted with that consummate ease and certainty of touch which seems to be quite beyond every other painter in this particular genre. Mr. Arnsby Brown's superb "Norfolk Landscape," with cattle resting in the foreground, and a great sweep of wooded country stretching away to the horizon, will, we imagine, prove popular in the best sense. Equally fine, from our point of view, and possessing real human interest is La Thangue's "Sussex Common." Mr. La Thangue is fond of repeating the same effects, but he has seldom given us a more heartening, or perhaps we should say health-giving, picture than this. As you look at it you can almost feel the warmth and glow of the sunshine, and smell the almond-like perfume of the gorse. And then the mingled simplicity and strength in the figure of the whistling boy leading the young steer—how splendidly akin it seems to the good brown earth, and the fragrance of the moorland.

There are some notable portraits this year, including one of Lord Alverstone by the Hon. John Collier, and Lord Loreburn by Fiddes Watt; Solomon's "Ramsay Macdonald, Esq., M.P.," the portraits of Mr. Norman and Mr. Lamb by Herkomer, the "Bishop of Lund" by Mr. Osterman, and Frank Dicksee's triumphant full-length portrait of the Hon. Mrs. Ernest Guinness, in a supple green gown, with an audacious feather in her fair hair.

Some delightful little pictures are to be found among the water-colours, and several fine statues in the sculpture room. One of the most important pieces of sculpture is Sir George Frampton's "Protection," a gracious motherly figure seated, and holding in her arms two infants. This is part of a memorial erected to the late Dr. Barnardo at the Village Homes, Barkingside. The statue of Elizabeth Fry, by Mr. Alfred Drury, also arrests attention, the beautiful features, with their serene expression, being finely executed. Sir W. Goscombe's model of a bronze statue of the late Hon. C. S. Rolls, in the costume of an aviator, is also a strong and characteristic piece of work.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

THE SOCIAL CHALLENGE TO THE CHURCH.

SIR,—A letter from Mr. Ramsay MacDonald will be read with interest by all readers of THE INQUIRER, but we shall many of us regret that he should have made so violent and unprovoked an attack on Mr. Lloyd Thomas' eloquent and inspiring address.

Mr. MacDonald's letter divides itself into two parts. It is a defence of himself against what he considers misrepresentation, and it is a condemnation of the style and thought of Mr. Thomas. I think he much exaggerates the misrepresentation. Mr. MacDonald seems to be one of those men who, while ready to hit hard himself, is very sensitive to criticism. He has often used strong language which offends others, but he knows, and his friends know, that this fierceness of utterance comes from a passion for social justice, and that he has kindlier feelings for those who differ from him than appear upon the surface.

He ought to judge Mr. Thomas as he would desire to be judged. There can be no question that Mr. Thomas has the strongest sympathy with the labour movement, and that his appeal is always on behalf of social justice. He least of all our ministers can be regarded as desiring that the Church should confine itself to spiritual communion and leave the great social problems of our time alone. If he criticises at all, it is the criticism of a friend. The paper did not convey to my mind any serious criticism of Mr. MacDonald. It is only nervous over-strain or lack of humour which can find an insult in being called "a wild woad-painted fighter." It is better to be wild than tame, better to be woad-painted than swaddled in fashion and luxury. Mr. Thomas' paper was not an attack on social enthusiasms, but a plea for a fuller and deeper religious life which would find its expression in a more devoted and self-sacrificing service of the community.

Mr. MacDonald does not like Mr. Thomas' style. It is a Celtic style, full of imagination and eloquence half-concealing the thought. Some of us find it attractive and beautiful, but I can quite understand a blunt Anglo-Saxon saying he prefers something plainer and more simple. That does not justify a charge of flimsiness and cheap rhetoric. Mr. Thomas' address was marked by strong thought and passionate zeal for righteousness clothed in eloquent and poetic language. We may not all see eye to eye to him in his doctrine of the Church, but we ought all to feel the deep value of his appeal. It is a real tragedy that good men seeking the same things on rather different lines, and with different temperaments, should not recognise their essential unity.

Mr. MacDonald and Mr. Thomas agree in not wishing the Church to become political. They agree in feeling that the essential thing for the Church is to strengthen the religion of the community, and they agree in asserting that religion can only be real and true when it influences all the relations of men and women, and makes for justice and love in every part of our society.

With such agreements there ought to be no time or care for dwelling upon the small irritations of friendly criticisms or humorous phrases.

HENRY GOW.

Hampstead, May 8, 1912.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

MESSRS. G. BELL & SONS, LTD.:—Chronos, a Handbook of Comparative Chronology from 8,000 B.C. to 1700 A.D.: R. J. Hart. 6s. net.

MESSRS. T. & T. CLARK:—An Anglo-Saxon Abbot: S. Harvey, M.A. 4s. net.

MESSRS. CONSTABLE & CO.:—Eve's Second Husband: Corra Harris. 6s.

MR. JOHN LANE:—The Heralds of the Dawn: William Watson. 4s. 6d. net.

LIBRAIRIE ARMAND COLIN (Paris):—L'Orientation Religieuse de la France Actuelle: Paul Sabatier. 3.50 fr.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.:—William Shaen: M. J. Shaen. 3s. 6d. net. By the Way: William Allingham. 5s. net.

MR. DAVID NUTT:—The Book of Ruth: R. H. J. Steuart, S.J. 3s. 6d. net.

MESSRS. WILLIAM RIDER & SON, LTD.:—The Great Initiates; vols. i. and ii.: Edouard Schuré. 7s. 6d. per two vols.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN:—Modern Democracy: Brougham Villiers. 7s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The International Journal of Ethics, Review of Theology and Philosophy.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

NOTES FROM "THE HIGH NEST."

II.

THE weather is cold enough for January. Beyond Naddle Fell we see storms of sleet driving across Helvellyn's brow. The lambs in the field just below us huddle up to their woolly mothers. We pile wood on the fire, and look at the tender green on the beech trees and silver birches, or we should forget that April is treading on the heels of May.

House martins have been seen in the district for a few days. The old nests under the eaves have been visited, and eager birds have clung to them for a few moments, uttering cheerful noises to each other. Doubtless they were joyously recognising their old breeding places and laying claim to them for this season. How do we know that they do not leave on a nest some token, understood by all the tribe, that it is "Engaged for 1912"? Perhaps they exchanged confidences as to the labour needed to effect small repairs, for since they left Lakeland for their winter quarters in the sunnier south, weather, and perhaps the ladders of men, have more or less damaged some of the nests.

It is a common thing to see these birds thus inspect their old homes on first arrival. No one can positively identify them as the former tenants, but the confident manner in which they fly straight to certain nests, and cling to them without hesitation, goes far towards proving that they are the original owners. This first visit over, the martins usually fly off as suddenly as they have come, and it may be a fortnight or more before they return, do repairs, reline nests, and settle in.

Probably the weather has much to do with the delay. If, as now, there is a drying east wind and no rain has fallen for many days, the martins may be in the same predicament as the builders were during the coal strike—waiting for building materials. Every child knows that house martins are plasterers, and build with mud which they scoop up in their beaks. I used to think that they only took a beakful to the nest at a time; but after much close watching the conclusion is forced on me that they do not need to stoop eight or ten times in rapid succession in order to get up merely a beakful.

The chief source of the mud used to be the little shallow pools left in the road after rain. These dried slowly, and mud in various degrees of wetness could be chosen by the busy birds. Nowadays, increasing coach and motor traffic demands that our roads shall be mended before the puddle-hole stage is reached, and the steam-roller leaves all so hard and smooth that the martins and swallows are hard put to it to find mud. They are reduced to following the water carts and making what mud they can of the wet dust; or they forsake the frequented road and make for the lanes in the hope of finding a moist cart-rut, or for the pasture lands, if haply they find some gate under the shade of a thick yew tree where the cows as they pass slowly in and out at milking time have made deep hoof-marks in the soil.

But in April Cumberland cows still live under cover, and under an east wind a wet cart-rut is hard to find. There are the lakes and streams—becks we call them in Lakeland; you may say, "Why do not the martins go to these?" Examine their margins now, when they are at a very low level on account of drought, and you will find that the soil at the water's edge is very sandy. A house martin has no use for wet sand.

Few birds are as fearless of human beings as are the swallow family in the breeding season. I have seen martins building on the walls of a low two-storied cottage in the little village-town of Hawkshead with children shouting at play around the door and noisy carts passing. The housewife may beat her pillows out of the window, but the martins make as though they heard not. "Make nests while the mud sticks" is their motto.

I know but of one little bird which can double as quickly. It also is an insect catcher—the redstart. My first of this spring was seen on April 27 in a field just above High Nest. The rapid movement in a blackthorn hedge of a spot of fiery red, not the red of a robin, attracted my attention. A moment later out darted the bird I had for a week been eagerly hoping to see. It was a male redstart; the white spot on and above his forehead told me his sex. This spot looks like a pure white feather stuck jauntily in a black velvet cap. His breast, rump, and tail are bright red, but they need sunshine to show up the full richness of colour. The hen redstart wears no white crest, nor is she as gay as the cock; but her breast, flanks, and tail are of a pale red, and she is as trim and elegant in form as he. When I saw this redstart I did not look for any nest. It was too early; but before long, when passing some belt of trees, I shall hear a troubled "weet" followed by a sharp "chick, chick!" and shall look up to see one of my white-plumed pets fluttering in restless anxiety from bough to bough, while he flirts his tail rapidly; not up and down like most birds, but from side to side. He is a very faithful and active sentinel. If you move on a score of yards he follows, still crying "weet—chick, chick!" and next time you come that way you will find it impossible to pass unnoticed, for he knows the hole in yonder wall which conceals six beautiful eggs; pale greenish blue ones, with perhaps a mere dusting of reddish colour.

When those eggs are hatched, and the parents are bringing beetles, spiders, and tiny worms to fill six widely opened bills, I defy you to creep by in stockinged feet unseen by those sharp, anxious eyes. If you linger close to the nest, the brave little mother may try to frighten you away by dashing to and fro a yard from your face.

EMILY NEWLING.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

THE LATE MR. SAMUEL BOURNE.

It is with great regret that we record the death, on April 24, of Mr. Samuel Bourne, of Nottingham, in the 79th year of his age.

Mr. Bourne's family were Churchmen, and he himself was brought up in the teachings of a rigid orthodoxy. He always took, however, a deep interest in religious and theological problems, devoting himself, even when quite a young man, to their consideration, and long ere he finally settled in Nottingham, he had severed his connection with the Church. Ultimately he became a Unitarian, and remained one by sincere conviction to the close of his life.

He associated himself with the High Pavement Chapel during the ministry of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, and, until increasing deafness rendered it impossible for him to take part in the services, was a regular attendant there. To the end he remained an attached and generous supporter of the chapel and its institutions.

Mr. Bourne served the office of Warden from 1880 to 1883, at a time when certain difficulties with regard to the connection between the congregation and the day-schools rendered his wise guidance and business knowledge of special value, and after Mr. Harwood became minister of the High Pavement he continued to do yeoman service to the chapel, taking a prominent part in its various activities. Among other offices which he held, he acted as chairman of the committee for the reduction of the chapel debt, whose efforts resulted in upwards of £2,000 being raised. In all matters relating to the artistic adornment of his place of worship, Mr. Bourne's advice was regularly sought and as willingly rendered, and he served on the various committees formed with this object. He was connected, too, with many denominational associations, and for several years took much interest in the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association, of which he was at one time president. He was a native of Staffordshire, but went to Nottingham in comparatively early life to enter Messrs. Moore & Robinson's Bank. He soon, however, turned his attention to photography, and travelled widely in connection with this pursuit, going to India, where he spent several years, and took a series of photographs showing work which experts hold to be still unsurpassed. His reproductions of Himalayan views were particularly fine, and many at the High Pavement will remember more than one interesting lecture given by him on the subject, accompanied by the exhibition of a number of his photographs. Later he turned his attention to water colour painting, and acted as President of the Nottingham Society of Artists since its foundation. A deep and reverent love of the beautiful in nature was his most prominent characteristic, and influenced all his life. Mr. Bourne also took a prominent part in the manufacturing world, and established the large and important business of S. Bourne & Co., Ltd., whose cotton-doubling works at Netherfield give employment to several hundred people. He was also Justice of the Peace, both for the City of Nottingham and for the County. The members of the High Pavement congregation will long remember his genial and kindly presence, and the enthusiasm and energy with which he carried through any work he took in hand, and they offer Mrs. Bourne and her family their sincere sympathy with them in their great sorrow.

Mr. Bourne was interred in the General Cemetery on Saturday, April 27, when the service was conducted by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, in the presence of a large body of mourners, among whom were many members of the High Pavement.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION SOCIETY.

THE annual meeting of the Domestic Mission Society was held at Highgate-hill Unitarian Church on Monday, May 6, Mr. F. Withall presiding.

Mr. Philip Roscoe, treasurer, in presenting the financial statement, said that the Society was suffering from the universal rise in prices. Everything was costing more than formerly, missions included; and while the income remained the same their expenses were increasing. The outlook for the future was, therefore, an extremely difficult one, but the Committee intended to go on working as hard as they could, and get as much money as possible to carry on the missions. The report stated that the income for the year 1911, apart from donations to Poor's Purse and legacies, was £1,065 3s. 3d., as against £989 2s. 2d. in 1910. Subscriptions decreased by £7 14s., donations increased by £84 2s. 4d., whilst collections have fallen £7 19s. 2d. The two legacies from the late Mrs. Bayle Bernard and the late Mrs. Rooke, amounting together to £300, referred to in last year's report, were both received during 1911, and applied as income. £100 was raised by the sale of Consols, and applied in the same way. The expenditure of the past year, apart from payments to Poor's Purse, was £1,311 15s. 3d., which is £108 12s. 5d. less than the expenditure of 1910. The adverse balance of £180 5s. 6d., existing at the beginning of 1911, had been reduced to an adverse balance of £26 17s. 6d. at the end of the year. The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke's appeal on behalf of the Society resulted in new and increased subscriptions—received or promised—to the amount of £21 15s. per annum, and in the collection of £85 17s. in donations. Other new or increased subscriptions amount to £12 7s. 6d. per annum. Eleven subscribers died during the year, and others have ceased or reduced their subscriptions. A loss during the year of £46 16s. per annum has to be attributed to these causes, outweighing the gains above mentioned.

The Rev. Henry Gow, hon. secretary, then read the report of the Committee, which chronicles a year of faithful, earnest service on the part of the missionaries and their wives; and points out the need, which grows greater every year, of increasing the financial support and enlisting a larger number of voluntary assistants. Emphasis is laid on the fact that the work of the Domestic Missionary and his helpers is essentially a personal influence, a relationship of love and sympathy, an appeal to the soul, and that it is founded on confidence in the power of religion and in belief in God.

The reports of the missionaries, which are of an extremely hopeful and encouraging character, were taken as read.

In moving the adoption of the reports, Mr. Withall reminded those present that in the 77 years since their Society began its work London and the general conditions of life had altered considerably, and altered, on the whole, for the better. Their work had to be modified to meet these changes and the new forms of legislation which are providing for the education and protection of children, as well as the needs of the poor, the sick, and the aged; establishing labour bureaux, formulating a scheme of national insurance, and in other ways dealing with the social problems of the present day. But it must not be thought that all this activity of the State made their missions less necessary. Their missionaries would tell them that it was needed as much as ever, and for this reason it was of the utmost importance that they should put their finances on a better basis. Their Society was the largest and the oldest of the Missionary Societies connected with Unitarianism, and it was not altogether to their credit that they should have to plead for more help. He thought the young people should be induced to take an interest in this work, and suggested that it might be possible to give the Society more democratic support by asking, not for 1,000 guinea subscriptions, but for 1,000 5s. subscriptions. It was also time that something was done in regard to the mission stations, which were not worthy of the work that had to be carried on in them. They were using buildings now which were little, if anything, better than those that were in existence when the Society was in its earliest stages.

Dr. Tudor Jones, in seconding the adoption of the reports, confessed that he knew too little of the work which was being done by the Domestic Missions, but from what he had already learnt he had come to the conclusion that the missionary could do a great deal more than the ordinary minister, as he was always coming into touch with the people, and teaching them a religion similar to that of Jesus Christ. If this religion did not change the heart of a man and lift him up to a higher level, no amount of criticism of theology would do any good. Unless the whole of life was rooted in religious experience, they were simply tinkering with the problems they had to face, and would have to do the work over and over again.

Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., moved the following resolution:—"That this meeting desires to express its confidence in the principles of the London Domestic Mission Society and to record its appreciation of the earnest and faithful labours of the missionaries." He expressed his regret that the younger people were not devoting themselves to this work as their fathers had done. From all quarters came the cry for help, and they greatly needed more assistance if the work was to be extended as it ought to be extended. In the rules of the Society it was stated that their object was first "the improvement of the moral and religious character of the poor," and then, "the amelioration of their condition." He was not sure if that was the order in which the missionaries found it possible to work. Poverty had become a more urgent problem as it was more concentrated in certain areas, and their field lay among those who had become impoverished and depressed, and, in the struggle for existence, had filtered down until they joined the ranks of the unemployed, or perhaps, the unemployable. The missionaries had to take their gospel home to these people, and talk about it often in the one poor room that constituted the dwelling-place of a whole family. They discussed with them there the hardships and difficulties with which they were burdened, and with which they must necessarily be burdened for a very long time, in spite of all that the State was now doing to improve the condition of the people. They had to try to bring strength where there was nothing but weakness, hope where there was only despair; they had to try to inspire broken men and women with a new spirit of courage and faith. He had been counting up the number of different agencies in connection with the missions which were kept going week by week, and he did not know any minister of any church who had so many details to look after, and such an enormous burden on his mind. These men had to witness a great deal of suffering and disease that almost seemed to destroy the possibility of a spiritual life; and yet they could tell those whom they tried to help that however hard their lot might be, they were the children of God, and bring to them the message of human brotherhood. He thought that saying of Jesus, "The poor ye have always with you," was too often misinterpreted, and made to read, "the poor ye shall always have with you." The main object of their society ought to be to make poverty unnecessary, and those who came into it should do so with the desire to study the causes which produce poverty so that those causes might be removed at the earliest opportunity. To him the industrial unrest which was troubling so many people had come as a message of hope, and he was glad that men were beginning to be conscious of the fact that our industrial conditions were based on injustice, and must be met with the determination that wealth shall be more equitably distributed. He looked forward to the time when the poor as they knew them would cease to exist, and he would follow the example of Mr. Farley, who had quoted in his report the following words of Canon Barnett's:—"We no longer hope for a society in which rich people are kind to poor people; we rather think of a society where employers and employed share justly the profits of work, where there is no dependent class, and all find pleasure in the gifts of character which follow the full growth of manhood in rich and poor." They must inspire and work upon the individual by the influence of sympathy and religion, and they must also co-operate with the community and see if they could not force the evils they deplored to disappear. The whole of their industrial system, it must be remembered, was based upon the margin of unemployed persons, and upon the fact that under existing conditions it was absolutely necessary that that margin of unemployed persons should be maintained. If they could solve the question of unemployment, bringing about such changes in their industrial organisation as would make this possible, they would at once put into operation forces which would affect the whole of the working classes throughout the country, and largely do away with the necessity for ameliorative agencies. It would be a very useful piece of work if everybody would try to get at the bottom of this question of unemployment, with a view to educating public opinion as far as lay in their power and removing the causes of poverty. In the meantime there was real joy and happiness to be gained, as the report of one of the missionaries pointed out, in the work of the Domestic Mission, and there was no joy and happiness so great as that which came from helping others. Let the young people, and others who were as yet ignorant about these things, know that by taking up this work they might be of use to many who needed the help, comfort, and joy which it was in their power to give.

The Rev. H. Gow emphasised the note of joy and confidence which Mr. Chancellor had struck, and said he hoped the missionaries would not allow themselves to be troubled for one moment about finances. They had been supported by splendid men and women in the past, and they must not yield to the idea that they were going to fail in their efforts in the future. He wished to express in the most earnest manner their gratitude to the missionaries. The three missionaries, the Rev. F. Summers (Dingley-place), the Rev. R. P. Farley (Bell-street), and the Rev. W. H. Rose (Rhyl-street) spoke briefly, bringing before the meeting many interesting aspects of the work of the Domestic Missions, and their relation to the social problems of the present age.

Mr. A. Barnes moved a resolution of thanks to the committee and officers for their services during the past year, which was seconded by Mr. Eveleigh. A vote of thanks to the chairman, and to the Highgate congregation for their hospitality, was proposed by Mrs. Thorne Waite, seconded by Mr. Ussher, and Mr. Withall, and Mr. Talbot (on behalf of the Highgate congregation) responded.

HOPE STREET CHURCH, LIVERPOOL. SOCIAL PROBLEM CIRCLE.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

As in previous years, we venture to send you a brief account of the work of the past winter at this Liverpool centre of activity, in the hope that our programme may stimulate other groups, and that we in turn may be helped by suggestions and comparisons. Incidentally, we may mention that we are now recognised as a factor in the social work of the city, having received honourable mention in Mrs. Bosanquet's series of papers on "Social Conditions in Provincial Towns." We are also receiving more attention from the local press, reports of our meetings having occasionally appeared, extending upon one occasion to nearly a column of the Daily Post. The practical schemes which have been launched, to a considerable extent as the result of our studies and discussions in former sessions, and which are still largely guided and inspired by our leader, the Rev. H. D. Roberts (e.g., the Anti-Sweating League, the Women's Trade Unions, the agitations for a Municipal Women's Lodging House and for Municipal School Clinics) are forging ahead in a successful manner, and continue to afford our members opportunities of turning their growing knowledge to good account. Our chief regret is that the Circle does not grow much wider, in spite of our provision of an arena for public discussion, free from subscription or expense of any kind; but the number of people who care for systematic and serious study of social problems is not large, and we must rejoice that at any rate we do not diminish.

After the social upheaval in Liverpool last August it was appropriate that we should spend the first half session in the search for the causes and possible settlements of the "labour unrest." Miss Harriet M. Johnson and the Rev. H. D. Roberts dealt with "Hooliganism and its Cure"; Mr. James Sexton, J.P., the secretary of the Dockers' Union, gave us an interesting glimpse into the "Causes underlying the Recent Strikes"; Mr. W. McLean (secretary of No. 1 Branch A.S. Railway Servants) explained the methods of strikers and picketting, and criticised the tactics of the police and military from the trade union point of view; while Mr. John Edwards dealt with the new element of "Syndicalism," and the tendency of strikes to reach huge proportions, owing to the amalgamation and federation of industries—the general strike—putting before us, at the same time, some tentative suggestions for preventing strikes. Mr. W. A. Colegate (an official of the local Labour Exchange) and Mr. R. Kneale (printing trades delegate) presented schemes of conciliation and arbitration, with suggestive arguments pro and con. Mr. R. H. Armstrong then placed before the Circle a remarkable conspectus of the social and industrial legislation of the Government since 1906, with suggestions for the filling up of the gaps which such conspectus graphically displayed; and the subject was suitably concluded by Messrs. A. K. Bulley and Allan Tracy, who presented their views of the further reforms necessary for the establishment of a national minimum standard of comfort. The impression left upon one member's mind is that the methods for securing social and industrial contentment must at least include: a wiser scheme of education, which will ensure to the beginner in the industrial world good health, good mental equipment, and an occupation which leads to continuously useful employment; a minimum standard of wages and leisure, with freedom to combine with one's fellows either for trade or political activity; the establishment of District Boards in every trade for the arrangement of wages' rates and other conditions of employment; a judicial court for the trial of disputed cases, so instituted as to inspire the confidence of all parties. These conditions being established, there should be no great difficulty in making strikes and lockouts illegal, at least in those great public services (railways, tramways, lighting, coal, &c.), the cessation of which inflicts grave hardship upon the non-combatant "third party"—the community at large.

The second half-session dealt with three current topics: The proposed Reform Bill, the Insurance Act, and the Liverpool Corporation Estate, two evenings being devoted to each topic. The first evening was a ladies' night, champions of the militant suffragists, led by Miss Davies, and of the constitutionals, led by Miss E. Deakin, displaying much eloquence and debating power. The attendance was larger and the speaking was on a higher level than at any meeting yet held. At another meeting Mr. J. J. Clarke, F.S.S., conducted us through the intricacies of "Proportional Representation" by means of an experimental election, incidentally explaining the shortcomings of "Second Ballot" and other suggested alternatives. Right upon the passage of the Insurance Act two meetings were occupied with "The Place of the Act in the General Scheme of Social Reform," led by the Rev. H. D. Roberts; and "The Working of the Act," carefully explained by Mr. R. H. Armstrong. We have one or two whole-hearted condemners of the Act, but the majority felt that, although containing minor faults, the Act is, on the whole, a great measure of social amelioration, and should be accepted and "worked" with a view to improvement and amendment. Our discussions of Liverpool's great municipal estate were enlivened upon one evening, devoted to the history and financial eccentricities of the management of the estate, by the presence of a number of leaseholders, who put many anxious questions to the speaker, Mr. John Edwards, he having alleged that their leases were renewed upon terms which gave them the property at far less than its real value. It is clear that the "vested interest" in this case will fight reform with grim determination every inch of the way. That the exposure has not been ineffective is evidenced by the fact that our City Council has just appointed a Special Committee of eighteen members to hold an inquiry. The final evening was spent in viewing a series of fine lantern pictures by Mr. Harold Rathbone, upon the subject of "The City Beautiful," and in considering practical suggestions by Mr. Allan Tracy for the rebuilding or adapting of large old-fashioned residences in the centre of the city. Those who have attended the session have undoubtedly widened their outlook upon the world, and stored their minds with facts and valuable suggestions; nay, more, they have surely been inspired to become earnest pioneers in the work of social reform.

MORAL EDUCATION AND THE CURRICULUM.

UNDER the auspices of the Moral Education League, a meeting was held at the Society of Arts, Adelphi, on Friday last,

Dr. F. H. Hayward presiding, in order to hear Mr. F. J. Gould's explanation of his recently published correlation scheme.

Mr. Gould observed that if, on the principle laid down by Herbart, the moral aim should be supreme in education, then the whole curriculum must reflect this ideal. But the bitter cry of teachers everywhere was that the time table was overcrowded. Professor Howard Moore, of the Crane Technical School, Chicago, had declared of the United States system that "The curriculum as it exists to-day is largely water any way; not over a third of it is indispensable." While society urgently needed the aid of an improved method of ethical instruction, yet, as Mr. Moore said, in his book, "Ethics and Education," there were educators who understood so fully the function of education that they objected to giving even six minutes a day to the science of civilising people. Certain subjects must be reduced in proportion in order to make way for civic instruction. Especially was this the case in that bête noire of the educational system, arithmetic, the condition of which to-day constituted as great a scandal as the "Payment by results" of twenty-five or thirty years ago. The lecturer gave a brief sketch of a reformed arithmetic, which would embrace the elements of recreation, æsthetics, utility and ethics. These changes would save school-time, avoid much needless nerve-strain, and moralise what was now the most hopeless and most grossly materialist subject of the curriculum. To this reform should be added common-sense exercises in the general art of reasoning—an art which would develop its chief interest in the moral lesson.

The scheme offered for the consideration of the meeting was based on the course of human evolution, and in recognition of the principle that the progress of the child's psychology represented, in an abbreviated manner, the progress of humanity in history. This history would be chronology without years, which was another way of saying chronology without tears. It sufficed to divide evolution into (1) antiquity, including Greeks, Romans, Hebrews, Hindus; (2) the Middle Ages and succeeding times till about 1700; (3) Modern times. Certain symbolic figures might stand for each epoch, for instance, a Greek, a Roman, and Moses for antiquity; for the middle period, a cathedral, a knight, a printing press, a sailing-ship; for modern times, a lighthouse, a locomotive, a school. Civilised children all over the world should alike study the stage of antiquity before the history of their native country; that is, the environment of Primitive Man and the Greeks and Romans; the myths and folklore of that age; and the moral instruction should draw its illustrations largely from those areas and times, while borrowing also from modern experience, and being imparted in the modern spirit. At each stage, the lessons would be grouped, the nature-study, arithmetic, music, clay-modelling, dramatic exercises, and the rest, all being associated round certain historical events and phases. For example, lessons portraying Italy and its scenery would be followed by, say, a biography of Chevalier Bayard as symbolising mediæval knighthood; this, again, by a description of St. Francis of Assisi, as representing mediæval piety and sympathy; and this, again, by ethical lessons which would gather up the moral suggestions already observed, and weave them into definite instruction on chivalry, sympathy, &c., with additional material from any other sources approved by the teacher.

As another example, taken from the third stage (i.e., modern times, since 1700), lessons under the head of environment would first picturesquely portray the position and national character of England, France, and the regions in which these countries struggled for Colonial supremacy. Next might come lessons on the Jesuit missions in Canada, as exemplifying French moral energy, and the remarkable economic work accomplished in Mauritius by Labourdonnais, as exemplifying French industrial energy. Other lessons would furnish illustrations from art and science, e.g., Longfellow's poem of "Evangeline," the music of the period expressed in the "Marseillaise," and "Rule Britannia," and the biographies of eighteenth century biologists and botanists. Then the ethics lessons would gather up the scattered moral elements in talks on character, industrial enterprise, and so on. It was not proposed that such a scheme should be adopted in any school in the form presented by the League, but it was hoped that teachers would more and more shape their curriculum on these evolutionary lines. Similar ideals had been sketched for French education by M. Ferdinand Buisson in his La foi Laïque, and they pointed to a possible solution of some painful controversies, for in both the French and English schemes the history of religious movements was in some degree included.

Mr. Gould summed up in a closing review. The time approached when the various activities and studies of the school must not only be correlated, they must be correlated for a living and abiding purpose; and that purpose was the training of the young personality in the service of the larger life. The correlation must supersede all the disconnected compartments of the nineteenth century school time-table. It must lead the child-mind and child-energy that formed a shortened reproduction of the evolution of the human race, but in such wise that the earlier stages were illumined by the knowledge and sympathy of the present day, and even influenced by our hopes for the future. It would minister to the imperious need of the human soul for a constructive view, a constructive feeling, and a constructive plan of action. It must portray the relation of man to nature; the meaning of social institutions and progress; the depth and beauty of human thought and art; and the significance of the moral life in the past and the present. Its conscious aim must be the service and betterment of home, city and race. Education must abandon scattered aims, and chaotic survivals. It must correlate in order to concentrate; it must concentrate in order to subordinate; it must subordinate in order to consecrate.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS, WHIT WEEK, 1912.

THE following arrangements are announced for Whit-week:—Tuesday evening, May 28: Religious service at Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, at 7.30 p.m. Preacher, the Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D. (Cambridge, Mass., U.S.A.) Collection in aid of the funds of the Association. Wednesday, May 29: Conference of Ministers at Essex Hall, at 10 a.m., on "Some Pressing Questions to which Answers are Sought." The Conference will close at 12 o'clock, at which hour the Rev. S. M. Crothers will give an address to ministers. Public Meeting at Essex Hall, at 7.30 p.m. Four addresses on "Religion and International Relationships": (1) Europe and England, by Sir Thomas Vezey Strong, Ex-Lord Mayor of London; (2) America and England, by Dr. S. M. Crothers; (3) Ideals of the Working Classes in all Lands, by Mr. J. A. Hobson, and (4) The Influence and Responsibility of Journalism at Home and Abroad. Thursday morning, May 30: Annual business meeting of the Association at Essex Hall, at 10 a.m. The President, Charles Hawksley, Esq., in the chair. Conference on the work of the Association, (1) Home Work, (2) Colonial and Foreign Work, (3) Publications, (4) Missionary Work in Scotland, (5) Unitarian Van Mission. Thursday evening, May 30: Conversazione at the Portman Rooms, Baker-street, W., at 8 p.m. Tickets, 1s. (on and after May 29, 2s.); may be obtained from the secretaries of London congregations and at the Book Room, Essex Hall. Other Whit-Week Meetings: The Sunday School Association meetings will be held on Tuesday morning and afternoon; the meetings of the British League of Unitarian Women will be held on Wednesday afternoon; the Central Postal Mission on Thursday afternoon; and the Unitarian Temperance Association on Friday evening.

THE SUNDAY - SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

THE Anniversary Meetings will be held at Essex Hall, London, on Tuesday, May 28. The programme of proceedings will be as follows:—10.45 a.m.: Conference of delegates on "The Difficulties of the Sunday School Teacher." 1 p.m.: Luncheon at the Holborn Restaurant, High Holborn. 3 p.m.: Address by the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, Ph.D. (London). Subject, "The Use of the Bible in Education." 4 p.m.: Afternoon tea. 4.45 p.m.: The President's Address and business meeting. 5.45 p.m.: Closing resolution.

APPEAL.

THE Rev. J. W. Ballantyne writes:—"I am interested in the case of an invalid girl, for whose recovery to normal health there is no hope. She is confined to the house, but in the summer months it might be possible to give her much pleasure if she could be taken out sometimes to the common near her home. This would require a basket chair on wheels, which the parents, however, cannot afford to buy. Will you kindly allow me to ask through your columns whether any reader could supply us with a disused chair of this kind."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Bolton: Unity Church.—The annual sermons were preached at the above church on Sunday, May 5. The church was crowded on each occasion, there being nearly 400 in the morning and afternoon, and nearly 500 in the evening. In the morning Mr. T. Taverner, of the local Baptist Church, gave an address to the children, and the Rev. Dr. Tudor Jones, of London, preached in the afternoon and evening. He referred to the attentiveness of the children, and to the large number of young men, all members of the church, who were present. The collection amounted to over £40.

The Late Mr. J. J. Bradshaw.—We regret to record the death, on April 28, in his seventy-sixth year, of Mr. Jonas James Bradshaw, a well-known Bolton citizen. Mr. Bradshaw was a life-long friend to Unitarianism. He was a member both of Bank-street Chapel and of Unity Church, and at the latter especially he will be sadly missed. He was a loyal and active worker until his death, one of his latest tasks being to prepare a history of the Church in preparation for the Jubilee which will be celebrated in July next. No one had a greater love for the cause at Unity Church. He himself, being an architect, designed and drew up the plans of the building, and always took a great pride in it, presenting two years ago a stained glass window in remembrance of his sisters and niece, who had been active workers at Unity Church. At the funeral service held in the church on May 2, the Rev. J. H. Weatherall emphasised the uprightness and integrity of Mr. Bradshaw's character, his absolute accuracy and truthfulness in all things. The service was conducted by the Rev. Edward Morgan, B.A., and the Rev. J. Islan Jones, M.A., minister of Halliwell-road Free Church. The remains were cremated at Manchester Crematorium, and afterwards interred at Tonge Cemetery. Mr. Bradshaw was a Fellow of the Royal Institute of British Architects and a Justice of the Peace for the town of Bolton. He took a deep interest in all charitable work, and the presence of so many public men at the funeral service was an eloquent testimony to the widespread respect and honour in which he was held. He leaves a widow and four daughters.

Doncaster.—We learn from the Rev. Percy W. Jones, minister of the Free Christian Church, that the sum for which he urgently appealed some time ago has been reduced to £300. It is, however, imperative that this should be raised before August, or the committee will have to curtail their building scheme. To do this would be to seriously cripple the flourishing organisation which is already promising so well for the future, and the matter is therefore extremely urgent. We trust that this appeal will meet with a cordial response, in order that Mr. Jones's work may be carried on successfully and the cause of liberal religion advanced in Doncaster.

Kilburn: Quex-road.—The church anniversary services will be held at the Unitarian Church, Quex-road, on Sunday, May 12, when the sermon in the morning will be preached by the Rev. F. W. G. Foat, M.A., D.Lit., and in the evening by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A.,

Liverpool: Hope-street Church.—The Rev. H. D. Roberts, in his sermon on Sunday evening, May 5, referred to the centenary of Browning. He said he did not want to treat of Browning's philosophy, complexity, encyclopaedic information, obscurity, nor of him in any academic sense whatever. He wanted to speak of him as a great religious poet—one of those "poets God ever meant should save the world, and therefore lent great gifts to," as Browning himself had said. But in thinking of him thus, they must put out of their minds many things popularly supposed to belong to religiousness, things narrow, exclusive, sectarian, sacerdotal, dogmatic, fastidious. Things of that calibre could not be thought of in connection with Browning. The harsh, the rough, the grotesque, the grimly humorous entered into his religiousness, as well as the pure, the tender, the tuneful, the loving. Passionate religious convictions he had; his own, not accepted from hearsay, dominating his inner life and his poetic work. They permeated his poetry; yet so great was his range of thought and of subjects that one was hardly aware of their recurring insistence. They might be summed up in four words—God, the soul, love, immortality; and his work, full as it was of intricacies, recesses, windings, vistas, and even mazes, rested on these great words as on four grand columns, which gave scheme and order and sanity to the whole. Browning strongly trusted the larger hope. It was not that he did not know the questioning of his day; he was even often in advance of it. He was more than modern; he was anticipatory. And yet one might apply to this vigorous, virile, companionable man, frankly enjoying life, frankly interested in all sorts of men and women, the epithet that was applied to Spinoza, "God-intoxicated." When the preacher met Mr. Barrett Browning by a fortunate chance at Asolo three years ago, he remarked about his father, "I don't think my father attached extreme importance to dogma. He did not disregard it; I don't mean that. He was too much interested in all the thinkings of men. But I think he always saw behind it and beyond it." Too much interested in all the thinkings of men! That was Robert Browning to the life. And behind the thinkings of men, nay, within them, God. He was influenced in early life by the keen critic and Unitarian minister, William Johnson Fox, who was the first to give the young poet publicity, and the two were friends until Mr. Fox's death. But both Robert and Elizabeth Browning refused to put on, in her phrase, "any of the livery of the sects." The preacher dwelt upon the poet's sense of the immeasurable worth of life and his passion for being, his bold idea that there is a hope in man's very imperfection, a prophecy in the failures and limitations he is forever striving to transcend. In conclusion, he said: "Was there ever a more joyous going out with the glad 'Hail and farewell'? He stretched forth 'his hands with yearning for the further shore,' where he saw waiting his 'lyric love, half angel and half bird,' that 'soul of his soul'—God and love still 'standing sure.' And he sent back to us his splendid parting cry, 'Strive and thrive! Cry 'Speed'—fight on, fight ever. There as here!'"

Newcastle-on-Tyne: Church of the Divine Unity.—On Sunday, April 28, the anniversary sermons were preached by the Rev. Wm. C. Hall, M.A., of Northampton. On the following Monday the anniversary service was held. In the course of an address the minister, the Rev. Alfred Hall, said they had every reason for rejoicing. There had been an increase in membership, and friends had joined them who were supporting the church by their enthusiasm and liberality. A splendid band of young people, of whom they were very proud, was gathering around them, and it was long since the church had raised so much money as it had done that year. The Rev.

Wm. C. Hall gave a short address on the reconstruction which was taking place in religion, and in all the higher branches of thought and art.

Norwich.—The centenary of Robert Browning was celebrated at the evening service at the Octagon Chapel on Sunday, May 5, when the choir rendered "He giveth His beloved sleep," and the song which constitutes the epilogue to "Frishtah's Faneies." A passage from "Abt Vogler" was read as the second lesson, and in place of a sermon Mr. Edward Peake delivered an address on "Browning and His Message," in the course of which he said that when he began to prepare his address a bouquet of white roses, hyacinths, and rosemary was placed upon his table. He would associate his thoughts upon the poet with those three flowers and their significance. First, the white rose. Browning was prominent as one of those who wore the white flower of a blameless life. They honoured him for the unstained chivalry of his manhood, the unwavering devotion to his art, even under the most discouraging conditions at first. The earlier half of the nineteenth century was the time, indeed, for such a hero, ever ready to fight on in spite of failure. Fortunate in wife and child and sister, Browning's life was one of deep domestic felicity. Secondly, the wild hyacinth, recalling the Greek legend of its origin from the spirit of the youth whom Apollo killed by mischance. Browning shared deeply the true Greek spirit—that unerring perception that truth and beauty were aspects of the same eternal reality. Hyacinth in the Greek legend, but for the saving union with beautiful nature, would have died for all time; so Browning, but for the emotional force he derived from the world of men and women, might have failed in his great adventure. To an uncertain age he uttered the conviction that life was too difficult to do without religion. Thirdly, the Rosemary of Remembrance. Browning's message was as old as the Book of Job, it breathed of human hopes and aspirations. "There is a spirit in man." In conclusion, Mr. Peake returned to the theme which he considered Browning specially made his own, viz., that there is a conquest in failure, a mastery in martyrdom, and that by so pursuing Right in scorn of consequence we gain the crown of Life.

Nottingham: Christ Church.—Christ Church has just passed through a trying and anxious period in its history, for without a pastor the work was very difficult. Now, however, earnest efforts are being made to restore the church to its rightful position as a centre of religious activity, and to quicken the cause of Liberal Christianity in the neighbourhood. Miss H. L. Phillips, who has a valuable record of many years' service at the High Pavement Chapel as lay visitor, entered upon the pastorate on Sunday last, May 5. Miss Phillips took the opportunity of speaking about her hopes, ambitions and expectations for the future, and urged the necessity for loyal activity and co-operation on the part of the congregation. She desired to awaken in each worshipper a passion for diligent service such as they had not known before, and to make them dissatisfied rather than contented with their present progress.

Peckham.—A neighbourhood meeting was held in the Bellenden-road School on Tuesday, April 30. All the South London churches had been invited to send representatives. About 80 persons were able to attend. The first hour was spent in social intercourse, the renewing of old friendships and the making of new ones, by members of the various congregations. A short programme of music and recitations followed, and then the platform was occupied by the ministers or other officers from the churches. The district minister took the chair, and the Rev. Douglas W. Robson, the minister of Avondale-road Church, gave a heartily welcome to all the visitors. Addresses were given by the Revs. W. G. Tarrant and W. W. C. Pope and Messrs. Wm. Lee and A. H. Crocker. Several invitations were offered for the next meeting, and there is every probability that the meetings so happily begun by Lewisham and seconded by Peckham will be repeated.

Stratford and Forest Gate: Appointment.—The Rev. John Ellis has accepted a cordial invitation to become minister of the Unitarian Church, Stalybridge.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

DIET IN SCHOOLS.

A Conference on Diet in Schools will be held at the Guildhall on Monday, May 13, when the Lord Mayor will preside at the opening of the proceedings. Among the speakers will be Dr. Clement Dukes, hon. consulting physician, Rugby School; Miss Douglas, head mistress of Godolphin School, Salisbury, President of the Association of Head Mistresses; Dr. J. Sim Wallace, Lecturer on Dental Surgery and Pathology, London Hospital; Mrs. Alice M. Burn, M.B., D.P.H., Assistant School Medical Officer, Durham, C.C., late Medical Officer, Wycombe Abbey School; and Mrs. Stanley Hazell, formerly Lecturer on Domestic Economy and Hygiene.

* * *

The subject of school diet which will be raised by this Conference has already received some attention in the press, and on Tuesday the Times dealt with it in a leading article in the "Educational Supplement." The Standard has also published some informative articles, and a representative who recently interviewed Mr. Hecht, secretary of the National Food Reform Association, elicited some interesting facts which will surprise many people who have not hitherto given the matter a thought. "Despite its extreme importance," said Mr. Hecht, "the food question, as a consulting physician points out, is generally left to take care of itself, and the effect of this neglect is felt by the boys for the rest of their lives." Monotony, bad cooking, the lack of vegetables and fresh fruit in the daily menu, and the ignorance which exists in schools as to the individual preferences of the children themselves, are among the counts in the indictment which is brought against those responsible for school diet. The latter is quite as important as the other three, although the general idea that people (and especially children) should eat what is put before them without any fuss about "likes and dislikes" is still so prevalent that it does not receive the attention it deserves. Food that is distasteful for any reason is naturally avoided, and if there is nothing to take its place the boy or girl who refuses it is not sufficiently nourished. As one school medical officer has remarked, "Some children cannot mentally digest classics, others cannot physically digest fats and starches, and they are forced to take both." The Conference, at all events, will open up a wide field for discussion, and may inaugurate general reforms of a moderate but sensible kind with the best results from the point of view of health and mental efficiency.

THE ETHICAL CHURCH,

46, QUEEN'S ROAD, BAYSWATER, W.

Sunday, May 12, at 11 a.m.

Mr. HERBERT BURROWS.

"The Ascension of Man."

" at 7 p.m.

Mrs. BILLINGTON-GREIG.

"The Philosophy of Mob Rule."

Wednesday, May 15, at 8.30 p.m.

Mr. G. E. O'DELL.

"The Poems of W. E. Henley."

Friday, May 17, at 5.30 p.m.

Mr. G. E. O'DELL.

"The Negative Commandments."

ALL SEATS FREE.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
Miss ORME. HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by
Christian Scientists.

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.

BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 135, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

REMNANTS!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen. Big pieces for Teacloths, Traycloths, D'oyleys, &c., only 2s. 6d. per bundle. Postage 4d. Irish Linen Bargain Catalogue Free. Write to-day.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming new Irish Linen Spring Costume Fabric, "Flaxella." Washable, durable, looks smart for years; fascinating designs. All new shades. Write to-day.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Crantock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCs.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z, INQUIRER OFFICE, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, AYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

TO LET, Furnished, near Bournemouth, Lady's superior, well-kept house. Very pleasantly situated in select road on good elevation. Close to station, near church, shops, picturesque golf links. Piano, croquet, gas-cooker, plate, linen. Perfect sanitation. Fare, tram or train to Bournemouth, 2d. Small, careful party, 2½ guineas. Bargain. Trustworthy servant left.—Address C. P., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE
& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

EUSTACE GORDON

(Manager for the Ulster Unitarian Christian Association),

BOOKSELLER, BOOKBINDER,
:: and STATIONER, etc. ::

Printing Well and Cheaply Executed.
Bookbinding orders carefully dealt with.
Second-hand Books searched for and reported free.

Orders received by post receive prompt attention.

35, ROSEMARY STREET, BELFAST.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, May 11, 1912.

* * * Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

Library of the
PACIFIC UNITARIAN SCHOOL
FOR THE MINISTRY
Berkeley, California

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3647.
NEW SERIES, No. 751.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 18, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.

BRITISH & FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION

Anniversary Meetings

Tuesday Evening, May 28.

RELIGIOUS SERVICE at Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, at 7.30 p.m. Preacher: Rev. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D.

Wednesday Evening, May 29.

PUBLIC MEETING at Essex Hall, at 7.30 p.m. Three Addresses on "Religion and International Relationships." (1) "Europe and England," Sir T. VEZEY STRONG; (2) "America and England," Dr. S. M. CROTHERS; (3) "Ideals of the Working Classes," JOHN A. HOBSON, Esq., M.A.

Thursday Morning, May 30.

ANNUAL BUSINESS MEETING at Essex Hall, at 10 a.m. The President, CHARLES HAWKSLEY, Esq., in the Chair.

CONFERENCE on the Work of the Association: (1) Home Work; (2) Colonial and Foreign Work; (3) Publications; (4) Missionary Work in Scotland; (5) Unitarian Van Mission.

Thursday Evening, May 30.

CONVERSAZIONE at the Portman Rooms, Baker-street, W., at 8 p.m. Music and Refreshments. Tickets 1/- (on and after May 29, 2/-), may be obtained from the Secretaries of London congregations and at the Book Room.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS,

Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, London,
TUESDAY, MAY 28, 1912.

THE REV. J. J. WRIGHT,
F.R.S.L. (CHOWBENT, LANCASHIRE),
PRESIDENT, IN THE CHAIR.

CONFERENCE at 10.45 a.m., on
"The Difficulties of the Sunday School Teacher."
LUNCHEON at the Holborn Restaurant
at One o'clock. Tickets 2/6.

At 3 o'clock an Address will be delivered at Essex Hall by the

Rev. W. TUDOR JONES, Ph.D.
"The Use of the Bible in Education."

AFTERNOON TEA AT 4 p.m.

President's Address and Business Meeting at 4.45.
ION PRITCHARD, Hon. Sec.
ESSEX HALL, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

NATIONAL UNITARIAN TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

NINETEENTH ANNUAL MEETING, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C., Friday, May 31, 1912.

4 p.m. Conference. "Alcohol and Modern Life." Paper by Rev. Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLER.

6 p.m. Tea will be served.

7 p.m. Business and Public Meeting. Report. Election of Officers, &c.

Chairman: Mr. H. G. CHANCELLOR, M.P., supported by Sir W. B. Bowring, Bart.; Mr. Edward Chitty, J.P.; Miss Harriet M. Johnson; Rev. Dr. W. Tudor Jones; Rev. J. Arthur Pearson; Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A.; Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed, M.A.; Mr. T. Pallister Young, B.A., LL.B.

UNITED SUMMER SCHOOL,

The Hayes, Swanwick, Derbyshire.

Under the auspices of the Inter-Denominational Conference of Social Service Union.

JUNE 22 to 29.

Charge, 5s. 6d. per day or 35s. for the week.

Applications, accompanied by booking fee of 5s., should be sent before the end of this month to J. J. STARK, Ashmead, Orleans-road, Upper Norwood, S.E.

Presbyterian Chapel, Newbury, Berks (1664-1697).

For more than 200 years the Old Meeting at Newbury has stood for freedom and progress in an isolated situation, and has strenuously upheld Unitarian principles. It is one of our oldest places of worship, and is greatly in need of repairs and beautifying. It is intended to hold a Sale of Work on Wednesday, June 26, and the members of the congregation, who have been working during the past year, have accumulated a stock of saleable goods, but not sufficient to realise the amount required. They earnestly appeal to sister churches to help them with goods, money, and patronage—which will be gratefully acknowledged by the Hon. Sec. and the Treasurer, Sale of Work Committee, Miss STILLMAN, Marsh Cottage, Newbury. Mrs. NEWELL, *Arthur Road, Newbury, and the Minister, Rev. RICHARD NEWELL.

* Note change of address.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION UNITARIAN AND WORKERS' UNION.

Annual Meeting, ESSEX HALL,

Thursday, May 30, at 2.30.

MISS TAGART in the Chair.

Supported by Mrs. Herbert Smith, Dr. Tudor Jones, Rev. T. P. Spedding and Rev. L. C. Taverner.

Address by Dr. ANGELO CRESPI on
"Present Tendency of Religious Thought in Italy."
Tea at 4.30 in Council Room.

FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, HORSHAM.

139th Whit Sunday Anniversary.

SERMONS by the
Rev. W. TUDOR JONES, Ph.D.

Morning, 11 a.m.; Evening 6.15 p.m. Communion after Morning Service.

Collections, Morning and Evening.

Lunch at 1 o'clock, 1s.; Tea at 5 o'clock, 6d.

Rooms for the accommodation of visitors are provided at 12, Worthing Road.

BRITISH LEAGUE OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER LIBERAL CHRISTIAN WOMEN.

THE ANNUAL MEETING will be held at Essex Hall, on Wednesday, May 29, at 3.30 p.m. Lady Bowring will preside. Speakers include Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., Miss Amy Withall, the American and German delegates, and others.

H. BROOKE HERFORD, } Hon.
VIOLET PRESTON, } Secs.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL,
AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.
—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad. Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon). Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

A YOUNG FRENCH LADY, daughter of a Professor, desires to find a home in the country, where she may receive board and lodging in return for French lessons and conversation.—Apply to Rev. Dr. J. E. CARPENTER, 11, Marston Ferry Road, Oxford.

SAMUEL JONES FUND. — The Managers meet annually in October for the purpose of making Grants.

APPLICATIONS must, however, be in hand not later than WEDNESDAY, JUNE 12, and must be on a form to be obtained from EDWIN W. MARSHALL, Secretary, 38, Barton arcade, Manchester.

CROW'S NEST.—Mr. E. W. LUMMIS proposes to take a party to Eastern Switzerland in August. Inclusive cost: a fortnight abroad, 14 guineas; a month abroad, 19 guineas. Persons wishing to join should write early to 15, Green-street, Cambridge.

PEARL ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000

Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHRUBSALL, } Directors.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, May 19.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN.
 Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.
 Child's Hill, All Souls', Weech-road, Finchley-road, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. E. DAPLYN.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D. Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11 and 7, Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11 and 6.30, Rev. JOHN ELLIS.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. ARTHUR PEARSON.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15 and 7, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, M.A.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. H. GOW, B.A.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, Sunday School Anniversary, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. WING; 3, Flower Service, Miss F. CHARLESWORTH.
 Ilford, High-road, 11 and 7, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Rev. Dr. TUDOR JONES.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11 and 6.30, Rev. F. HANKINSON.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 and 7, Rev. C. ROPER, B.A.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. GORDON COOPER.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. W. ROBSON, B.D.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. F. W. G. FOAR, Litt.D., M.A.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLOR.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11 and 6.30, Mr. W. T. COLYER.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C., 11.15 and 7, Rev. DENDY AGATE, B.A.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
 Wimbledon, 27B, Merton-road, 7, Mr. WM. LEE, B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11 and 7, Rev. JOSEPH WILSON.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. FRED BROCKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30, Supply.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. WOOD.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. W. AUSTIN, M.A.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30.
 BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45, Scholars' Service; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.
 BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. V. D. DAVIS.

BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, M.A.
 BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.
 BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. GEORGE WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CAMBRIDGE, Assembly Hall, Downing-street, 11.30, Rev. E. W. LUMMIS, M.A.
 CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street, 6.30, Mr. S. FIELD.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BECKH.
 DEAN Row, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. DOUGLAS WALMSLEY, B.A.
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. E. DOWSON.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. M. LIVENES.
 HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. LANSDOWNE.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. I. FRIPP, B.A.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. CHARLES CRADDOCK.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. D. ROBERTS.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 and 6.30, Rev. HERBERT McLACHLAN, M.A., B.D.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, Rusholme, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WHITAKER.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. ALEXANDER FARQUHARSON.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. ALFRED HALL, M.A.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. Dr. ODGERS.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVERS.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. W. COCK.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. NICOL CROSS, M.A.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Unity Hall Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Rev. JAS. HARWOOD.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.

Rev. HY. DAWTREY, from Bootle, to 32, Brighton-road, Birkdale, Southport.

BIRTH

HIGGIN.—On May 8, at Summerland, British Columbia, the wife of C. Noel Higgin, of a son.

DEATH.

KEATING.—On May 15, at 79, Tulse-hill, S.W., after a short illness, Richard Keating, in the 86th year of his age. Service at Effra Road Unitarian Church at 12.30, Saturday.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

CLEANING or CHAIRING.—A couple of days' work per week wanted by member of one of our London Missions, who has, for years, done work of this kind at houses of well-known members of our churches. Highest references can be given.—Apply to "X," INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-strand, Strand, W.C.

LADY living alone, comfortable cottage near London, delightful country in Sussex, wishes to receive a Lady invalid, or otherwise, needing quiet country life.—F. Y., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY."—Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda. Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 14d.—1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to EDITOR, "Dove-stone," Denton-road, Gorton, Manchester.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	339	The Social Challenge to the Church	344	MEMORIAL NOTICES :—
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS :—		Van Mission Arrangements	345	Charles Gordon Ames	347
George Dawson and the Coming Church.-I.	341	The Ministers' Meeting in Whit-week	345	The Rev. W. Sunderland Smith	348
In Time of Drought	342	An Appeal	345	MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES :—
QUESTIONS AT ISSUE :—		BOOKS AND REVIEWS :—		Parents' National Educational Union	348
The Report of the Royal Commission on		Froebel and his English Interpreter	345	The Social Movement	349
Vivisection	342	God and the Soul	346	Announcements	349
CORRESPONDENCE :—		A Modern Crusader	346	NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	349
The Late Bishop of Truro	343	Publications Received	346	NOTES AND JOTTINGS	351
Discussions at the National Conference	344	FOR THE CHILDREN	346

 All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

On Monday, May 19, 1662, the Royal Assent was given to the Act of Uniformity, which ordained that the Prayer Book and the Prayer Book only should be used in the churches, that an unfeigned consent and assent must be given by every minister to all which was contained in it, and disallowed all clerical orders except those conferred by the hands of a Bishop. On the following Sunday Richard Baxter promptly announced his sad but settled conclusion to leave his pulpit rather than comply with the intolerable demands of the Act. It has been held that in so doing he desired to confirm such of his brethren as might hesitate as to their duty in this matter. We know that when the day appointed, August 24, came, more than two thousand clergy followed his example. The records of our ancient chapels bear the names of many who were leaders in this heroic period, and sons and grandsons of ejected ministers are to be found in scores upon the list of our elder ministry. Naturally where such connections exist there will be peculiar reason for commemorating the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of this epoch-marking event; but of course its interest and significance will be appreciated wherever freedom and faithfulness in religion are honoured in word and practice.

* * *

SOME difficulty, however, arises owing to the fact that August 24 is in the middle of the holiday season, and people will be scattered. At Manchester College, Oxford, the date of the Royal Assent, May 19, has been fixed for the special celebration, and Dr. J. E. Odgers, whose knowledge of the period is probably unrivalled among us, will preach the sermon, which we look forward to publishing. Other congregations may find this earlier date the more convenient, and doubtless arrangements have already been made with this in view. Ministers who have access to Calamy's Nonconformist Memorial (edited by Palmer) will find a full account of the ejection in the introduction, or they may turn to Baxter's own works for the account from which Calamy quotes. The body of the Memorial is a singularly rich mine for the student, and ought to be worked afresh by every generation of our ministers. In two very convenient volumes, issued fifty years ago by the United Bartholomew Committee, most of the historical material required will be found. One is entitled St. Bartholomew Bicentenary Papers, and contains many useful addresses, mostly from the orthodox Nonconformist point of view; the other contains the Documents Relating to the Settlement of the Church of England, and is extremely serviceable. Both ought to be in every reference library.

* * *

It is interesting to remind ourselves that the Act of Uniformity, which was intended to put down freedom of thought and worship, really established it. Side by side with Anglicanism since that day there has been a powerful, learned, and devoted Nonconformity unfettered by the State, to which our country and the Empire owe more politically, socially, and religiously than can be easily estimated. We may rejoice that the bitter opposition between Church and Dissent is passing away, but this must not make us lose pride in the courage and work of our Nonconformist ancestors, or become careless of the principles and responsibilities which such pride when it is noble compels us to recognise. We were called for freedom in the large and positive sense in which it is used by St. Paul. That faith in freedom at its best as it was in our forefathers is one of the great powers which make for morality and religion in our national as well as in our individual life.

* * *

THE Eighth National Peace Congress has been holding meetings in London during the latter part of the present week. The first Conference took place on Wednesday afternoon under the chairmanship of Sir James Yoxall, M.P., and the first paper was read by Dr. Estlin Carpenter on "The Universities and Peace." We shall hope to refer to these meetings more at length next week.

* * *

It is a happy augury for our future better understanding with Germany that the appointment of Baron von Marschall as the new German Ambassador to England is announced on the first day of the meeting of the Peace Congress. It is evident that Germany hopes much from the appointment, and we ought to reciprocate these hopes. To suggest, as the Times does, that no important change can be expected is a counsel of despair. In international, as in private affairs, good-will counts for much. If we both desire a better understanding a way can be found. The correct translation of the angelic song, though less beautiful, is more significant than that of the Authorised Version. "Peace on earth among men of good-will" is a real possibility. The good-will is the first essential. If we want peace, and believe in peace, it does not pass the wit of man to make peace. Reason and self-interest will not settle it alone. We must begin with the good-will. In that spirit we welcome Baron von Marschall amongst us.

* * *

"THERE appears at last," says the Times of Wednesday, "to be some prospect, notwithstanding the pressure of party exigencies, that the present Session of Parliament may be marked by the passage of a measure which will at least make a commencement in the direction of dealing effectively with that great body of feeble-minded persons which rests as a burden upon our civilisation, and which presents such serious problems alike to the educator and the criminologist." All who know anything of prisons, workhouses and reformatories must earnestly desire some wise and careful dealing by the State with the feeble-minded. They form a large proportion of the young people in our workhouses. They are the despair of our Boards of Guardians. They are entirely out of place in the workhouse, and yet under present arrangements there is nowhere else for many of them to go. The Royal Commission which reported in 1908 urged that persons who cannot take part in the struggle for life owing to mental defect, whether they are described as lunatics or persons of unsound mind, idiots, imbeciles, or feeble-minded, should be afforded by the State such special protection as may be suited to their needs.

* * *

At present no protection suited to their needs is provided for the feeble-minded. Year after year girls of this type come into the workhouse infirmary to be confined of illegitimate children. If the child dies, or they can find some relative or friend to support it, they go out again. Otherwise they remain in the workhouse, passing their lives in a miserable and hopeless imprisonment. Young men of this type drift in and out of the workhouse, and nobody knows what to do with them. They probably end by being sent to prison. This type is not so difficult to define as some people imagine. The exact limits, those on the border line, may cause difficulty, but that is true of all border lines. State action, giving power of control and segregation in pleasant colonies where these unfortunates will be wisely and kindly treated, is one of the great needs of our time. It is earnestly to be hoped that Parliament, amidst its party controversies, will find time to make a beginning of legislation in connection with this great problem.

* * *

It is a matter of national honour that the case of Miss Malecka, on whom the barbarous sentence of four years' penal servitude to be followed by exile to Siberia for life has been passed in Russia, should be thoroughly investigated by the British Government, and that every possible effort should be made to secure her release. It has been borne in upon us of late that the right of free speech is not so secure even in England as we formerly believed, but we are, at least, allowed to hold certain ideas in this country if we do not so follow them out in practice as to jeopardise the lives and property of our fellow citizens. In Russia, however, it is not safe to express any opinion which lays you open to the vaguest charge of being associated with the Revolutionary party. Merely to have friends among the Socialists, without being a convert to the Socialist faith, is enough to make a man or woman suspect. Miss Malecka, so far as our information serves, appears to be singularly innocent of any designs on the Government, and her only offence is that she has not exercised that execrable prudence in respect of the views she holds on political matters which is so closely allied to cowardice that it is hard to see where it differs from it.

* * *

CANON LILLEY, writing in the Daily News and Leader on the life-story of Miss Malecka, whom he has known almost as well as if she had been a member of his own family for the past twelve years, helps us to understand readily how she has incurred the suspicion of those in authority which has brought upon her such an awful punishment. "Her nature," he says, "is frank, generous, unreserved. She is an artist to her finger-tips, lived, indeed, in and for her art. Like most of us she professed Socialist opinions, though I always regarded her as one of the sanest and least extreme of all my Socialist friends. . . Of one thing I am certain. The greatest possible measure of Katie Malecka's crime is that she may have said in Russia in private conversation what she might have said in England in the presence of the Russian Ambassador without unduly violating social convenances, that she did not in Russia turn her back upon friends whom she had made in England because in Russia they were politically suspect. In short, that she imprudently carried her English fearlessness and her English loyalty with her. It is not too much to say that any one of us, her English friends, might, if we found ourselves in Warsaw tomorrow, be convicted on the same grounds that she was convicted, or that we might have good reason to be ashamed of ourselves if we were not."

* * *

SIR GEORGE WHITE, whose death took place last Saturday, was a great Non-conformist and Liberal of the older school, a man of strong convictions, without being in any sense a narrow sectarian, who commanded the warmest personal regard and respect. He carried the clear and decisive mind, the natural sagacity and power of application which enabled him to achieve considerable success in business into his religious and political life, and this prevented him, although he belonged to the uncompromising Puritan type, from becoming too fanatically imbued with the spirit of the partisan. His serious interest in the questions to which he devoted so much attention seems to have been awakened (according to the Manchester Guardian) in his youth by a Unitarian named John Withers Dowson, who keenly concerned himself in the welfare of the youth of his district. His early activities were confined to the city of Norwich, in the public life of which for over half a century he exerted a powerful and wholesome influence. His zeal for education was unbounded, and he was among the first group of passive resisters when the indignation of Free Churchmen was aroused at the Act which abolished the school boards, allowing his goods to be seized again and again rather than pay rates for sectarian teaching. He never shirked his Parliamentary duties, but the week-end invariably saw him in Norwich, where, until he reached an advanced age, he carried on his adult school for Bible study, gathering round him a devoted group of working men. In private life Sir George White was quiet and unpretentious, characterised in everything he said or did by that absolute sincerity which makes such men the salt of the earth.

* * *

WE should like to call attention to Mrs. Constance Garnett's appeal in the press for contributions to the Russian Famine Relief Fund. "I am writing," she says, "to beg all kind-hearted people to help in raising funds for the relief of the starving peasants in Russia. It has been very difficult to gain any support in this; everything has been against it; first, the coal strike, then the Titanic disaster. Russians are doing their utmost to organise relief in the famine-stricken villages. But the area to be covered is immense, and 20,000,000 are starving. There are few well-to-do people in Russia; 90 per cent. of the population are peasants, and all classes have been impoverished by the troubles of the last seven years. Help from abroad will be particularly opportune now, for early summer till the next harvest is always the worst time. Subscriptions are apt to fall off, and the distress is at its most acute stage. It is hard for English people to realise what famine means. . . . Many years ago I stayed in a Russian province where there had been famine the winter before, and what I saw then haunts me still—the white, weak faces of men and women, the dreadful absence of children. The babies all die, for the starved mothers have no milk, and the children quickly succumb to dysentery, &c., from eating the famine bread, made of straw, bark, and refuse. One woman said to me, "I had ten children. They are all dead." Subscriptions should be sent to the treasurer of the Russian Famine Relief Fund, Ralph Vaughan Williams, 13, Cheyne-walk, Chelsea. Twelve shillings will keep a man alive till harvest."

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

GEORGE DAWSON AND THE COMING CHURCH.

I.

GEORGE DAWSON was undoubtedly one of Birmingham's greatest citizens and foremost religious leaders a generation ago—and yet the remembrance of his life and work seems to have almost entirely faded out of the minds of the present generation.

True, there is a statue of him in Chamberlain Square, and a fine bust in the Reference Library commemorates his ardent labours for the establishment of that institution; but the great church which he founded has been sold long ago, and at present serves the purpose of a picture theatre in a district almost completely commercialised and inhabited only by the less fortunate toilers of the city. Yet there is one church in Birmingham—a small and struggling church, it is true—of which the present writer happens to be the minister, which has reverently cultivated the memory of this great man for many years, and regards its connection with him as a precious heritage. A brass tablet inserted in the wall of Waverley-road Church, Small Heath, bears this inscription:

"The Church of the Saviour founded by the late George Dawson, M.A., in 1847, having been closed in 1895, the trustees presented the sum of £900 towards the building fund of this Church, December 31, 1898."

Below the above is a memorial tablet in grey marble, also presented by the Trustees of the former Church of the Saviour, which reads thus:

"In loving memory of George Dawson, M.A. Coming to this town in the year 1844, he gathered round him a band of followers who found in his teaching a fervent religious spirit, and a fearless trust in God as our Heavenly Father, in union with an earnest search after truth. To perpetuate such union they built this Church, which he opened August 8, 1847, and to which he ministered until his death. Not in this church only, but throughout the land did he everywhere teach to nations: that they are exalted by righteousness alone; to men: 'To do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with God.' He was born February 24, 1821, and died November 30, 1876."

George Dawson came to Birmingham as a Baptist minister at the invitation of the Mount Zion Chapel in Graham-street. Here he at once made a stir by his sermons on "Signs of the Times," which contained an eloquent protest against the Oxford Movement associated with the names of Pusey and Newman and the "Tracts for the Times."

At that time he was no doubt an orthodox Protestant and a champion of the great Evangelical dogmas of justification by faith, and salvation through the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, acknowledging as the one law of faith and rule of life "the Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible." Before two years had elapsed his opinions had undergone a decided change, and eventually some members of his congregation found him too latitudinarian in his views, which they said were not in keeping with their Trust Deeds. Their main grievance seems to have been the fact that he admitted those who believed in Infant Baptism to a participation in the Lord's Supper, and that he insisted on preaching, that a good life was better than Orthodox Baptist belief. In consequence of the dissensions which arose in the congregation a large number of members finally seceded from the Chapel, and constituting themselves into an independent congregation appointed Dawson as their spiritual leader. Unable to obtain permission to use the Town Hall for their religious services, they succeeded in securing the use of the People's Hall in Loveday-street for their morning services, while availing themselves of the offer of the Unitarians to conduct their evening worship at New Hall Hill Chapel. It is a remarkable testimony to the zeal and enterprise of this new congregation that in less than a year they were in a position to cut the first sods of turf for their new building, on which occasion the Minister stated the principles which were to govern the future Church. These were of so broad and liberal a character, and so much in advance of the general tendency of the times, that they seem well worth quoting in extenso :—

(1) The members of this congregation admit that there exists among them considerable diversity of opinion upon several important doctrines in theology, but they do not regard that difference as a bar to Christian union.

(2) They unite for the study of Christian truth, under the instruction of a teacher whom they do not regard as the retained advocate of certain doctrines, and therefore bound to publish them, but as one whose duty it is to aid them in their studies by giving them the benefit of his earnest inquiry into the truth of God.

(3) They unite into the bond of charity as students, with a feeling that each has much to learn, perchance much to unlearn; their bond is prospective rather than retrospective—a common spirit, end, and aim, rather than a common "belief" or "creed."

(4) They unite to do good to others—to obey the Lord's commandments, "to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to instruct the ignorant."

(5) They hold that to each individual his theological belief is of high importance; they seek, therefore, to promote belief in what, to them, appears the best mode—not by requiring it authoritatively, but by searching for evidence in the freest spirit of inquiry.

(6) On controverted points they would examine both sides of the controversy, and then, having "proved all things, hold fast that which is good."

(7) They hold that, lacking the power to search the hearts of men, they must be content with the confession of the mouth and still stronger evidence afforded by Christ's rule, "by their fruits ye shall know them"; they therefore regard the Christian character, as displayed in life, as their rule by which to know the Christian.

(8) The Communion of the Lord's Supper is open to all, a man's own conscience being regarded as the arbiter of his fitness or unfitness for participation therein.

The Church of the Saviour—with a seating capacity for about 1,600—was opened on August 8, 1847, when Dawson delivered a remarkable sermon on "The Demands of the Age upon the Church," formulating these as freedom of thought, unity of spirit regardless of uniformity of opinion, and brotherhood and equality. The Christian Religion, he said, or the eternal idea of God touching man, revealed in and through Christ, changes not; it is the doctrine of the Eternal, Immutable, and the Infinite. The Christian Church, on the other hand, is a provision for the application of these immutable doctrines to a mutable and changing state. The New Testament teaches the doctrine of an everlasting, indwelling Spirit, and its law of church government is contained in the famous saying "it seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us." The Church of the future must obey the eternal law of progress, rising superior to denominationalism of any kind; it must be a church for the doubters also. While the denominations have for their object the propagation and defence of doctrinal peculiarities, to which they owe their origin, the new Church was to hold up to the world their points of agreement, "the common quantity of the whole," love to God and Jesus Christ, the Author and Finisher of our faith.

Dawson remained a faithful champion of the principles here enunciated during the twenty-nine years of his ministry that were to follow. Those years were brimful of arduous toil for the common good. There was not a cause affecting the welfare of the community which he was not ready to champion with the force of his magnetic personality. An advocate of the temperance movement, we find him now supporting a meeting of shop-assistants for the demand of shorter hours of labour, now using his influence for the establishment of public baths and recreation grounds; registering his vote on the side of compulsory education and taking an active part in the political movements of the day. "I was born a politician when I was born an Englishman," he said in one of his great speeches against standing armies and navies (February 25, 1845). "I love politics. I do not mean the politics of Chartists, Whig, Radical, or Tory, but the true study of politics—the history of man and the rights of man—the politics of the New Testament." At one time he even edited a daily paper, which, however, involved him in considerable financial trouble.

Nor were his sympathies confined to his own country. He took a keen interest in the Hungarian struggle for independence, invited Kossuth to lecture in Birmingham and helped to collect subsidies for him to the amount of nearly £1,000. The French Republic, which had been established after the flight of Louis Philippe, gained his support, while Mazzini and the Italian Patriots counted him among their friends. He also became instrumental in securing Aston Hall and Park, formerly the historic property of Sir Thomas Holte, a loyal subject of King Charles I. during the stormy days of the Revolution, for the use of the public. In 1860 he strongly advocated the adoption by the town of the Free Libraries Act, and for many years devoted much of his time in conjunction with his friend, Mr. Sam Timmins, to the work of the Free Libraries Committee. When the Reference Library was opened six years later, he was asked to give the opening address. In this he declared that there were few places which he would rather haunt after his death than that room, and few things he would have his children remember more than the fact that he spoke the discourse at the opening of that building, which he regarded as the firstfruits of a clear understanding that "a great town is a solemn organism through which shall flow and in which shall be shaped all the highest, loftiest, and truest ends of man's intellectual and moral nature." He had been at work for several years in collecting the materials for a Shakespeare Library, and in 1868 was able to hand over to the Free Libraries Committee a unique collection of Shakespearian books. When some ten years later the Reference Library, together with this collection of Shakespeariana, was almost completely destroyed by fire, their originator had been resting in his quiet grave for more than two years. But his spirit was still alive in the hearts of the Birmingham people when they made arise out of the ashes of the old, a greater and finer building in which to carry on the work that he had had so much at heart.

In spite of the multifarious duties which Dawson undertook for the benefit of his fellow citizens, he not only did not neglect his pulpit work, which had rapidly made him one of the most prominent preachers in the town, but he found time to give literary discourses on the most varied subjects both in Birmingham, Manchester, and other provincial centres; possessing in a large measure the rare gift of being able to seize the original thoughts of great minds and adapting them to the comprehension of his hearers. He was a born expositor. His range of subjects was apparently as wide as his sympathies with humanity. He would lecture with the same ease and in his own brilliant manner on the English poets from Milton and Shakespeare to Wordsworth and Coleridge, as on Voltaire, Rousseau, Goethe, and theologians of the type of Zwingli, Wesley, and Joseph Priestley. His style, we are told, was characteristic of the man; at once racy, free, and flexible, it would now pass into passionate denunciation and now again into quiet humour or tender pathos. He held his audiences spell-bound, and his lectures seemed to his hearers more like a conversation addressed to them from the platform than a set discourse.

GERTRUD VON PETZOLD.

IN TIME OF DROUGHT.

THERE are periods in the lives of all of us when the springs of joy are dry, when the soul is athirst in a parched land, when love bows down unto the dust and all inspiration fails. They do not come very often, and for that we should be thankful; but when they do they are apt to be as protracted and exhausting as the long, hot summer which the writer of this book commemorates. And then it is well for us if we can find some deep wells of refreshment, some cool and fragrant haunts of peace close to the heart of nature where we may close tired eyes under the shade of friendly boughs, and seek refuge from the burden and heat of the day. Such wells of refreshment, such oases in the desert are to be found in the tender reflections on life and love, patience, humility, beauty, friendship, and the peace that passeth understanding which Mr. Scott Palmer has gathered up under the title of "From the Forest."* Those who know something already of this writer will not require to be told anything more. They will at once procure the book and pass into an atmosphere of joyous serenity which is to be found, beyond question, on the top of a certain "crumpled bit of earth" in Sussex, where you can sit in dreamful imagination with a wealth of anemone roses on the sunny wall behind, and the forest stretching before you in the valley.

But there are others craving a brief respite from the dusty tumult of life who will never believe, unless we forcibly impress it upon them, that enough wisdom, spiritual insight, discriminating judgment in the affairs of men and tender human sympathy to serve for a lifetime (if the reader knows how to turn it to good account) is to be found enshrined within one small volume of the modest "Road-mender" series. And it is all done with such exquisite simplicity and self-restraint. You are aware of the infinite riches of a well-stored mind conversant with heavenly mysteries and the Bergsonian philosophy; yet your attention is constantly drawn from these high matters and riveted on Jim, the gardener, the "great lady" of small means and heroic soul who spreads radiance in a dingy back street in Islington, and such-like "divine children" who are, indeed, accounted the fools of this world and the friends of God. Mr. Palmer is a philosopher who has long been awake in "a crowded and lovely world," and combines the devotion of one who cherishes the treasures of the past with the ardour of those who believe in the promise of the future. He is thrilled with the vision of democracy, but he does not lose his head over it. He has a true sense of values and proportions, and knows infallibly what are the incorruptible and precious things that moth and rust can nowise destroy. His discernment in matters which require the separation of the false from the true—often a difficult and delicate business—is unerring, and he has, above all, the lovable temper, not to be described as merely charitable, of those who recognise that all men cannot be judged by the same standards—that "there are small beginnings fitted to small folk."

Nature he loves with the passion of a great lover in all her changing moods, but he does not forget that in worshipping "earth's fair face we may forget men and the supreme desires of God." The book, indeed, is full of wise and salutary sayings which are (to go back to our former simile) like cooling draughts from the deep wells of life, and perhaps there was never a time when the world was more in need of them. Even death has a serene and lovely face for this gravely optimistic writer. "Our hope of death remains," he says, in spite of the scientific dreams of its conquest, "with the splendour of the promise that it gives." "Even here, under the stars," he confesses in another place, having made his bed one hot night amid fragrant bracken in the forest, "I see that peace is no other than a quality of soul hard to be won, a spirit given and received." And again: "In reality there are no friends of man who are not friends of God, too, whatever they may say"; but how true it is that men and women are to be found "for whom religion is a trade, who seek God as though He were a gold mine, or crave spiritual rank as they might crave the Garter and a place at Court." There is, too, a world of wisdom in this saying: "To give life for his country, this little province of a little earth, is good, may be heroic. To give it for the other country, for the home and fatherland of our souls—what will you say of that?" Finally, towards the close of the book, which begins with May and the crab-apple blossom, and ends with "Ave Atque Vale," and the quiet passing of Autumn, we have a lyrical outpouring of the unaging soul. "I sing now—or would if I had the poet's voice to use—the joys and triumph of old age. Youth is fair, middle-age ripe and sometimes sound; but old age is the slow rending of a chrysalis that lets love through, visible and tangible, on its wide wings of glory."

* From the Forest. By W. Scott Palmer. London: Duckworth & Co. 2s. 6d. net.

This note of trust, expectation, and happiness is struck again and again. It is the note of the forest—that scene of insurgent life and the unending reincarnations of beauty. It is the note of the new philosophy which is changing cold theories into palpitating vision, and making the very stones alive. It is the note of the patient spirit, schooled in adversity and no longer deluded with shams, that makes ready to slip off its dust as the crocus sheds its sheath, and stand upright in the sunlight of God at the resurrection of the dead.

QUESTIONS AT ISSUE.

[Under this heading writers discuss freely from their own point of view living problems of Religion, Ethics, and Social Reform, but the Editor does not assume responsibility for the opinions expressed.]

THE REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON VIVISECTION.

WIDE publicity has been given to the statement of the Commissioners on Vivisection that "the great preponderance of medical and scientific authority is against the opponents of vivisection."

It appears from the context that this statement means that the Commissioners believe that although the beneficial results claimed from experiments on living animals have, in some conspicuous instances, proved to be fallacious or useless, nevertheless valuable results have been obtained, and are likely to be obtained in the future by this method—results which, in all probability, could not have been obtained otherwise.

So far, then, the Commissioners themselves take sides against those "opponents of vivisection" who maintain that the methods they oppose have secured no valuable results whatever. But everyone knows that the majority of anti-vivisectionists do not stake their case on the sterility (absolute or relative) of vivisectional methods, but on their essential immorality so far as they involve the systematic infliction of suffering upon animals. And here the "opponents of vivisection" receive strong and unexpected support from the Commissioners, who unanimously recommend that if "the animal is suffering severe pain, which is likely to endure," the experimenter should be required "to cause its painless death, even though the object of the experiment has not been attained" (the italics are ours). Three out of the eight Commissioners (one a soldier and the other two medical men) do not think that this recommendation is drastic enough, and would recommend that whenever "obvious suffering has supervened" the animal should be killed. Every opponent of vivisection has over and over again heard the position defended that the infliction of pain, of undefined duration and extent, upon animals, may be justified by its beneficent results, and it will be with deep thankfulness that they will greet the striking evidence of the advance of opinion on this subject contained in the Report. When all the Commissioners condemn, irrespective of the results sought or obtained, the infliction of "severe pain which is likely to endure," and when Colonel Lockwood, Sir William Collins, and Dr. Wilson "recoil from the suggestion that an experimenter should be authorised to protract the life of an animal in obvious suffering, or which exhibits signs even of severe pain," whether the pain is likely to endure or not, and recommend "a requirement upon all experimenters in every case in which obvious suffering has supervened forthwith painlessly to destroy the animal," the opponents of vivisection may sing their "Te Deum," though certainly not their "Nunc Dimittis."

On the vexed question of the extent to which painful experiments or operations (surgical or inoculatory) are habitually performed in the laboratories, the Commissioners, on the whole, lean to optimism. Dr. Wilson, however, is impressed by the evidence on the other side; and all his colleagues agree with him that extra precautions are needed to strengthen the present law, which leaves too much to the judgment of the experimenter; and they give prominence to their belief that the granting of licences to men holding such opinions as those of the notorious Dr. Klein and a less known Dr. Pembrey, "is calculated to create serious misgivings in the minds of the public." The scandal of Dr. Klein's appointment to an important "research" post under the Local Government Board, together with certain features in the existing law as to the granting of special licences, and the Home Secretary's practice in the selection of his scientific advisers have given force to the charge, constantly urged by the anti-vivisectionists, that the present Act is really administered by the vivisectionists themselves, and therefore cannot be accepted as a satisfactory check on their doings.

The answer was that, as the licensees are an honourable set of men, and know more about the matter than any others, it was quite proper that the Home Secretary should be practically guided by them. The Commissioners would certainly not question either the honour or the competence of the licence holders as a body; but they have evidently grasped the immensely important principle that, in all which concerns the conscience and conduct, experts should be regarded as valued witnesses and assessors, but should never be nominated as judge and jury. As to the practical value of the extra precautions they suggest, as legal regulations, and the reforms in procedure calculated to bring home the responsibility of licence-granting more closely and individually to the Secretary of State, opinions will probably be sharply divided. But in principle the relations between expert and layman are soundly conceived.

But it is perhaps just on the expert's ground, the question, namely, of the actual value of the results claimed by the surgical and physiological laboratories, that the Report will contain most surprises for the layman. It is perfectly true that, with one exception, the Commissioners are firm in their general belief that great benefits have been secured. But in detail they are very frank in their admissions of failure and uncertainty. Many readers will be startled to find, for instance, that they seem to entertain grave doubts as to the efficacy of the serum treatment of diphtheria. They point out that the death-rate, as measured per million of the population, was not reduced by the introduction of this celebrated process. The latest series of years for which they commanded statistics showed a "death rate from diphtheria" that was "not less" than it was "twenty years ago." The statistics on which the remedy has made its reputation give the percentage of deaths not in relation to the population, but in relation to the cases treated. The Commissioners see that such statistics are, to say the least of it, ambiguous, and that, as long as the death rate is not reduced, the greater proportion of treated cases that do not end fatally may indicate simply that more cases are treated as diphtheria rather than that more cures of dangerous cases are effected; and they seem to regret that the serum treatment is now so firmly established that it is not likely that any "controlling" observations that would really test its value will be made.

Beyond these, and other remarkable admissions of the Commissioners as a body, there is a long memorandum by Dr. Wilson, a medical man of standing, who has held important public appointments, who declares that he is not an anti-vivisectionist, though he dislikes vivisection, and who is a convinced believer in vaccination. Dr. Wilson makes a root and branch attack upon serum therapy, which will long be an armoury for its opponents. His examination of Pasteur's hydrophobia statistics, for instance, can hardly fail to startle even the most easy-going believer; and the careful reader of the whole memorandum will be profoundly impressed by the evidence that Dr. Wilson arrays in support of his thesis that the "so-called consensus of medical opinion" is "a very fallible and fickle court of appeal."

The layman who determines his line of conduct and sympathy on broad considerations of logic, morals, and common sense, need not fear to brave it.

PHILIP H. WICKSTEED.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

THE LATE BISHOP OF TRURO.

SIR,—Your mention of the death of the Bishop of Truro seems to suggest a word from the West. His cremated remains have been reverently laid to rest in the stately cathedral of Truro, in the presence of a concourse of friends who loved and neighbours who honoured him; and it is touching to record that his four sons were the bearers. But what may specially interest your readers is a personal reminiscence.

In the year 1909 the Devonshire Association for the Advancement of Science, Literature and Art held its forty-eighth annual meeting at Launceston, on this occasion travelling into the adjacent county of Cornwall. It was fitting that the accomplished Bishop of the Diocese should be the President; and his official address was charming and full of suggestion. "What is the use of a poet?" he asked. "What is the function which, in the practical life of the present, poetry may be reasonably supposed to perform? What is the place, if any, which poetry should occupy in the education of the people? That is the subject which I am proposing for our consideration to-night." It was a privilege to hear the address; and it is a further privilege to possess it in the printed Transactions of the Devonshire Association. On one evening, during the delightful days of the gathering in Cornwall, I spoke with the late Bishop about Dr. Martineau, and about Richard Acland Armstrong. Many of your readers know how Dr. Stubbs worked with Mr. Armstrong during his incumbency of Wavertree, for the betterment of Liverpool. That was before he went to the Deanery of Ely. The Bishop had tender words for the memory of my old fellow-student; and he spoke of their joint-editorship of a well-known periodical which stirred attention to questions that both had at heart. With regard to Dr. Martineau, Dr. Stubbs told me how he used to go to hear him preach in past days. That, I suppose, must have been during the period of his own early manhood in Liverpool, of which city he appears to have been a native. There was a pathetic tone in the dignified Bishop's voice. Now he, too, has finished his earthly course: and others must take up the burthen.—Yours, &c.,

JEFFERY WORTHINGTON.

Chudleigh Cottage, Cullompton, Devon,
May 13, 1912.

DISCUSSIONS AT THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

SIR,—The addresses at the Birmingham Conference have so stirred my mind that perhaps you will be able to find room for this letter from one whose home is set among the lonely hills. I want to tentatively suggest that the papers on Bergson and his work show a somewhat distinct leaning to Dualism, if not to Pantheism, and that the Deity, whose form emerges is, if a Spirit, at least, as Laurie's "Synthetica Ethica" so well points out, "a Spirit in difficulty," and that He is "in a difficulty (with matter presumably) from which He is slowly extricating Himself and us." Now, I only want to urge here that such intellectual positions as this sap, for vast numbers of men and women, the very elements of devotional worship. They lead many to see, furthermore, one great difficulty in such an address as Dr. Mellone's on "Prayer," such a grave matter as the passing of God as an object of worship, such an attenuation of the mental concept of God as a living Personality that one seems to be left with the impression that when one prays it is not so much to a personal Being, who is both transcendent and immanent, as it is rather an appeal to the higher side of one's own nature, and that alone. That is to say, that the idea of God as a Father, perhaps a Father-Mother, as many would now say, to whom a man or woman can go as a child in whom the Father has a personal interest, this idea seems to me to be in peril of being very dangerously weakened. And I would like to suggest, first, that the way organic evolution has worked on this earth appears to have been from what one might call the less personal, if not the entirely impersonal, to the personal; and that this emphasis grows stronger in the moral and spiritual life. Hence, it does seem to me that just as one may expect to gain the greatest knowledge along the pathway of the personal in God and man, so also it becomes us, as children of the Kingdom, to guard against what may be the creeping waters of a paralysing pantheism, which seems to be the special peril of our age, and our special peril in that part of the vineyard of Christ in which we work. I owe too much to Dr. Mellone not to feel free to raise the questions his moving address suggested to me.

Passing on to the Social Conference, I want, with somewhat inconsistent diffidence, to plead for more courage of treatment. And at the outset I would like distinctly to deprecate the class rancour and the opposing resentment which peeps out in some corners of our public life. Even were "the capitalists," as they are called,

"the villains of the piece," it is just as well to remember that the present social situation is not only an inevitable, but an historic and evolutionary development of world-wide industrial and social life. Even the works of Marx and Engels and Kautsky demonstrate this. Such a thought will save some ultra-enthusiastic minister from uselessly anathematising by name, and in the name of the Church of God, some very much astonished and outraged wealthy merchant or "captain of industry," and that is the quite possible outcome of the impassioned eloquence of Mr. Lloyd Thomas! Personally, I do not think the Conference had time to consider fairly the thorny problem of unemployment. That, and the unmistakable widespread poverty of the workers of every nation is the central problem, on the industrial side, of our Western civilisation. We have either to settle them or they will settle us. Mr. John Ward's paper warned us that nothing less than drastic reconstruction of the social organism may be required. Mr. Brunner believed in education, temperance, capitalist foresight and State insurance as remedies; and Mr. Ronald Williams advocated certain non-competitive Government works, new industries, and trade regulation through labour bureaux. Mr. Chancellor asked for extensive land taxation and land purchase, and temperance, and in these he was strongly supported by Mr. Maddison, whose anger was mightily kindled by a lay and a clerical advocate of Socialist principle.

Now I want to ask your readers to consider and to face certain results, inevitable results to my mind, of these remedies if applied, because, if they are mere cul de sacs there is no reason why we should waste time walking down them. Every single remedy has its real temporary advantages, and the only sound criticism of each and all of them is that none of them cure unemployment or poverty. Labour bureaux at the best cannot make more work than there is, and the first condition asked of every workman is that he shall produce goods at a profit, or in other words, produce more than he can consume. Every piece of labour-saving machinery, every industrial combination, and every natural disaster threatens his chance of employment; but the first and greatest menace is the enormous difference between his productive power when it is well organised, and the wages which limit his consuming ability. Technical training only swells the armies of the skilled workers, and makes internal competition between them for what work there is the keener, and more disastrous to the less skilled of their number. Co-partnership schemes all "speed up" the men and women to a greater output, at the present cost of physical and mental vigour; and when one thinks of anything like universal co-partnership in production for profit in the future one can easily see the end of that remedy. Temperance also is of high value to the individual and to society, but it doesn't escape the peril of tending to force down wages; nor does it alter the fact that while riches are increasing, the ranks of the poor are also on the increase, and the ranks of the middle class more and more depleted.

Mr. Brunner's comment on the Labour Party's Right to Work Bill was very apt.

You cannot accept such a right if the present basis of society in private profit and private property is to go on. The two are incompatible. If the new industries are non-competing, then the maintenance cost of an ever-extending host of unemployed workers passing into State industries will crush the rate and taxpayer to the ground. If the industries are competing then their success depends on their power to create private profit, to compete with and displace labour in non-State industries, and your problem rises again. So, too, with land taxation schemes. The great merchants can always outbid every other competitor, and by organisation can easily regulate prices; indeed, the more easily as the toll now paid as rent to the landlords will then be paid to the State. Moreover, land nationalisation leaves production for private profit untouched, with all its evil effects.

It is because the social problem is not primarily a class problem, but a human, a religious, and above all, a world-wide problem, that I urge the consideration of the points I raise upon your readers. Our fathers have harnessed the natural powers of the world for us; can we learn to harness the world's social and industrial powers of production and distribution along national and moral lines? If not there will soon be an end to our social conferences, and our churches and civilisation.—Yours, &c.,

W. J. PIGGOTT.

103, Albion-street, Burnley,
May 8, 1912.

THE SOCIAL CHALLENGE TO THE CHURCH.

A correspondent, referring to the correspondence on the above subject in our columns, sends us the following extract from one of Cardinal Newman's lectures on literature, which has some bearing on a remark in Mr. Gow's letter last week:—

"Since the thoughts and reasonings of an author, have, as I have said, a personal character, no wonder that his style is not only the image of his subject, but of his mind. That pomp of language, that full and tuneful diction, that felicitousness in the choice and exquisiteness in the collocation of words, which to prosaic writers seems artificial, is nothing else but the mere habit and way of a lofty intellect. Aristotle, in his sketch of the magnanimous man, tells us that his voice is deep, his motions slow, and his stature commanding. In like manner, the elocution of a great intellect is great. His language expresses, not only his great thoughts, but his real self. Certainly he might use fewer words than he uses, but he fertilizes his simplest ideas and germinates into a multitude of details and prolongs the march of his sentences, and sweeps round to the full diapason of his harmony as if . . . rejoicing in his own vigour and richness of resource. I say, a narrow critic will call it verbiage, when really it is a sort of fulness of heart parallel to that which makes the merry boy whistle as he walks, or the strong man, like the smith in the novel, flourish his club when there is no one to fight with."

VAN MISSION ARRANGEMENTS.

SIR,—The following is a list of places provisionally included in the programme for the present season. It would serve a useful purpose if friends interested in the Mission were to keep the list by them, and watch the announcements which will be made from time to time in case of alterations. I should welcome any suggestions too as to places on these routes that might be more advantageously visited than some of those in the lists. Communications from residents in the districts, and local particulars and offers of assistance are desired.

May I also add a word to the effect that new subscribers are wanted, and that subscriptions and donations may be sent to the Treasurer of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Essex Hall, or to me.—Yours, &c.

THOS. P. SPEDDING

(Missionary Agent).

Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

May 15, 1912.

VAN MISSION PROGRAMME FOR SEASON 1912.

May	No. 1 VAN.	No. 2 VAN.
13	*Stockton.	*Crewe.
20	—	Stoke.
27	Whit-week—No Meetings.
June
3	*Pontypridd.	Hanley.
10	*Cefn Coed.	*Burslem.
17	*Dowlais.	Tunstall.
24	*Merthyr.	*Nantwich.
July
1	Trecynon.	Market Drayton.
8	Aberaman.	Newport.
15	*Cwmbach.	Shifnal.
22	*Mountain Ash.	Wellington.
29	Tylors Town.	Cannock Chase.
Aug.
5	*Treorchy.	Willenhall.
12	*Tonypandy.	Darlaston.
19	Maesteg.	*Wolverhampton.
26	*Bridgend.	Bilston.
Sept.
2	Port Talbot.	Wednesbury.
9	Neath.	Tipton.
16	*Pontardawe.	*Dudley.
23	*Swansea.	*Oldbury.
30	—	*West Bromwich.
May	No. 3 VAN.	No. 4 VAN.
13	*Ilford.	*Leeds.
20	*Woolwich.	*Leeds.
27	Whitweek—No Meetings.
June
3	Erith.	*Leeds.
10	Bexley.	Castleford.
17	Gravesend or Dartford.	Pontefract.
24	Grays.	Knottingley.
July
1	Rainham.	*Selby.
8	Romford.	Goole.
15	Wanstead.	Howden.
22	Leytonstone.	Ferriby and Hessle.
29	*Walthamstow.	*Hull.
Aug.
5	Tottenham.	Cottingham.
12	Muswell Hill.	Beverley.
19	Edmonton.	Driffield.
26	Enfield.	Bridlington.
Sept.
2	Barnet.	Hunmanby and Filey.
9	Watford.	*Scarborough.
16	Edgware.	*Malton.
23	*Kilburn.	*York.
30	*Kentish Town.	Tadcaster.

* In these places there are congregations.

Several congregations are sufficiently near other places to render help in the Mission.

THE MINISTERS' MEETING IN WHIT-WEEK.

SIR,—Will you please allow me to extend the usual invitation of the London Unitarian ministers to their brethren of the provinces to their Whit-week meeting, which this year is to be held on the Wednesday, at mid-day, at Essex Hall, and at which they are always so glad to welcome their ministerial friends? The Rev. J. Arthur Pearson will preside, and the Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., will deliver an address, which will be followed by discussion. It is hoped that there will be a large attendance.—Yours, &c.,

FREDERICK SUMMERS,

Hon. Sec. of the London Unitarian Ministers' Meeting.

AN APPEAL.

SIR,—I should be glad if through your columns I might again make my annual appeal to those who contribute to our Country Holiday and Summer Funds, to send their contributions to me at the address below.

As the cost of our country holiday arrangements is heavy, though they are extremely satisfactory, and well worth any expense they involve, we need and should welcome some fresh contributors.

Yours, &c.,

R. P. FARLEY.

London Domestic Mission,

46, Bell-street, Edgware-road, N.W.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

FROEBEL AND HIS ENGLISH INTERPRETER.

The Student's Froebel. By William H. Herford, B.A. Revised and edited by D. B. & C. H., with an Introduction by Michael E. Sadler, M.A., LL.D., and a Memoir of W. H. Herford by C. H. Herford, Litt.D. London. Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons. 2s. 6d. net.

It is in every way a cheering sign of the progress of educational thought in our own country that a new edition of the late William Herford's adapted version of Froebel's "Menschenerziehung" should be called for. But for many readers not the least interesting features of the new issue will be the cordial appreciation of William Herford's service to English education by Dr. M. E. Sadler, and the Memoir by his nephew, Professor Herford. The latter is an excellent piece of work, in part a family record, in which the intimacy of affection blends naturally with wider interests. The educational ideals of Manchester College, then at York, which William Herford entered as a student in 1837, are treated with the respect due to a fine tradition. "There was nothing 'provincial,'" Professor Herford writes, "in the ideals of scholarship upheld in this provincial College; and if the limited number of the students precluded some elements of character-training furnished by the old universities, some of the defects of Oxford and Cambridge life and culture were also conspicuously absent. . . . The intellectual and ethical matter of literature, classical or other, was handled at York with a competence and a relative catholicity more easily attained, perhaps, by men to whom the history of dogma is only a special province of the history of thought than by dogmatists of any school." Later we have a delightful glimpse into the life of the University of Bonn in the early forties, when Arndt, though an old man, was still ardent and eloquent, and August Wilhelm Schlegel, translator of Shakespeare and friend of Madame de Staël, survived as "the somewhat faded elderly gentleman of fashion whose perfume and kid gloves Heine had derisively celebrated in the same place twenty-three years before." With Ihne, the future historian of Rome, then just rising into fame, William Herford formed an intimate friendship which lasted till Ihne's death. But the determining factor in his formative years, which later on led William Herford to abandon the ministry and give himself entirely to educational work, was his appointment as tutor to Lady Byron's grandson, first at Ashley Combe and then at the school at Hofwyl, near Berne, where he came under the inspiring influence of Wilhelm von Fellenberg. "By conversation with [v. Fellenberg]," he wrote in later life, "I learnt, or unfolded further what Lady N. B[Byron's] influence had helped me to understand, concerning natural training, the Education von innen heraus, of which, if Pestalozzi was the Galileo, Fr F[roebel] was the Newton. All 'my own ideas,' afterwards realised at Lancaster, of Education along with, not against, the child's nature . . . were learned, or ripened, at Hofwyl."

As an educationalist William Herford was undoubtedly preaching to deaf ears during most of his life. His daring methods often challenged the traditional mind to opposition rather than sympathy. It was not his way, as this memoir points out, "to temper the wind of novelty to the shorn lambs of precedent. On the contrary, he took a mischievous delight, compounded of the special satisfactions of the doctrinaire, the Radical, and the humourist—and he had much of all three—in presenting his doctrines and practices with their very sharpest edge foremost." Those who honoured and loved him for his courage and nobility of heart will be the first to recognise the truth of these words. But without these defects of his qualities which made him such a distinct and memorable personality among the men of his generation, it is more than probable that he could never have impressed himself enough to deserve the fine tribute which Dr. M. E. Sadler pays to his work:—"He was of the succession of those who have breathed a new spirit into Western education. . . . What Professor Legros has been to English Art, Herford was to English Education. He planted new ideas among us. . . . His giving up of himself was his greatest gift to England. But he also wrote what seems to me by far the best presentment of the educational doctrine of Froebel, in the work here reprinted and revised."

GOD AND THE SOUL.

The Ordinary Man and the Extraordinary Thing. By Harold Begbie. London: Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.

THE ordinary man is the man in the street; the extraordinary thing is the disclosure of God in his soul. The book is a study of conversion in human documents; but the documents concern more respectable and decent-living humans than was the case in Mr. Begbie's previous book, "Broken Earthenware." In that, he moved for his information among the entourage of the Salvation Army; in this he moves among the members of the Young Men's Christian Association. Consequently, this volume is much less interesting. From one point of view, it is a kind of journalistic - literary - anecdotal illustration of Maeterlinck's dictum that "the pressure of the soul has increased among mankind"; from another point of view, it appears to be an elaborate advertisement of the Y.M.C.A. The first two chapters give a biographical sketch of Sir George Williams, and a brief history of the movement which he originated; and so frequent and emphatic are the author's eulogies of this admirable institution, that one may be pardoned the possible error in thinking that he is as eager to push the institution as he is to present the documents. Certainly he does both of these things well. All Mr. Begbie's well-known characteristics of facility and enthusiasm are here. We do not think that the average member of the Y.M.C.A. is typical of the man in the street; nor do we think that he is the happiest expression of God in the soul. To assert that "the heart of representative man is in search of God," and then to illustrate from the Y.M.C.A., is an excellent example of Mr. Begbie's enthusiasm.

The narratives are too elaborate, too much clothed in eloquent periods, to be really impressive. If such things are to be told at all, they must be told with a directness and simplicity, and a reserve, which are not among Mr. Begbie's many gifts. He has a fine sympathy with human nature, a firm grip on religious essentials, and an unquestionable enthusiasm for the deep things of life; he knows his world, too, at first hand; but we wish that the aforesaid institution could have appeared in his pages incognito, so to speak.

E. W. LEWIS.

A MODERN CRUSADER. Florence Edgar Hobson. London: A. C. Fifield. 1s. net.

"A Modern Crusader" calls itself quite frankly "a dramatic pamphlet," which sounds like a contradiction in terms. If it is a pamphlet it is not dramatic; if it is a drama it is not a pamphlet. Probably the author only intends to disarm criticism by stating tacitly at the outset that this is merely a treatise on vegetarianism and hygiene, and that it is intended to be read and not acted. And if you are able to dismiss from your mind the idea that a play is meant to be played, you will find it a very readable treatise, and—especially if you are a vegetarian already—quite convincing. In the second act Mrs. Hobson shows herself the artist as well as the philanthropist and the theorist. The second act would act. The æsthetic sensations to be derived from the spectacular explicitness of a butcher's shop enhanced by squeals of dying pigs behind the scenes are a matter of taste. But the butcher is not only illuminating, he is artistically satisfying. Here, again, the drama and the pamphlet show themselves two mutually exclusive things; for however vigorously you might disapprove of his profession, you would inevitably hail the butcher himself as the most popular person in the play. The drama, as has often been said, was born in church; and what would the Miracle plays have done without the devil? Mrs. Hobson's dramatic instincts have got the better of her here, however successfully she has suppressed them elsewhere. For, unless the audience was composed exclusively of vegetarians, it might secretly share the probable opinion of the mediæval spectator that there was a good deal to be said for the devil. All this is not to say that the case for national hygiene is not excellently well put. We agree with every word of it—except, perhaps, in one departure from probability. In Mrs. Hobson's play the idealist has an income.

F. R.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

MESSRS. A. & C. BLACK:—The Life of William Robertson Smith: J. S. Black and Geo. Chrystal. 15s. net. The Lectures and Essays of William Robertson Smith: John S. Black and Geo. Chrystal. 10s. net. The Social Guide for 1912: Ed. Mrs. Hugh Adams and Miss Edith A. Browne. 2s. 6d. net.

THE CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS:—The Historicity of Jesus: Shirley Jackson Case. 6s. net. The Cambridge Manuals of Science and Literature. 1s. net per vol. The Ballad in Literature, T. F. Henderson; Goethe and the Twentieth Century, J. G. Robertson, M.A., Ph.D.; Life in the Mediæval University, R. S. Rait, M.A.; The History of Civilisation in Palestine, R. A. S. Macalister, M.A., F.S.A.; Methodism, H. B. Workman, D.Lit.; Ancient Assyria, C. H. W. Johns, Litt.D.

MESSRS. J. M. DENT & SON, LTD.:—Adolphe et Choix de Discours: Benjamin Constant. 1s. net. Les Chroniqueurs Français: Extraits. 1s. net.

MR. A. C. FIFIELD:—The Ballad of Two Great Cities: Harold Williams. 1s. net.

THE LINDSEY PRESS:—How a Modern Atheist found God: G. A. Ferguson. 1s. net.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN:—The Legal Sufferings of the Jews in Russia: Ed. Lucien Wolf. 1s. net. Christianity and Business: Edward Grubb, M.A. 2s. 6d. net.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

YOUNG LAMBS AT PLAY.

YOUNG life is everywhere around us in the Derwentwater Valley. Young leaves in the woods, young reeds in the marshy levels at the head of the lake, young shoots of heather on the upper fells, young birds in the nest, young lambs in the pasture, young things to gladden us wherever we turn—till one's heart craves for yet another verse to be added to that grand old canticle, the Benedicite, "O all ye young things upon the earth, bless ye the Lord!"

Here in the North we have a special breed of sheep, strong, active, hardy. They love the mountain tops in the summer-time, and can scramble about among crags and boulders as happily, if not as quickly, as the foxes. But if you want to see our lambs at play you need not put on nailed boots and take an alpenstock, for in May the ewes are kept in the valley meadows, and here the lambs are born. In the higher lying valleys there are to-day many newly-born lambs too feeble to do more than totter a yard or two. If such a lamb is healthy and its mother has enough milk for it, a few hours will make a great difference in its powers. Sometimes, especially if it is her first lamb, the ewe does not, as we say, "take to" her lamb. In this case, the shepherd will try various coaxing methods to induce her to do so. If these fail, the sheep is sometimes tied to a tree or rail with the lamb laid close to her. The confining cord is so short that the mother cannot get even a yard away from the little one. If this plan does not answer there is nothing for it but to "bottle feed" the lamb. Milk, or milk and water, is put into a soda-water or other bottle on which an indiarubber teat is fastened; the former takes the baby lamb in his arms and feeds it just as a nurse feeds a human baby. After a time the lamb is able to walk, then, very soon, to run, and a pretty sight it is to see a bottle-fed lamb run eagerly to meet the bottle carrier; indeed such a lamb will, when very hungry, race across the field towards any one who enters it in the hope that a meal is being brought. The little creatures suck at a great rate, and with strong power of suction, as I have often felt when allowing one to suck my fingers.

When a careless farm hand has broken or lost some of the bottles, very queer substitutes have to be used on an out-of-the-way farm. I have seen a glove finger, with a tiny hole cut in the tip, tied round a teapot. The woolly babies have taken quite kindly to this odd feeding bottle.

Now and then it happens that on a farm there is a motherless lamb and a sheep whose lamb is dead. In such a case the shepherd takes the living lamb to the bereaved mother and tries to induce her to adopt it. She probably refuses to do this, as she knows, by the scent, that it is no lamb of hers. Then the plan is tried of taking part of the fleece of the dead lamb and fastening it round the body of the orphan. If the other lamb has only been dead a short time, this dodge frequently deceives the sheep and she mothers the forlorn lamb. When once she has taken to it the fleece may be removed.

One day we were sitting on the fells, some miles from home, eating the picnic dinner we had brought with us, when a big fat sheep ran up to us evidently expecting to be fed; and fed it was. It gobbled bread and butter with a will; when there was no more for it, it turned its attention to a tin biscuit box containing cakes for our tea; the lid was not firmly fixed on; the sheep quickly worked it off with its nose and feet and set to on the sweet things. We had to drive it off again and again, for it was a persistent beggar. It must have been home fed, and much petted when it was a lamb.

In books, especially books of poetry, we usually read of "snow-white lambs," and in pictures you rarely see any but white lambs. Here, among the mountains, the purely white lamb is an exception. The hardy little mountain sheep are grey when grown up; often with patches of black on the head or feet. Their lambs are usually black and white. They are most active little creatures; when a few days old they will join the evening games. Games is really the best name for the performances that begin an hour or so before sunset. Eight or ten lambs will run together to some hillock, fallen tree, or other raised object. When they reach it they turn and race back again. They stand a few moments to get breath for a fresh start, and away they go, often leaping clear off the ground; but each time they make for the same spot. This racing goes on for perhaps ten minutes at a time, then one and another grows tired and cuddles down by its mother to rest.

Sheep dogs are trained to be very gentle with the flocks, especially in the lambing season. They may bark noisily enough, but no collie worth his breakfast porridge would think of touching a sheep or lamb with his teeth. He would be beaten if he were seen to do such a thing. If a sheep likes the field she and her lambs are in, she much dislikes to be driven to another, and will give a dog a good deal of trouble to get her out. She will stand with her back to the wall and her lambs at her side, and will stamp her foot at the dog. Last week I saw one do this, whereupon the farmer said in a quiet, conversational tone, "Well, leave her alone then." The dog, to my surprise, understood the words, and turned away. When the sheep saw that all the others were going away, she decided not to be left behind, and hurried to join them.

This farmer knows every sheep in his flock. You would see little difference in their faces and fleeces, but he sees what you and I miss. His sheep are not afraid of him, but follow him about when grass is scarce, putting their noses into his hand to ask for corn.

His farm is beautifully situated. Some of his fields run down to the edge of the lake, others are bordered on one side by woods, on the other by a merry little beck. Here and there in the meadows are shady oaks, under which the flock loves to lie if the sun is hot. During the past few days gentle rains have fallen to make the grass fresh and plentiful, and to bring on the May flowers.

The lambs in the pastures, the birds in the nest, the fish in the lake—all are happy in the sunshine.

EMILY NEWLING.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

CHARLES GORDON AMES.

OCTOBER 3, 1828—APRIL 10, 1912.

FOUR years ago we stretched out a hand of cordial greeting and warm affection across the Atlantic to Dr. Charles Gordon Ames on his eightieth birthday. It was with delightful memories of one who had a perfect genius for friendship, whose hand-clasp and sunny smile had been among the things which, in the previous year, made the International Congress of Religious Liberals at Boston memorable. In those days, Dr. Ames was already beginning to realise that it was time to reef sail and learn to relinquish some of the strenuous tasks of his long life of faithful ministry; but always with the feeling he so happily expressed at seventy-five: "Life seems ever near its beginning, as if we had not yet fairly tried it, and are only now getting ready. Why is it that old people feel so young in spirit—the outer life perishing, the inward ever renewed? There are men three times as old as John Percyfield, whose hearts give a leap at his words: 'I can see that in so many ways I am still a boy—frankly happy, frankly affectionate; and, please God, I mean to remain so till the end.' " That was thoroughly characteristic of the man, as was that other saying of his: "I don't mind having lived seventy-five years. Many a toad has lived longer than that. The question is, What has been done with it? . . . Never mind the years. We are alive, and we are in the boundless universe, sharers even now of the infinite and measureless life." And that meant for him the vision of God, and the conviction "that the ties which hold us together here and make our comradeship and fellowship so precious are everlasting, and that we shall belong to each other in that larger circle so long as God lives." There may have been at last some weariness, some burden of failing strength. But from that he is now delivered, and it is of the bright brave spirit that we must always think, and the undying affections that made his life so beautiful. On the Wednesday of Easter week the benediction of the ultimate peace was seen to rest upon him. We will not wrong his memory with any thoughts of death; his message is only of rejoicing life. "There are deep things of God: push out from shore!" he once said; and again: "Our greatest birthdays are the days when we enter into truer life, and come into possession of that inner good which is our proper inheritance as children of God." Is not this the greatest of all which his now come to him, in which that inner good shall be yet more abundantly revealed?

More than sixty years Dr. Ames gave himself to the Christian ministry, first as a youth among the Free Baptists, and then, from early manhood to the end, in the wider Unitarian fellowship. "In early convert days, at fourteen," he once said, in a retrospect of fifty years, "kneeling in solitude, I felt rather than heard the question, 'Are you willing to become a preacher?' And the answer came swiftly: 'I will be and do whatever God requires.' " His first work was for three years that of a printer's lad in New Hampshire, in the office of the Morning Star, a paper of his denomination. Then at eighteen he began to preach, and his church voted, "that Brother Ames be licensed to improve his gift." He went out to Ohio, and after a year at a Free Baptist seminary was ordained in 1849 to that ministry, and so preached until he found that his real place was among the Unitarians. Describing the change fifty years later, he said: "I became a catholic, but without Roman, Anglican, or other limitations. I found myself at home in the world of religion, caring as little for sectarian divisions as a squirrel cares for rail fences and stone walls in woods and fields. All the problems lay open, and I was in no haste to settle them till the light should show the way. My new business was to feel after the everlasting foundations of the spiritual order—foundations which lie deeper than church or creed or book, in the soul of man and the world of God; or, as Lowell says, 'in that original and eternal life out of which all the traditions have arisen.' " Minneapolis, Bloomington, Ill., and Albany are recalled as scenes of his early ministry; then after the War, from 1865 to 1872 he was in California as missionary minister, after which followed two pastorates in Philadelphia, with an interval from 1877 to 1880, when he edited the Christian Register in Boston. And to Boston he came finally in 1889, succeeding Dr. James Freeman Clarke as minister of the Church of the Disciples. It was the happiest choice, vindicated from the first as a true apostolic succession as the new voice won its way directly to the hearts of his hearers. Of what his ministry was in Boston for over twenty years Dr. Samuel Eliot tells in a tribute published in the Christian Register:

"He made his pulpit a throne of spiritual affirmation. It afforded him the opportunity for the unhampered play of his peculiar genius as apostle, prophet, and poet, and as a master of epigrammatic and picturesque expression. Like the great Teacher he revered, he saw parables and materials for our instruction in every experience. 'His mind,' as he said of Dr. Bartol, 'was like a mint, continually striking off bright coins of thought and speech. He worshipped neither antiquity nor novelty, but trusted in the ever-shining Light which showed to him an ever open way. He saw—and what he saw he proclaimed—the Real Presence in nature, in history, in humanity, and in the silent order of the world.'

"Until these last months of suffering he lived in perpetual youth. Like Channing, he was 'always young for liberty.' He said his brave and practical word upon all the vexed problems of his time. He could not be disobedient to any perception of truth and right which was to him a vision of service. Many were the ringing words for peace and temperance, for honesty and fair dealing in public life, for good citizenship and pure patriotism, for the piety which is joy in the Lord, and for the charity which suffereth long and is kind."

We are happy to have a good store of his own recorded words, as in his "Sermons of Sunrise" and above all in the "Book of Prayers" issued in commemoration of his eightieth birthday. With deepening delight he lived his life, with the deepening tenderness of a brave and ever helpful spirit, and with an ever deeper faith in the divine destiny of man. He looked out upon this world in the happiest human fellowship, as in the House Beautiful, from that "large upper chamber whose window opened towards the sunrising." And now, as the full glory of the new day floods his being, we rejoice with him, and for ourselves thank God and take courage.

V. D. D.

THE REV. W. SUNDERLAND SMITH.

We regret to announce that the death of the Rev. William Sunderland Smith took place after an illness of about a fortnight's duration, at his residence, The Manse, Antrim, on Monday evening, May 6. Mr. Smith was actively engaged in the ministry for a period of fifty-three years, forty years being spent as minister of the Old Presbyterian congregation in Antrim. He was for many years clerk of the Antrim Presbytery, and so unexpected was the end that only a few weeks ago he was nominated by the Templepatrick Presbytery for the position of moderator of the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church for the ensuing year. Before settling in Ireland, which he did in the year 1872, Mr. Smith was minister in Aberdeen, Rawtenstall, Doncaster, Tavistock, and Crediton. He was educated for the ministry in the Home Missionary College, Manchester. He was a faithful pastor, an interesting preacher, and was greatly esteemed within the bounds of his own Church. But these bounds did not contain all his friends. He was a man of wide and varied interests, and through his studies and writings made friends in all parts of the world. He was an expert botanist and geologist and an authority in matters pertaining to natural history. He was an antiquarian of no mean order, and he wrote several small books relative to the history of Antrim and district, which are well known to all interested in these matters. Mr. Smith leaves a widow, three sons, and two daughters to mourn his loss, to whom will be extended the sympathy of a wide circle of friends.

The funeral was on Thursday, May 9. Several ministers took part in the service, including the Revs. A. Turner, G. L. Phelps, M. S. Dunbar, and H. J. Rosington.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

PARENTS' NATIONAL EDUCATIONAL UNION.

ADDRESS BY THE HEADMASTER OF RUGBY SCHOOL.

THE annual meeting of the Parents' National Education Union was held on Tuesday, May 14, in the Botanical Theatre, University College, the Earl of Lytton being in the chair. The Union aims, as many of our readers know, at giving opportunities for the study of educational problems, and promoting intercourse between parents, teachers, and all who are interested in education in its widest sense, particularly in its relation to the development of character. The Council reports a year of steady progress, and there is abundant evidence not only that the work of the Union is urgently needed, but that the principles upon which it is founded and the ideals for which it stands are gradually permeating the public mind.

Dr. David, headmaster of Rugby, gave a delightful address on "Some Educational Ideals," a title, he said, which was rather vague, and allowed him to deal in an informal way with certain departments of school life in which he and some others were attempting to effect necessary reforms. He frankly admitted that they had not solved all their difficulties, that they were keeping an open mind, and that they were not very sure where their efforts would lead them; but he reminded his hearers of the saying of Cromwell, that "a man never rises so high as when he knoweth not whither he is going." The public school system came in for a good deal of criticism, and one of the first counts in the general indictment upon which he laid great stress was the teaching of English, or the lack of it. People complained that their boys, when they left school, were usually quite unable to express themselves properly and intelligently in speech or writing. In addition to this, after years of instruction and training, their teachers had utterly failed to imbue them with any love of the best literature. Some people went so far as to say that they could not read a book at all. He admitted the impeachment. He read a good many reports, and the thing that struck him most was that, in one case after another, boys who in other respects were by no means unintelligent broke down hopelessly when it came to the study of English. There were, of course, some possessing exceptional intellectual capacity of whom this could not be said, but the danger was that because these boys attained to a measure of taste and power of expression, there was a tendency to rest satisfied with the general system and to neglect all the rest. He gave a typical instance in order to show how the ability of the exceptional boy is fostered and developed while he is being speeded to his goal, say a position in the War Office, and maintained that during this process the other boys were largely wasting their time. They were subjected to a course of mental training which he believed very often had the effect of dulling their perceptions, and setting them against literature altogether. Our educational system was a manufactory which put all its power into finishing a few highly developed articles, but on the way it wasted a good deal of valuable material. He wished those present to understand that a great number of headmasters were profoundly dissatisfied with the whole system, and were trying to find out a new and better one. They were trying, some of them, to develop the capacity for reading intelligently, and concentrating the attention continuously first on easy books, and then on harder ones which demanded more mental exercise, and they were also training the boys to read aloud.

Then there was the question of composition. They were going about seeking information which would help them to discover the best method of getting a boy to express his ideas with clearness and sincerity on a given subject without putting down just what he thought the schoolmaster would expect him to say. The boy must learn to express himself, not somebody else. Proceeding, Dr. David said he regarded as a serious danger not only to the boys at public schools, but to the country generally the loss of simplicity, the decline of hardihood, the growth of dependence upon all sorts of comforts, and the dislike of pain which characterised the younger generation to-day. There was too little opportunity for the acquisition of bodily fortitude, and this troubled him very much. The causes were quite obvious, and could be traced to the general rise in the standard of material comfort. It was also largely owing to the presence in public schools of boys so delicate that fifty years ago they could not have gone to a public school at all. He did not wish to prevent these boys from coming to them, and he would not keep them away if he could. He thought they should be able to adjust their school life so that they would be able to admit them, especially as it often happened that they emerged from their school days quite cured of their physical weakness, and fit to enter upon a useful career. But this fact could not be overlooked, as it made it more difficult not to allow others, more vigorous, to be dragged down to a standard too low and soft, and lacking in manliness. There was already a morbid and widespread tendency among boys to think too much of their health and to rely too much on medicines. They frequently returned to Rugby with their boxes stuffed with tonic wines of various kinds, and discussed their symptoms and remedies quite seriously. He wanted them to have a very real sense of the importance of health, and, as a matter of fact, to be ashamed of being ill, but health was not best attained by a too-conscious pursuit of it, and he would rather encourage a return to some of the old sternness and simplicity of life which tended to robustness and vigour, and also to morality and self-control. He did not blame the boys for the morbid tendencies he had indicated, it was part of their heritage; but he always urged them not to yield to them, or to enervating influences.

Dr. David referred to another criticism which is often passed, namely, that the public school class was becoming less and less willing to take upon itself the burdens of local government. It was growing harder every year to get public school men to sit on district councils and boards of guardians, and this constituted a real danger for the future. One of the reasons for this reluctance was perhaps the fact that they did not understand the people whom they were forced to associate with in this way, but the sooner they did learn to understand them the better. They had got to drive it into the boys' heads that they must do a bit of work for their country, and in these rather dull ways they might do about a hundred times as much good as if they had a safe seat in the House of Commons. It was, however, necessary that some instruction should be given in the elementary facts of economics, which, he thought, could be worked in with the English lessons and the history lessons. The boys did not care about these things because they knew nothing about them, but some of them were showing in unmistakable ways that social problems were beginning to interest them, and he did not deplore the fact that there was a keen intellectual set who claimed to be Socialists. Whether they would hold the opinions they were so enthusiastic about now in ten years' time he could not say, but it was a sign of an awakening, and their eyes should be constantly lifted to a vision of a cleaner, stronger, and healthier England, and their minds trained in the acquisition of definite facts about problems which they might soon be called upon to deal with. In conclusion, Dr. David said he wanted to make the boys dream of this happier England, he wanted to teach them to express themselves clearly and concisely, to hark back to something of the old simplicity and adventurousness of life, to become tougher and more virile, and to look forward to the useful work they would have a hand in in the future.

Lord Lytton said that it had been borne in upon him more and more clearly during Dr. David's sympathetic address that none of the reforms he was advocating could be brought about without the help of the home, and here, he thought, was where the Union was tendering the greatest assistance. It was not fair to criticise the public schools for what the parents left undone, and each count of the indictment admitted by the lecturer proved that the work of education had not been properly started in the home. He urged, however, that boys should be taught how to express themselves not so much by set lessons as by giving each a chance of speaking, and a part to play individually during lesson time. At present nearly the whole of the time was spent in listening. He thought also that much might be done by sympathetic association between masters and boys out of school hours, when the latter might be encouraged to talk, and opportunities would arise for a real influence to be exercised in regard to their ideas. He was interested in what Dr. David had said about Socialism, because he found that the same thing was going on at Oxford and Cambridge, and if parents regarded this with alarm he would remind them that a sure way of encouraging it was to denounce this particular kind of political propaganda as pernicious nonsense. That would simply result in the boy locking his faith up in his heart and dwelling upon it more earnestly. If parents would interest themselves in their children's ideas and discuss them sympathetically with them, they would more often be able to counteract any influences which they thought pernicious, and give them sound guidance for the future.

A very interesting description was given by the Hon. Mrs. Franklin of the recent Children's gathering at Winchester, in connection with the Union, which had proved such a delightful time for the young people and adults alike, and warm thanks were tendered to Lord Lytton for the help he had given the society as Chairman of the Executive Committee, a position he is now compelled to resign in order that he may devote more time to pressing work in other directions.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

THE UNIVERSITIES AND SOCIAL WORK.

THIS column has more than once called attention to the fact that our great teaching centres have become alive to the necessity of training and instruction in social work, not only for the permanent official upon whom the administration of social legislation will largely fall, but also for the voluntary helper. At a meeting of the Court of Manchester University on Wednesday last it was proposed by Mr. A. E. Steinthal, and after an interesting discussion agreed that a certificate in social work should be instituted. According to the report in the Manchester Guardian: "It was proposed that the course of study should extend over two academic years, and consist of (1) university lectures; (2) visits of observation; (3) practical work. As to the latter, a committee would be appointed, on which would be represented the District Provident and Charity Organisation Society the City League of Help, and the University Settlement, and it was suggested that at least six hours a week for six months should be spent under the direction of the Provident Society or another approved society, and that students should obtain 'continuous experience in a special branch or branches of social working by sharing regularly in the activities of one or more approved institution, society or committee.'"

* * *

Mr. A. E. Steinthal, in proposing the adoption of the scheme adopted by Convocation, said that the object of it was to increase the efficiency of societies engaged in public work by supplying them with a better type of recruit, and on the other hand to help students who desired to take up social work, either as voluntary helpers or professionally, to gain some knowledge of the intricacies of the problems with which they proposed to deal and to become more competent workers. Professor Chapman, who seconded Mr. Steinthal's proposal, said it was important that the teaching of social science in the University should be widened, and, further, that the scheme would be of practical utility.

At a later stage in these interesting proceedings the Vice-Chancellor, speaking of the Faculty of Public Health, said that it had benefited the public not only by carrying out valuable investigations, but also by turning out a large number of efficient public health officers.

* * *

The May number of Social Service contains as usual a useful resumé of points of interest to workers in the social field. The chief article is an In Memoriam sketch of the late Mr. W. T. Stead, whose doughty championship of noble causes all are now willing to acknowledge, though in his life he often provoked the fiercest opposition. We are glad to see that in Social Service the question of dealing with the feeble-minded is constantly kept to the front, as nothing can excuse the criminal neglect of this problem on the part of the great body of legislators. Other articles deal with the Shop Assistants' Charter, the report of the Departmental Committee on Tuberculosis, and the Homeless Poor, the number of whom, according to the most recent statistics, appears to be steadily diminishing.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

THE nineteenth annual meeting of the National Unitarian Temperance Association will be held at Essex Hall, on Friday, May 31. At 4 p.m. there will be a conference on "Alcohol and Modern Life," when a paper will be read by Dr. J. Lionel Tayler. Tea will be at 6 p.m., and at 7 p.m. the business and public meeting will take place. Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., will be in the chair, and addresses will be given by Sir W. B. Bowring, Mr. Edward Chitty, J.P., Miss Harriet M. Johnson, Dr. Tudor Jones, the Revs. J. Arthur Pearson, W. G. Tarrant, and Philip H. Wicksteed, and Mr. T. Pallister Young.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Aberdeen: The late Mr. Wm. Meldrum.—Mr. William Meldrum, the oldest member of the Unitarian Church, Aberdeen, who was also probably the oldest of Scots Unitarians, passed away on Monday, May 6, aged 84. His connection with the congregation had extended over nearly sixty years. He was a member during the ministry of the late Rev. Wm. Smith (Antrim). Mr. Meldrum, who was of a retiring disposition, was regular in his attendance at church. He persistently declined office in the congregation, but was devoted in his allegiance to it. He followed the business of a tailor with great integrity and diligence. He disliked pretence and show, but he had a passion for work, and up to within a year of his death persisted in plying the needle. He enjoyed travelling, but was always impatient to get back to his business. He was not much of a reader, but had much shrewd common sense, and belonged to a type of tradesman not often met with to-day. His loss will be regretted by all who knew him.

Birmingham: Midland Sunday School Association.—The quarterly meeting of the Sunday School Association was held on May 11. After tea, in the meeting room of the Newhall Hill congregation, those present were taken over the Bonner Memorial School by the superintendent, Mr. F. J. Tregilgas, who afterwards read a most helpful paper dealing with teaching and teachers. In the course of his remarks, Mr. Tregilgas said that of the fifty-two teachers and officers of that particular school about fifty had been trained within the school. When it was decided to build the new schools as a memorial to their late minister many of the teachers gave up their summer holiday, and made other sacrifices, in order to contribute to the fund. The meeting was very successful, and gave much encouragement to the Sunday school workers who were present.

Bolton: Halliwell-road Free Church.—The Sunday school anniversary services were held on May 12. Mr. J. Chadderton, of Brightmet, conducted a scholars' service in the morning, and the Rev. J. Channing-Pollard, of Lancaster, preached in the afternoon and evening. The attendance was good at all the services, and the collections amounted to £20 17s.

Bolton: Unity Church.—Mr. Edward Davies, A.A.I., the Treasurer of Unity Sunday School, and the Bolton District Sunday School Union, has taken the first place in order of merit in the United Kingdom at the final examination of the Auctioneers and Estate Agents' Institute, and been awarded the gold medal, the Institute prize of seven guineas, the Institute prize for excellence in valuations of five guineas, and the Lancashire (Manchester and district) prize of three guineas. He has also been fortunate in obtaining the degree of P.A.S.I. (Professional Associate Surveyors' Institute).

East Cheshire Christian Union: Annual Meeting.—The fifty-second annual meeting of the East Cheshire Christian Union for Missionary Purposes was held at Knutsford (for the first time) on Saturday, May 11. A religious service was held at 3.30 p.m. in the historic old Brook-street Chapel, erected in 1689, with its quaint staircase outside leading to the gallery, when the annual sermon was preached by the President of the Union, the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., of Gee Cross, on the text "God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth." The preacher emphasised the need of a more regular attendance at public worship, and concluded with a touching reference to his forty-five years' ministry at Gee Cross. The annual business meeting was held at 4.30, immediately after the service, the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., occupying the chair as President. The annual report referred to the great confidence with which the committee look forward to the development of the missionary work at Marple, where the Rev. Leonard Short, of Stanington, has just been appointed its first minister; also to the settlement of the Rev. George Pegler, B.A., at Crewe, where there has been such a long interregnum. It stated that the cause at Biddulph has ceased to exist, as it gave no prospect of a permanent congregation being established there, and spoke of the successful bazaars held at Mossley and Stalybridge by which over £1,000 was raised in each case. The loss by death of Mr. Leonard New, for a short time Hon. Secretary of the Union, and of the Rev. Noah Green, at the advanced age of 88, was recorded. The Union's thanks were tendered to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., and others, also to the Rev. B. C. Constable for his resumption of the office of Secretary, and for his devoted labours for the Union. The reports from the associated churches showed that much active work is being carried on, that in some cases there has been increased attendance at the services or at the Sunday school, and that in other cases the congregations are full of hope for the future. The accounts showed that £41 1s. 4d. had been received from annual collections from fifteen churches, and £57 17s. 3d. from annual subscriptions from individuals connected with sixteen churches, and that there was a balance in hand of £127 10s., which would, however, speedily be absorbed by new grants to Marple and Crewe. The report was received and adopted, and the officers for the ensuing year elected. Votes of thanks were passed to the officers and committee, to the Rev. B. C. Constable as Hon.

Secretary, to Mr. Rogers as Hon. Auditor, and to the Rev. H. E. Dowson. A resolution of sympathy with the Rev. W. Harrison in his illness was also passed. After tea in the King's Coffee House, a public meeting was held in the school-room at 6.30 p.m., presided over by Mr. George Holt. A vigorous and interesting address was delivered by the Rev. H. D. Roberts, representative from the Liverpool District Missionary Association, on "Ourselves and Labour Unrest," in which he referred to the spirit of religious and political freedom of the early worshippers in the Knutsford Chapel. F. W. Monks, Esq., J.P., of Warrington, spoke as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and expressed his great pleasure in seeing so much life and activity in connection with the East Cheshire Union. The Rev. W. Whitaker, B.A., of Platt Chapel, Manchester, also addressed the meeting. A hundred and thirty persons were present at the service, and also at the public meeting. The Rev. G. A. Payne, of Knutsford, had organised most excellent arrangements for the visit of the Union.

Exeter: Western Union of the Unitarian and Free Christian Churches.—The annual assembly of the Western Union of the Unitarian and Free Christian Churches took place at Exeter on Thursday, May 9. In the morning there was a service at St. George's Chapel, when the Rev. A. Hall (Newcastle-on-Tyne) was the preacher. The Rev. R. H. U. Bloor presided at the luncheon in the Victoria Hall. There were 110 present. After "The King," the Chairman proposed "Welcome to Exeter of the Western Union Assembly." Mr. J. K. Champion (Bristol), responding, said the Union was formed for the purpose of keeping the weaker churches together in the West. The stronger churches had given them excellent support in the past. Mr. C. Cole (Clifton) proposed "Civil and Religious Liberty the World Over"; the Rev. C. E. Pike responded. The business meeting was held at St. George's Chapel, the Rev. A. H. Blatchford (Bristol) presiding. The committee's report stated that in last year's report the opinion was expressed that the congregation at Torquay had little chance to live and grow until a new church, worthy of the cause and the town, had been built. Since then events had marched rapidly. A suitable site, centrally situated, had been bought, plans were completed and had been passed by the local authority, a canvass for subscriptions was well advanced, and it was hoped that before many weeks had gone the foundation stone would be laid. When such an undertaking was under way that committee could not stand aside inactive. It was determined to appeal to the churches of the West, to ask them to make that movement in part their own, and to render it substantial help. The officials of the Union were instructed to take the necessary steps to bring the matter before the congregations. Notwithstanding the needs and straits of many of the congregations, twenty-two responded, some with unwonted liberality. These twenty-two congregations totalled 484 subscribers, and the sum of £125 0s. 2d. was the result. The committee made a grant of £20, and the amount promised stood at £2,545, leaving well over £900 to be secured. The Sunday school report stated that the number of schools in the Union remained the same. Two schools had the same number of scholars in 1911 as in 1910; nine schools showed a total decrease of 56 scholars; nine a total increase of 111 scholars, mostly at Taunton, making a net increase of 55 scholars. The increase in the number of scholars in 1910 was 20; in 1909, 66. The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the reports, said due tribute had been given to the devoted and faithful work of their ministers. Plymouth, his native town, mourned vacancies in the ranks of the ministry. He expressed his regret at the long suffering so patiently borne by the late Rev. J. H. Belcher. He thought the position of their little churches was never more fully vindicated in the matter of perfect freedom and expression than they were by Mr. Belcher. Side by side with that memory they coupled with equal reverence that of the Rev. H. Rawlings. The Rev. J. Worthington seconded the motion. Mr. A. G. Ellis (Plymouth) also spoke. The appointment of the officers and committee was then proceeded with. The Rev. H. Austin (president), the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, Mr. C. H. Goodland, the Rev. J. McDowell, and Mr. P. J. Worsley were appointed an Advisory Committee. The Rev. Rudolf Davis was appointed representative of the Western Union on the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the Rev. C. E. Pike to represent the Sunday schools of the Western Union at the annual meeting of the London Sunday School Association. The newly-elected president (the Rev. H. Austin) said there never was a time in the history of this country, or the history of Unitarianism, when they needed greater unity and strength for the spiritual uplifting of the people as the present time. A public meeting was held in the evening, at which addresses were given by Mr. C. Hawksley, the Rev. W. C. Bowditch, the Rev. A. Hall, and the Rev. W. H. Burgess. The Rev. R. H. U. Bloor presided.

Halifax.—The Northgate-end Sunday school anniversary services were conducted on Sunday, May 12, morning and evening by the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, and the scholars' service in the afternoon by the Rev. W. Lawrence Schroeder, M.A. The collections and donations realised £27 3s. 8d.

Hastings: Unitarian Church.—On Sunday, May 12, the assistant minister, the Rev. H. W. King, who is leaving in order to secure a church of his own, preached his farewell sermons. As a token of their respect and esteem, the members of the Young People's Class and other friends, at the close of the evening service, presented him with a travelling clock and a book holder, accompanied by their good wishes for his future happiness and prosperity.

Heywood: Sunday School Anniversary.—"Singing Day" in the Lancashire and Cheshire churches is the great day of all the year. The scholars, who for many weeks before have carefully practised the special hymns, are all gaily attired, and the ordinary congregation is reinforced by friends from the neighbourhood. In Heywood Unitarian Church last Sunday, May 12, were to be seen members of the Rochdale, Chesham, and Bury (Bank-street) Chapels, which were closed in the evening for this special occasion. Special solos were well rendered by Miss Daisy Carr, of Blackpool, and the singing generally was of a high order. The collections at the two services amounted to £54. The sermons were preached by the Rev. George A. Payne, of Knutsford, and the Rev. John Evans, B.A., of Rochdale, and the Rev. T. B. Evans, M.A., of Heywood, were present at the evening service, when the congregation numbered 407.

Highgate Unitarian Church.—We understand that the Rev. T. Davenport Bacon (of Salem, U.S.A.), who is announced to preach on May 26, is going to occupy the pulpit at Highgate for two months.

Leeds: Mill Hill Chapel.—The following tribute to the Rev. Charles Hargrove appears in the current circular of the Leeds branch of the National Commercial Temperance League: "The news that Mr. Hargrove is retiring from active service as a Leeds minister is a matter of deep regret, not only to the members of his congregation, but to all the churches in the city. To social reformers the loss is serious, for he took an active part in all that made for the welfare of the community, and he has been a leader in the Temperance Movement for many years. Mr. Hargrove was ready whenever necessary to adopt a courageous policy, and as President of the Leeds Temperance Council he has been an inspiring leader, gaining, as he deserved, the entire confidence of the Temperance party. Mr. Hargrove recognised at an early stage the advantage of the N.C.T.L. to the movement generally, and our League can claim no warmer friend. That his friendship is reciprocated by our members is apparent by the hearty reception accorded to Mr. Hargrove whenever he accepts our hospitality or helps us at our meetings. His willingness to serve us, notwithstanding his exceptionally busy life, has been greatly appreciated. We anticipate a large gathering on Friday evening (17th inst.) to wish him God speed."

London: Stratford.—The Sunday school anniversary and flower services were held on Sunday, May 5. The morning service was conducted by the Rev. John Ellis. In the afternoon the church was crowded with Sunday school scholars, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson. Mr. Pearson also took the evening service, when there was again a crowded congregation. The teachers held a tea meeting, and the annual Sunday school reports were read, and appeared very satisfactory. The 4th West Ham Boy Scouts paraded at each service, and were joined in the evening by the Mansford-street Company of the Boys' Own Brigade. On the following Wednesday and Saturday the scholars gave an excellent rendering of the operetta "Snow-White and the Seven Dwarfs," in aid of the equipment of the school on modern lines.

Manchester: Chorlton-cum-Hardy.—A meeting was held to bid farewell to the Rev. W. E. George (who has just accepted the pastorate of Friargate Chapel, Derby) and Mrs. George, in the Wilbraham-road Church, Chorlton-cum-Hardy, on Tuesday May 7. The chairman, Mr. E. G. Hiller, presented an illuminated address, and spoke of the good work which Mr. and Mrs. George had done in Chorlton-cum-Hardy. The Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A., an old friend of Mr. and Mrs. George, and Mr. James Pelling, who was chairman of the committee for part of the time during Mr. George's ministry, addressed the meeting, the latter alluding to Mr. George's work among the children, in the Sunday school and in the church. He also drew attention to Mrs. George's splendid work in forming the Women's Guild, and the kindly help and good feeling she had always displayed. Mr. George commenced his ministry at Derby at the beginning of the present month, and the recognition service is fixed for Tuesday, May 21.

Norwich: Anniversary Services.—The Octagon Chapel has not hitherto been in the habit of celebrating its anniversary from year to year, but last Sunday, May 12, the custom was inaugurated with gratifying success; 156 years ago to the very day the present beautiful building was opened by Dr. John Taylor, who was at that time the minister of the chapel. There were good congregations last Sunday at both services, when the sermons were preached by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, D.D., of Manchester College. The evening service was conducted by the Rev. Mortimer Rowe. Dr. Odgers took for his subject in the evening the course of religious history in England since the rise of Nonconformity, and the place in modern religious development of the ideals of those who built and founded such free and non-subscribing places of worship as the Octagon Chapel. The services were much enjoyed by the congregation.

Pontypridd.—On Sunday morning, 12th inst., Mr. W. R. Haylings gave an instructive address on Ruskin's "Two Paths" at the Unitarian Church. In the evening the minister (the Rev. J. Park Davies) welcomed into the church a number of new members. Some were Unitarians who had come to settle in the place. Some were young people brought up in the church, and the others (eight in number) were converts from various denominations. Mr. John Lewis, as president of the committee, also extended to them a very hearty welcome.

Preston: Unitarian Chapel.—The Sunday school anniversary services were conducted last Sunday, May 12, by the Rev. F. Hall, of Blackburn. In the afternoon a cantata was well rendered by the scholars. A statement read by the superintendent showed that the number of scholars has almost doubled within the last five years. The collections for the day constituted a record. The new organ and apse will be dedicated and memorial windows unveiled on June 13, and there will be special services on June 15 and 16.

Yarmouth: Old Meeting.—The Unitarian Church at Great Yarmouth appears to be emerging from the cloud in which it has been enveloped during the past few years, and under the leadership of an energetic lay preacher remarkable changes have been brought about. By attaching himself to various local social and religious movements, and by introducing several new features into the services, he has attracted congregations larger than have been seen at this place of worship for many years. On Temperance Sunday and on Labour Sunday especially the attendance was unusually large. A new organist and choirmaster, with an augmented choir, have been the means of brightening the services and making them additionally attractive. The Sunday-school has been re-suscitated, and now contains over fifty scholars in charge of a capable body of teachers. The Social Guild has also been revived and educational classes for young people started. To make the chapel more inviting, and to provide better accommodation, important alterations and improvements have been made in the seating accommodation, the old-fashioned box pews being removed. The interior of the school buildings has likewise been transformed. The carrying out of these alterations and improvements has involved an expenditure of about £130, of which just £30 has already been contributed. In order to raise the remainder, the congregation, consisting of about twenty-five regular subscribers, mostly poor people, will require help. A band of earnest women have been hard at work during the past winter making and preparing articles for a Sale of Work to be held on Thursday, June 6 next, when it is expected that a substantial sum will be realised. Contributions towards this sale, either in goods or cash, will be gratefully received by the church treasurer and secretary, Mr. James Williment, J.P., 31, Regent-street, Great Yarmouth, who is this year President of the Eastern Union of Unitarian and Other Free Christian Churches.

me to one of the magazines, had the good fortune to attract the favourable notice of Mr. Gibson. He was then living at Tunbridge Wells, and wrote to me under date April 23: "Dizzi was my school-fellow for several years at the Rev. J. Potticary's school at Blackheath, from the age of eight or nine to twelve or thirteen. He was an impudent lad, and by no means fond of books, but writing talent broke out early. He used to publish on Saturdays a weekly journal of school matters, which might be read on payment of a sheet of parchment, this being a square of gingerbread, which, from some forgotten derivation, was so called at our school." Mr. Gibson adds that from Mr. Potticary's school the lad Disraeli went to the Rev. E. Cogan's, at Higham Hill, Walthamstow. There he remained three or four years, afterwards entering the office of a firm of solicitors, Messrs. Swaine & Stephens."

TEMPERANCE AND THE UPPER CLASSES.

Mr. T. W. Russell, M.P., speaking recently at the annual meeting of the National Commercial Temperance League, of which he is a vice-president, expressed his belief that in spite of what the temperance movement had accomplished in the past 50 years, they had not convinced the rich of the value of total abstinence. "There is more luxurious idleness to-day than there has been in the history of this country before," he maintained, "and this cannot be associated with temperance. We have not made any sensible inroads on the upper classes. As to the working class, temperance reformers have captured to a large extent the intelligent artisans. Look at our Labour M.P.'s and see how many are temperance men. When first they entered Parliament I remember a bishop talking to me of his fears. I told him that several were Methodist preachers and total abstainers, and allayed his fears. As to the residuum of the population I am afraid things are much as they were. I sum it up in this way—the people at the top and at the bottom are much as they were. The middle and the upper middle classes are now impressed as to their responsibility in this matter. The Labour Party and the workers are mostly in sympathy with temperance."

THE INTERNATIONAL EUGENICS CONGRESS.

Great preparations are already being made for the reception of the delegates to the International Eugenics Congress, the first of its kind, which is to be held in London at the end of July. The programme of papers has been divided into three classes—eugenics in relation to biology, eugenics in relation to sociology and history, and the practical application of eugenic principles. Well-known authorities from the Continent and America, as well as those belonging to this country, will deal with these subjects, and it will be the object of the Congress to establish an international organisation for the interchange of ideas and knowledge based on practical experiments, and also for the purpose of discovering how far scientific facts warrant legislative action.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

DISRAELI AS A SCHOOLBOY.

In the May number of the Cornhill Sir Henry Lucy continues his series of entertaining articles, "Sixty Years in the Wilderness." In an extract from his diary under the date December 21, 1889, there is the following passage:—"James [the name should be Thomas] Field Gibson, one of the few survivors of the Commissioners of the Great Exhibition of 1851, who has just died at the age of eighty-six, was an old schoolfellow of Lord Beaconsfield's. This year a study of the early life of Disraeli, contributed by

THE RELIGION OF THE SINHALESE.

The Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, whose articles are familiar to our readers, writing in the June number of the Buddhist Review on "Religion without Machinery," gives a sympathetic description of the manner in which the teaching of Buddha is followed in Ceylon. "The interminable wonder," he says, "is how these straw-thatched rude huts can breed such sweet lives, but the secret of course is neither in the hut, nor in the field of maize, nor the jungle, but in the influence, exerted upon them for over 2,000 years, of the gracious example of one who gave up his life to save his brethren from the cause of sorrow and bring them into the Enduring Peace. As you return from where you have watched the glory of the sunset fading behind the violet peaks, you will hear the soft crooning of the ancient shastras, the weird chanting of the beatitude of the good that overcometh evil, and the love that alone can conquer hate:—

'Grievous is anger, harassing is fate; not there is the way of peace. To the heart freed of evil desire, to the forgiving spirit, to the soul whose love casts out all fear comes the dove of joy, the harbinger of peace.'

A useful thread to bind around the arm before sleep, and when the singer wakes before the dawn, he will again turn his thoughts to one who accomplished the purpose he himself only strives to foster. . . . Those most endued with the spirit of Christ will find nothing alien in the utter invincible lovingness of the Elder Brother of the common Aryan race."

INFANT MORTALITY IN RUSSIA.

According to a recent paragraph from Reuter's correspondent sent to the press on the "Day of Violets" in St. Petersburg, when a couple of thousand young people sold artificial violets to gain funds to aid in combating the appalling infant mortality in Russia, no fewer than 2,000,000 infants die annually in the fifty governments of European Russia (excluding Poland and Finland). In the Samara government the death rate amounts to 58 per cent. Statistics show that of 4½ million children over three millions die before reaching the age of five years. The mortality is much higher in the summer than in the winter, for every peasant adult is occupied in field work, and the children are consequently neglected. A large number are killed and eaten by pigs every year in the absence of any guardians. So great, indeed, is the mortality from this cause that in many districts the landowners, when making contracts with their peasant tenants, stipulate that no pigs are to be kept on their holdings.

FREE CHURCH LEAGUE FOR WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The annual public meeting of the Free Church League was held on May 9 at the Memorial Hall, Farringdon-street, when the speakers included Lady Barlow, Mr. Richardson, M.P. for Whitehaven, the Rev. E. T. Barson, of Penge, the Rev. Major Scott, of Croydon, Lady Spicer, Mrs. Strickland (chairman of the executive committee), and Mrs. Saul Solomon. The latter spoke on the White Slave Traffic, and resolutions on this subject urging Government legislation were passed.

THE ETHICAL CHURCH,

46, QUEEN'S ROAD, BAYSWATER, W.

Sunday, May 19, at 11 a.m.

Dr. STANTON COIT.

"Syndicalism."

" at 7 p.m.

"Free Speech."

Wednesday, May 22, at 8.30 p.m.

Homer's Iliad.

Friday, May 25, at 5.30 p.m.

The Book of Isaiah.

ALL SEATS FREE.

UNIVERSITY HALL,

Gordon Square, W.C.

(Between Russell Square and Euston Square.)

Services at 11.15 and 7.

PREACHERS (both Services):

May 19.—Rev. DENDY AGATE, B.A. (of Altrincham).

" 26.—Rev. HERBERT McLACHLAN, M.A. (Warden of the Home Missionary College, Manchester).

June 2.—Rev. H. D. ROBERTS (of Hope Street Church, Liverpool).

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,

ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
Miss ORME. HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT
FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received, at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by Christian Scientists.

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical, Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.

BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 133, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCS.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z, INQUIRER OFFICE, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, LAYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

TO LET, Furnished, near Bournemouth, Lady's superior, well-kept house. Very pleasantly situated in select road on good elevation. Close to station, near church, shops, picturesque golf links. Piano, croquet, gas-cooker, plate, linen. Perfect sanitation. Fare, tram or train to Bournemouth, 2d. Small, careful party, 2½ guineas. Bargain. Trustworthy servant left.—Address C. P. INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

COUNTRY COTTAGE TO LET, twenty-five miles from London. Pleasantly situated, with good garden; two sitting-rooms, three bedrooms.—Yewhurst, Coombe Hill, East Grinstead.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED
WHITE
& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

REMNANTS!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen. Big pieces for Tablecloths, Travcloths, D'oyleys, &c., only 2s. 6d. per bundle. Postage 4d. Irish Linen Bargain Catalogue Free. Write to-day.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming new Irish Linen Spring Costume Fabric, "Flaxella." Washable, durable, looks smart for years; fascinating designs. All new shades. Write to-day.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southampton.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, May 18, 1912.

. Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

Library of the
UNITARIAN SCHOOL
FOR THE MINISTRY
Berkeley, California

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3648.
NEW SERIES, No. 752.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 25, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.

BRITISH & FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION

Anniversary Meetings

Tuesday Evening, May 28.

RELIGIOUS SERVICE at Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, at 7.30 p.m.
Preacher: Rev. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D.

Wednesday Evening, May 29.

PUBLIC MEETING at Essex Hall, at 7.30 p.m. Three Addresses on "Religion and International Relationships." (1) "Europe and England," Sir T. VEZEY STRONG; (2) "America and England," Dr. S. M. CROTHERS; (3) "Ideals of the Working Classes," JOHN A. HOBSON, Esq., M.A.

Thursday Morning, May 30.

ANNUAL BUSINESS MEETING at Essex Hall, at 10 a.m. The President, CHARLES HAWKSLEY, Esq., in the Chair.

CONFERENCE on the Work of the Association: (1) Home Work; (2) Colonial and Foreign Work; (3) Publications; (4) Missionary Work in Scotland; (5) Unitarian Van Mission.

Thursday Evening, May 30.

CONVERSAZIONE at the Portman Rooms, Baker-street, W., at 8 p.m. Music and Refreshments. Tickets 1/- (on and after May 29, 2/-), may be obtained from the Secretaries of London congregations and at the Book Room.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS,

Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, London,
TUESDAY, MAY 28, 1912.

THE REV. J. J. WRIGHT,
F.R.S.L. (CHOWBENT, LANCASHIRE),
PRESIDENT, IN THE CHAIR.

CONFERENCE at 10.45 a.m., on
"The Difficulties of the Sunday School Teacher."
LUNCHEON at the Holborn Restaurant
at One o'clock. Tickets 2/6.

At 3 o'clock an Address will be delivered at Essex Hall by the

Rev. W. TUDOR JONES, Ph.D.
"The Use of the Bible in Education."

AFTERNOON TEA AT 4 p.m.

President's Address and Business Meeting at 4.45.
ION PRITCHARD, Hon. Sec.
ESSEX HALL, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

NATIONAL UNITARIAN TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

NINETEENTH ANNUAL MEETING, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. Friday, May 31, 1912.

4 p.m. Conference. "Alcohol and Modern Life." Paper by Rev. Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLER.

6 p.m. Tea will be served.

7 p.m. Business and Public Meeting.
Report. Election of Officers, &c.

Chairman: Mr. H. G. CHANCELLOR, M.P., supported by Sir W. B. Bowring, Bart.; Mr. Edward Chitty, J.P.; Miss Harriet M. Johnson; Rev. Dr. W. Tudor Jones; Rev. J. Arthur Pearson; Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A.; Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed, M.A.; Mr. T. Pallister Young, B.A., LL.B.

UNITED SUMMER SCHOOL

The Hayes, Swanwick, Derbyshire.

Under the auspices of the Inter-Denominational
Conference of Social Service Union,

JUNE 22 to 29.

Charge, 5s. 6d. per day or 35s. for the week.

Applications, accompanied by booking fee of 5s., should be sent before the end of this month to J. J. STARK, Ashmead, Orleans-road, Upper Norwood, S.E.

Presbyterian Chapel, Newbury, Berks (1664-1697).

For more than 200 years the Old Meeting at Newbury has stood for freedom and progress in an isolated situation, and has strenuously upheld Unitarian principles. It is one of our oldest places of worship, and is greatly in need of repairs and beautifying. It is intended to hold a Sale of Work on Wednesday, June 26, and the members of the congregation, who have been working during the past year, have accumulated a stock of saleable goods, but not sufficient to realise the amount required. They earnestly appeal to sister churches to help them with goods, money, and patronage—which will be gratefully acknowledged by the Hon. Sec. and the Treasurer, Sale of Work Committee, Miss STILLMAN, Marsh Cottage, Newbury. Mrs. NEWELL, *Arthur Road, Newbury, and the Minister, Rev. RICHARD NEWELL.

* Note change of address.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION UNITARIAN AND WORKERS' UNION.

Annual Meeting, ESSEX HALL, Thursday, May 30, at 2.30.

MISS TAGART in the Chair.

Supported by Mrs. Herbert Smith, Dr. Tudor Jones, Rev. T. P. Spedding and Rev. L. C. Tavenor.

Address by DR. ANGELO CRESPI on
"Present Tendency of Religious Thought in Italy."
Tea at 4.30 in Council Room.

FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, HORSHAM.

139th Whit Sunday Anniversary.

SERMONS by the

Rev. W. TUDOR JONES, Ph.D.

Morning, 11 a.m.; Evening 6.15 p.m. Communion after Morning Service.

Collections, Morning and Evening.

Lunch at 1 o'clock, 1s.; Tea at 5 o'clock, 6d.

Rooms for the accommodation of visitors are provided at 12, Worthing Road.

BRITISH LEAGUE OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER LIBERAL CHRISTIAN WOMEN.

THE ANNUAL MEETING will be held at Essex Hall, on Wednesday, May 29, at 3.30 p.m. Lady Bowring will preside. Speakers include Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., Miss Amy Withall, the American and German delegates, and others.

H. BROOKE HERFORD, } Hon.
VIOLET PRESTON, } Secs.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL,
AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

CHANNING HOUSE SCHOOL,
HIGHGATE, N.—Wanted, in September, a resident Mathematical Mistress. Write, stating age, qualifications, experience, and subsidiary subjects offered. Salary £50, with laundry free.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.
—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad.
Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon).
Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

A YOUNG FRENCH LADY, daughter of a Professor, desires to find a home in the country, where she may receive board and lodging in return for French lessons and conversation.—Apply to Rev. Dr. J. E. CARPENTER, 11, Marston Ferry Road, Oxford.

CROW'S NEST.—Mr. E. W. LUMMIS proposes to take a party to Eastern Switzerland in August. Inclusive cost: a fortnight abroad, 14 guineas; a month abroad, 19 guineas. Persons wishing to join should write early to 15, Green-street, Cambridge.

PEARL ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000

Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHRUBSALL, } Directors.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, May 26.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN.
 Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.
 Child's Hill, All Souls', Weech-road, Finchley-road, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. E. DAPLYN.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D. Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11 and 7, Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11, Mr. E. CAPLETON; 6.30, Rev. J. ARTHUR PEARSON.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Rev. W. J. PIGGOTT; 6.30, Rev. JOHN ELLIS.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15 and 7, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, M.A.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. H. GOW, B.A.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. T. DAVENPORT BACON, of Salem, U.S.A.
 Ilford, High-road, 11, Rev. G. CRITCHLEY, B.A.; 7, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Rev. C. A. WING, of Meadville, U.S.A.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11 and 6.30, Rev. F. HANKINSON.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 and 7, Rev. C. ROPER, B.A.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. GORDON COOPER.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. W. ROBSON, B.D.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. F. W. G. FOAT, Litt.D., M.A.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLOR.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Rev. JOHN ELLIS; 6.30, Rev. W. J. PIGGOTT.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C., 11.15 and 7, Rev. HERBERT McLACHLAN, M.A.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
 Wimbledon, 27b, Merton-road, 7, Mr. WM. LEE, B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11 and 7, Rev. JOSEPH WILSON.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. FRED. BROCKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30, Rev. JOHN DAVIES.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. Wood.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. W. AUSTIN, M.A.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30.
 BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45, Scholars' Service; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.

BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. V. D. DAVIS.
 BRIDFORD, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, M.A.
 BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.
 BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. GEORGE WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CAMBRIDGE, Assembly Hall, Downing-street, 11.30, Rev. E. W. LUMMIS, M.A.
 CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street, Morning Service; Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30. { DEAN ROW, 10.45 and { STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A.
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11, Rev. H. E. DOWSON; 6.30, Rev. E. H. PICKERING.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. M. LIVENES.
 HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. TUDOR JONES.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. I. FRIPP, B.A.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. CHARLES CRADDOCK.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. D. ROBERTS.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11, Rev. J. C. OGGERS, B.A.; 6.30, Rev. E. S. RUSSELL, B.A.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. DOUGLAS WALMSLEY, B.A., of Windermere.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, Rusholme, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WHITAKER.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. ALEXANDER FARQUHARSON.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCAOP, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. ALFRED HALL, M.A.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. Dr. CARPENTER.

PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVERS.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. JAMES HARWOOD, B.A.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. NICOL CROSS, M.A.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. B. STALLWORTHY.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

BIRTH.

ROSCOE.—On May 22, at 58, Redington-road, Hampstead, to Philip and Margaret Roscoe, a son.

DEATH.

LEIGH.—On May 21, at her residence, Brooklands, Swinton, in her 60th year, Lydia Sarah, only daughter of the late Henry Leigh, of Moorfield, Swinton, Lancashire.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

CLEANING or CHARING.—A couple of days' work per week wanted by member of one of our London Missions, who has, for years, done work of this kind at houses of well-known members of our churches. Highest references can be given.—Apply to "X," INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-strand, Strand, W.C.

ENGAGEMENT REQUIRED as Companion or Companion-Housekeeper, temporary or permanent, or to accompany invalid to country or seaside, or take charge of household during absence. Experienced, capable, highest references.—Address, C. M., 20, Alyth-gardens, Golder's Green, N.W.

TYPEWRITING.—Sermons, Articles, and MS. of every description accurately typed. 1s. per thousand words. Price List on application.—Miss KENNEDY, 21, Cheverton-road, Hornsey-lane, N.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	355	CORRESPONDENCE :—		MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES :—
VERSES : From Strength to Strength . .	356	Discussions at the National Conference .	360	The National Peace Congress	363
THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT :—		English Students' Visit to Germany .	360	The National Committee for the Preven-
Christ the Bread of Life	356	"True Patriotism"	360	tion of Destitution	364
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS :—		London Sunday School Society	360	London District Unitarian Society . .	364
George Dawson and Coming Church.—II.	357	BOOKS AND REVIEWS :—		The White Slave Traffic	366
The Homing Instinct	358	Justice v. Sentiment	361	Whit-Week Meetings	366
Browning and the Dramatic Method . .	359	A Traveller in China	361	NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	366
		Publications Received	362	NOTES AND JOTTINGS	367
		FOR THE CHILDREN	362

 All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ONE of the most interesting sessions of the National Peace Congress was that held on Thursday of last week, when the relation of war and finance was discussed. Sir Ernest Tritton, speaking after fifty years' experience of the money-market, declared that the interests of war and finance are opposed, and that through finance the interdependence of the Powers is growing. Like the author of "The Great Illusion," he believes that the victor no less than the vanquished would suffer by a war. As the Gospel has up to the present failed to convince more than an insignificant minority within the churches or without them, that war cannot be reconciled with either the letter or the spirit of Christianity, perhaps if "the City" begins to see that war does not pay, self-interest may have an influence which religion has hitherto failed to produce. At the evening conference on the same day, at which the subject was "Armaments and Labour," Mr. Ramsay MacDonald pointed out that generally labour throughout the world is in favour of peace, while, on the other hand, Mr. Ponsonby maintained that "the advance so far made in the cause of peace and the conviction of the inutility of war has come from the spread of education, but the education of the upper classes comprises a great deal of class prejudice and a great deal of suspicious feeling for their foreign neighbours." The plain fact is that notwithstanding occasional lapses into Jingoism on the part of the manual workers in the community, war in the present condition of things is merely a luxury of the privileged classes.

* * *

THE abstract question of peace versus war has, at present, little interest compared with the concrete problem of how to promote a better understanding between Germany and ourselves. The crowned heads, the churches, the organised working classes, the ablest representatives of literature, science and art; in short, the best elements in either empire, have repeatedly declared themselves on the side of peace. Yet all their protestations seem unable to cope with the efforts of a handful of war-mongers and powerful prejudiced people on each side of the German Ocean. In saying farewell to Count Wolff-Metternich, the retiring German Ambassador, whose influence has on the whole been far-seeing and beneficial, we commend his valedictory words to the attention of all: "I retire from the post the more willingly in that, as I hope and confidently believe, I hand over to my successor an easier task than that which fell to my lot. The moment is auspicious. Unless all signs are deceptive, an impulse for reconciliation and peaceful neighbourliness is passing through the two great peoples, the English and the German. Here is a fruitful field for statesmanship, and it will repay the toil of noble minds to pursue its cultivation. It was my task to prepare. I hope and trust that it may be vouchsafed to my successor to see the ripening of the fruits."

* * *

THE meetings of the Scottish Presbyterian Assemblies, "the most important since the disruption," as one writer puts it, will arouse interest far beyond the confines of Scotland. The plain man has difficulty in seeing what case there is for the existence of three Presbyterian churches to minister to a diminishing population, in which interest in religion of any sort has long been on the wane. The differences between the three, though intelligible in the past, are, in view of the difficulties with which religion is faced to-day, not so fundamental as to justify the maintenance of separate organisations. Hence many who are not themselves Scotsmen hope that the deliberations of the Assemblies will tend in the direction of a really united Scottish Church, which being freed from internal controversies, might make combined assault on the forces of evil. We are far from thinking that the reason why so many are outside the churches is because they are interested in pure and rational religion, which the churches, it is alleged, do not provide. But the spectacle of ecclesiastical organisations, which seldom seem to be able to generate any enthusiasm as a whole until their vested interests are attacked or supposed to be attacked, is not inspiring and is not calculated to make converts.

* * *

THE National Conference of Charity Organisation Societies at its coming of age meetings—that is, at its twenty-first annual gathering—has provided what is perhaps the best set of papers and discussions which it has ever had. In view of the recent trend of public opinion especially importance will be attached to Tuesday's proceedings, at which Mr. H. Holman read a most valuable paper entitled "a Restatement of the First Principles of Charity Organisation," and Dr. C. S. Loch took part in the subsequent discussion. The most piquant portion of Mr. Holman's paper was the following appropriate comment on present ideas with regard to "the State": "The general recognition of mutual social responsibility had become much fuller and finer in the last few years than ever before. Old age pensions, sickness and unemployment insurance were but forms of expression of this feeling of social solidarity and brotherhood. There was a great forward movement of social morality. If anyone doubted this he should re-read the leading articles that recently appeared in all sections of the press on the minimum wage question—the least advanced of them would once have been called rank Socialism. They had to beware of catch-cries. Such phrases as 'pauperise the people,' 'destroy parental responsibility,' 'break up family life,' 'weaken the moral fibre of the nation,' and so forth, were classical bogies now, and the word 'State' itself had become so divorced from facts and commonsense that people habitually spoke about the State as a tyrant, robber, oppressor and extortioner, of a very virulent and gigantic type. One had to remember that the State was simply the representatives whom we chose from ourselves to govern themselves and us, and whom we can and do change when they do not satisfy us. The State was simply ourselves, functioning governmentally. This remembered, commonsense and clear thinking again became possible."

* * *

DR. C. S. LOCH said "that the State was coming to play more and more of a part in matters that we once thought were to be left entirely for the individual. Therefore, the more the State intervened the more important it became that the State should intervene on scientific lines. They wanted to know more about the psychology of society and social reactions, or what effects things done now were going to have ten years hence. . . . Personally, his criticism on certain recent legislation was that its exact effect on the social life of the nation had not been sufficiently ascertained and presented, either to the Government or their constituents."

FROM STRENGTH TO STRENGTH.

A NOBLER Temple shall arise,
And sweeter hymns be sung,
Than e'er were known beneath the skies
In any land, or tongue!
So may it be; yet here and now
Build we the best we can,
Sing we our praise, and breathe the vow
Of love to God and man.

A greater Scripture shall be writ
Than e'er was writ before,
And all the world shall welcome it
And love it more and more!
So may it be; yet we to-day
Treasure the Word we have—
Lamp of our feet upon our way,
To guide us, and to save.

A clearer Light shall rise and shine,
A nearer dawn of grace,
A brighter ray of love divine
In every human face!
E'en so; yet Christ for us was born,
Lover of near and far;
Dark is the world, but ere the morn
We hail the Morning-Star.

A-mightier Faith shall reign at last,
More simple and sublime,
Than e'er was cherished in the past—
The crowning creed of time!
So may it be; yet still to-day,
True to the truth we know,
Ours be the life that leads the way
The world is meant to go.

W. G. TARRANT.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT

CHRIST THE BREAD OF LIFE *

BY THE REV. JOSEPH WOOD.

"JESUS said unto them, I am the Bread of Life." This is the language of a great mystic. A mystical mind is one which, perceiving that the highest expression of which religious truth admits lies in the symbolism of nature, prosecutes thought about religion by dealing with the symbols themselves after a direct and logical fashion. It is the way of Jesus. "I am the true Vine"; not "I am like a vine," which is a far weaker statement. "I am the Good Shepherd"; not "I am like a good shepherd." In the same manner he declares, "I am the Bread of Life." These expressions are mysticism in its highest mood.

The abiding, continuous, and persistent thing about Christianity is a certain ideal and type of character. We see this type not only in a Paul and John, but also in a Bernard and Augustine, in a Francis and a Melancthon, in a Geo. Herbert and a Richard Baxter, in a Channing and a Stanley—the same features and likeness reproduced generation after generation. The element which binds together, in spite of all their differences, Catholic and Protestant, Anglican and Nonconformist, in the unity of a common devotion as belonging to the same religious genus, is a distinctive quality of the inner life. We may describe it as the life of Christ within the soul, or as the life of saintly fellowship with God, or as the sense of immortal sonship with Eternal Love, or as the consciousness of the Divine in humanity—these are only different names for the same thing. This is what Christianity's greatest teachers have ever recognised as its essence. Whatever else might admit of dispute, it was an undeniable fact of experience that this ideal of life had entered as a new power into their hearts, and whatever importance they may have attached to sacrament and dogma, the end always in view was a certain type of character. For Christianity is not just a set of ideas and truths promulgated by appointed professors, an impersonal gift to mankind like the truths of chemistry or biology. It is a life, a distinctive kind of life with unmistakeable features which cannot be easily detached from him in whom it was first enshrined. It cannot be taught like a lesson in grammar or physics, but must enter as a refining, chastening, vivifying power into heart and mind and conscience. It speaks not only or chiefly by the intellect, but by a holy contagion of exalted feeling and personal loyalty. Its evidence is to be found not in books, nor in signs and wonders of the past, but in the perpetual miracle of spiritual life.

It is sometimes said to be a matter of no consequence by whom religious truths were first revealed. Given their truth, and it matters not who or what was their source. Truth is truth, whether from the lips of Jesus or Balaam. If the origins of Christianity were buried in complete oblivion the truths it proclaims would remain unimpaired, just as the truths of gravitation and evolution would suffer no loss were it proved that Newton and Darwin never existed. We may indeed have a certain historic interest in the Founder of Christianity, but if we had never heard his name, the truths he announced would remain and our religion would be the same. The noble ethics and the spiritual ideals may take captive our hearts, although we are ignorant of Jesus. We can have Christianity without Christ.

I cannot take that view. And the great mass of believers and disciples would feel that it gave a very inadequate account of the hold Christianity has over them. To them an impersonal Christianity, a Christianity without Christ, a Christianity never calling for loyalty to a Master and Lord; never quickened by love to a moral loveliness which is the glory of self-surrender become the world's salvation, would be something fundamentally different from that by which they have lived. The Bread of Life is more than a set of truths. The Bread of Life is the passion of love, and love is only possible between persons. Jesus is bound up with the deepest affections of his followers; his is the quickening breath which has turned into living creatures the cold forms of truth. He is more to them than his teaching; his love has won their allegiance, leading them to the throne of God, and constraining them to all that is gracious, devoted, unselfish, and magnanimous in their lives. All his ideas receive a tremendous reinforcement from the fact that he was their realisation in life. He was the things he taught. He is the Bread of Life much more than his ideas.

It was a saying of Emerson's, "Life alone can impart life"; it is also the teaching of the latest science. The type of life which marks Christianity, and is its one essential, is not found apart from a certain source and life-giver. It is because of him that his ideas lead the world. The stream flows from the fountain, the rays of light are all due to the sun. Life does not come from ideas but from affection to a friend, from union with a beating heart, from the quickening touch of a life greater than our own, from obedience, trust, and gratitude. Love is the secret of life, love is the Bread of Life, and love is always in its strongest forms, not of sentiments however beautiful, but of souls. He in whom of all that ever lived on earth love most clearly reigned is the life of the Christian disciple.

Let me briefly explain. There have been many others, loving and holy souls for whom we hold profound affection, whose voices speak to us in heavenly tones, whose lives, full of grace and truth, quicken the life of grace and truth in us, whom not having seen we love; but along this line the love we have for Jesus is the strongest and most fervent of all. The reason is simple—that he loved the most, the most truly and completely, the most widely and unwaveringly. I cannot trace in any other of the prophets, poets, teachers, saviours of man, the same universality, the same absence of national or social prejudice, the same freedom from any touch of self-seeking; the same freedom from the world and the things of the world, from the ascetic and the things of the ascetic, from the limitations of ecclesiasticism, of wealth, of work, of race, of social maxims and conventions. Man was honoured by him for his humanity alone. Man as man was immeasurably precious whether clothed in rags or in purple. There was but one duty, nay, but one joy, in which all life was contained—"Love one another as I have loved you." There is nothing in the life and teaching of any other of the world's benefactors so universal as that final synthesis, so infinite in its application, and yet so absolutely one. It stands alone in its comprehensive power. Love, which is very God of very God and very man of very man, is the life which is life indeed. There is nothing but love that can be experienced with the same joyful eagerness by everyone, high or low, old or young, rich or poor. It is the reason why Jesus has been loved more than any other of the masters and founders of religion that ever lived, and why we can and do give him our hearts. That love is life, and the more we love the more life have we. He who loves is infinitely more alive than he who seeks his own. The Christ of love is the Bread of Life.

* An address given at the Communion Service held in the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, on Wednesday, April 17, 1912.

Any one who truly loves is in some measure bread of life to others. For love quickens the divinest and most vital kind of life. Jesus is supremely the Bread of Life since he is the first-born of all who love, and the Lord of all brotherly kindness. In a true and large way this reduces Christianity to an absolute simplicity. There is only one thing needful. It is to love God and man to the utter forgetfulness of self. Love you Christ and you will do as he does. Love you your brother man and you will fulfil every other obligation.

Do you ask, how may this love be ours? I answer, in companionship with Christ, love's divinest word, whose love is the bread of life. That companionship is not something vague and visionary. It is most real and actual. For so vivid was the life and love in him, so boundless in its passion, so infinite in scope, so abundant in its flow, that when we companion with him we feel him to be present with us, actually living in our souls. To love him is nothing strange and peculiar. In kind it is the simple natural love we have for one another in our happiest moments, only free from all limitations of flesh and time. We have ten thousand instances of the same kind of love in human story. There is scarcely one of us but has had his hero or saint of ancient record on whose life and character his own life and character has been partly formed. There are scarcely any of us who have not known in the present some whose great-heartedness, truth, and sweetness have made us new men and women, who have impelled, inspired, and exalted us from day to day. How much we love these saviours and sanctifiers of our being no one knows but ourselves. They, too, are portions of our daily bread—crumbs from the Master's table. So it is we love the Giver of the Feast, in the same simple, natural way, but all deepened and intensified. This love is life, and he who inspires it is God's Bread of Life to the world, of which if a man eat he shall hunger no more.

As we take these ancient symbols of our faith into our hands let us take this thought into our hearts, that he is our Bread of Life and our Cup of Salvation because of the great love wherewith he hath loved us. Let us raise our song of thanksgiving to God for the abiding energy of the life of love in Jesus.

Strong Son of God, immortal love!

Whom we that have not seen thy face, yet love with a joy that is unspeakable and full of glory, be with us in this hour of devotion; let that love of thine be for our strengthening and refreshing; let the grace and the truth of it dwell in our hearts for evermore.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

GEORGE DAWSON AND THE COMING CHURCH.

II.

BUT Dawson's real greatness lay in his genius for preaching. If he was brilliant on the platform he was more so in the pulpit. There all his finest powers had full play. He was not a trained theologian and had little taste for theological controversy, though when it was forced upon him, no one could state theological truth with greater clearness and keener insight than he. Having rebelled against ecclesiastical dogma and authority in the early days of his ministry, he had found an independent foothold for religion in the inward witness of the Spirit. A man's conscience is the safest guide to God. God is the loving Father, man the prodigal son. To this conception he remained faithful to the end of his life, although he admitted that the advent of the Higher Criticism and the advance of physical science, introducing as it did the theory of evolution and of unbroken uniform law, made greater demands upon his faith than his earlier beliefs.

His sermons were marked by simplicity and terseness of language, shrewd humour now alternating with passionate vehemence, now with tender sadness, yet always pervaded by a robust commonsense so eminently characteristic of the man. "Godliness may stand up to its elbows in soap-suds at the wash tub; the soap-suds lessen not the godliness; they add to it, as the setting enhances the gem." . . . "The man who leaves his saintship till he is sixty, may end by being a sinner. The conflict with self and selfishness must be fought out early."

"The praise of God can be quite as perfectly rendered by life and conduct as by music; and, instead of the old man losing the power of praising God, there is a depth and beauty in his praise which can be found nowhere else."

"Take, as a rule for a wise man's life, that, when it is too dark to do anything, he can still call to mind what he did when it was light. If it is too dark to take comfort at present, remember there was comfort once; and this is calling to remembrance the song of the night."

"If a man comes and asks me, 'Do you think they sang anthems in the early Church?' I tell him, 'No, I don't think they did.' 'Then,' says he, 'if the early Church did not, why do you?' You might as well ask me why I wear a beard, because you know I didn't when I was a boy. The beard came with manhood, and the anthems with the manhood of the Church."

"The impatience which you sometimes hear expressed by good people against what they call a political sermon, is excusable if the heart be so sad, and so egotistical in its sorrow, as to be able to take interest only in its own concerns, and is careless of all other things than salvation of its own small soul."

"It has entered into the heads of working men, who are beginning to think that perhaps three days a week might suffice for men who are all their lives long doomed to work in a coal mine, that three days in a week is enough for that insupportable labour. . . . My friend, if you had had the good fortune to have been born into this world of England some centuries earlier, you would have been a 'born thrall'—a serf. You would have been cow-hided, my respectable middle-class citizen! And your broad back, and your not very exuberant brain, would have made a most admirable churl of you. Your forefathers fought that out for you!"

"The last and surest mode of Resting in the Lord, is to rest in Him through Christ. Every day I live, I become increasingly less Theist, more Christian. To me, Christ is to the soul what a guide through the difficult country is to the traveller. He not merely supplies map and road-book, but Himself goes before and leaves His footprints for our guidance."

Dawson's pulpit discourses were never mere intellectual exercises in the nature of lectures or essays, but always sermons in the proper sense, exhortations to the higher life of duty, sympathy, and love. People flocked to hear him long after the charm of novelty had worn off, and stayed with him to the end of his career, because they found in his teaching and personality a selfless devotion and spiritual power such as could not be met with elsewhere.

A chivalrous love for humanity was the keynote of his character. "Loving all men as I heartily do," he said at a public banquet given him by his friends before he started on a lecturing tour in the United States three years before his death, "loving little and obscure people, loving little children, finding the chiefest pleasure of my life in them, dearly loving women with all my heart, loving men with all my soul, with many infirmities of temper, with many faults, aye, and with many you do not know of, this I can say, I have loved much, and I can vindicate the words of the Master of old: 'I have loved much, and, therefore, I hope much shall be forgiven me.'"

Though the public in general, and particularly the orthodox preachers of the day, differed from him considerably in their religious convictions, they were agreed in regarding his prayers as most touching, beautiful outpourings of the human heart to God. "His prayers are never to be forgotten," said Dr. R. W. Dale in a sermon preached after Dawson's death, "they are prayers to break one's heart. I think that they are often penetrated with an unutterable sadness. . .

The confession of weakness and of sin seemed to come from a soul that had sunk into a very abyss of self-humiliation." Charles Vince, the sturdy evangelical and minister of Mount Zion Chapel (the very chapel from which Dawson had been practically expelled) used to attend the services of the Church of the Saviour whenever a Good Friday or Christmas Day made it possible for him to do so. "I went to listen to those wonderful prayers," he would say. "I have heard none like them, none from any other man. That's why I believe in him; like an archangel, he does indeed veil his face with his wings when he approaches the Almighty."

He who could pray thus, was called into the Eternal Presence on November 30, 1876. His death was sudden and painless. Both his wife and son were away from home, and the story is told that Mrs. Dawson first heard of her terrible loss from the newspaper boys on alighting from the train. She had been his faithful partner for thirty years. A woman of the same high intellectual endowment as her husband; a brilliant conversationalist, a born teacher, a keen sympathiser with his social, political, and religious aspirations, she shared his triumphs as his defeats with a brave heart, and stood by him in their supreme hour of sorrow when their invalid daughter was snatched from their side by death. It was probably at this crisis of his life that he wrote the little poem entitled: "Where?"

"Gazing at the sunset,
Lost in despair,
I long to pass the death-gate,
And go, I know not where.

I pine for one lost darling,
Gone, I know not where,
Heart-sick with waiting
To go to her there.

* * * *

I cry to Thee, Thou dear God!
This patient prayer;
Take me, but in Thine own time,
Thou knowest where!"

All Birmingham was plunged into grief by the death of one who for thirty-three years had stood in the forefront of the battle for civic righteousness, social progress and liberty in religion. Preachers and politicians vied with each other in proclaiming his merits from pulpit and platform, rendering that just acknowledgment to his genius, profundity and integrity of character which they had sometimes begrudged him during his lifetime. For it will always be true that the man who ploughs a lonely furrow, deliberately eschewing the beaten tracks of the multitude, exposes himself readily to suspicion and jealousy on the part of those unable or unwilling to follow him. Has not such been the lot of the pioneer through the ages? Dawson knew it, and was willing to pay the penalty of his convictions. He had formed his idea of the nature and office of the Christian Church early in life, and did not substantially change it during the later part of his career. By upbringing and temperament a keen individualist and congregationalist, he regarded with abhorrence all manner of ecclesiasticism and sentimental theorising about the Christian Church, content, on his part, to define it as a society for the promotion of goodness after the example of Jesus Christ. Yet he had cut himself loose from organised orthodoxy, not so much on account of any radical disagreement with current evangelical teachings, but because a passionate desire for freedom impelled him to work out his own conception of the Church. The ideal church, such as he aimed at when founding the Church of the Saviour, must be free from any kind of dogmatism and sectarianism. It must be able to unite people of varying intellectual beliefs in "unity of spirit, in the bond of peace, and in righteousness of life."

Agreeing as he did in this with the best type of the Unitarianism of his day, and willing to give the Unitarians credit for being great "upholders of the light that is in men," he could not see his way to join them—partly because he was unable to hold "the pure Unitarian doctrine," as he called it, meaning thereby no doubt the belief in the "pure humanity of Jesus," partly because the Unitarians looked to him too much like any other sect, bent on converting the world to their particular conception of the Deity. Whether he would have learned to think differently if he had been spared to live to the days of Martineau, Charles Beard and James Drummond may be an interesting conjecture; whether, if he had lived at the present time, he would have seen his way to join the "National Conference of Unitarian, Free Christian, Liberal Christian and other non-subscribing and kindred congregations," must remain equally doubtful. He would probably have objected to the name "Unitarian" occupying the first place on their programme, so as to inevitably furnish the common denominator of the whole.

Believing with his whole heart and soul in a wider and more glorious future for the Church of God than any denominations or group of churches have hitherto been able to realise, he deliberately elected to remain out in "the wilderness" in order to demonstrate to the world by practical example—which after all is the only test of theory, religious or other—that it is possible to unite people of differing beliefs into one great fellowship of worship, work and aspiration.

Although the sects and sectaries of his day never quite forgave him this attitude of aloofness—adopted for the greater good of the coming church, as he firmly believed—his experiment justified itself in every sense of the word. Never before, and with very few exceptions since in the history of the churches of this country, has there been a great and flourishing church so absolutely undenominational, so truly catholic as this Church of the Saviour, uniting in a common bond of love every category of seekers after God, as there are Trinitarians, Unitarians, Baptists, Methodists, Swedenborgians, Churchmen, Agnostics and avowed Atheists. Many Unitarian Ministers have tried it and have found it an almost impossible task. The best spiritual leaders in all denominations to-day are working for the same ideal. Let them take courage and remember that one man at least succeeded, and completely succeeded, in the attempt. True, he succeeded at the expense of standing alone, and his example will prompt some of us to ask ourselves whether we, too, may not first have to learn to stand alone, in order the better to prepare the way for the Church of the Future. There never has been and never will be a short cut to the achievement of the greatest things in the world. The liberal churches all over the world have begun to see visions and to dream dreams. Some of them are putting their faith in the power of organisation. Dawson put his in the power of the Spirit whose nature is freedom, and again freedom.

The Church of the Saviour survived its great founder only by a short span of life—some fifteen years. The district in which the church stood began to deteriorate already in his time, and even had there been a successor of equal genius, the church would have had to be moved. Under the circumstances many of the leading members of his congregation joined the liberal churches in the town, some could never again bring themselves to worship in another church. Others of the less prosperous class, and their descendants, have found their way to Waverley-road Church, Small Heath, where the old tablets of the Church of the Saviour greet them from the walls. What a future there might be for this little church, associated with such proud traditions, if it were placed in a more central district! Now it must look almost entirely to the toiling masses among whom to keep green the memory of George Dawson. But let it do that in faith, hope, and love, and the future will be—as it was of old—with him

"Who never turned his back, but marched breast forward,
Never doubted clouds would break;
Never dreamed though right were worsted,
Wrong would triumph,
That we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better,
Sleep to wake."

GERTRUD VON PETZOLD.

THE HOMING INSTINCT.

To end one's journey where it began, either in the home of one's childhood, or in the long, long home of a more distant birth, and so complete the cycle of experience—is an impulse that alights on the farthest wanderer. The instinct prevailed long before man came to share the world with the lesser lives. It is very general in the Insects; and in the Vertebrates, every vertebra would seem to be an arrow-head indicating the direction of the circular route that ends and begins at the same place. "Let's go home!" cry the children, when play wearies, when the cold comes, when hunger gnaws, when night falls. "Let's get out of this!" cries the wriggler in his chrysalid-shell beneath the earth, feeling the call of spring in the warmer rays that penetrate to where he lay in a living death. The Frogs and Toads have left the gardens and hopped interminable distances to reach the quiet pool far beyond. Many birds now leave the tropics for the arctic regions where they spend the short summer, returning to a scene which, it is said, was their original home, until exiled from it by the glacial epoch.

Sometimes the instinct outlives the home. One of the pathetic incidents in natural history is connected with the periodic attempt at migration of the Norwegian Lemmings. Following that inherent and infallible sense of direction so useful to the animal world, they steadily advance, marching in parallel lines, until they arrive at the sea. But the vast stretch of waters does not deter them. Beyond it they feel sure is the ancient island whence ages ago they set out, and this they strain every nerve to reach. But alas! their land has been long submerged. Buoyed up by their indomitable faith they swim out and out, battling with the waves, pushing forward, half suffocated and well-nigh spent, until a big wave brings them the gift of sleep, and they awake in a happier land than even that of their dreams.

Other mammals than the human have died for their faith. What a parable, again, is taught in the habit of Fish that have moved upward from the sea to people the lakes and rivers, seeking their way back to the same sea when their life is drawing to a close. Some far-off anticipation disturbs them of that quest for the place of peace voice by the poet:—

“And I shall have some peace there, for peace comes dropping slow,
Dropping from the veils of the morning to where the cricket sings;
There midnight's all aglimmer, and noon a purple glow,
And evening full of the linnet's wings.”

The happiness of the present season is enriched by the home-coming of so many of our birds. Again the call of the Cuckoo is heard, and it is as though a chord of music long silent had been awakened, and a dumb joy released to expression. Again the path of the Swallow weaves itself in mazes of delirious flight around our heads through the wide sphere of evening. Again, the night has won a new rapture, for when all else is still, there is one cannot keep silent for gladness at being in love when the whole world's in love. The nightingale voices in song the sweetness that comes to all living things in the sweet o' the year, when the red blood reigns in the winter's pale. These birds do not fear to let all and sundry in the coppice know how glad they are to be back home once more.

A strange meeting recently took place on a Welsh village platform. Two brothers met who had not seen each other for over forty years. The younger had been farming on the Canadian prairie, had known the ups and downs of fortune, had done well enough. Yet the homing instinct had got the better of all the associations and relationships and friendships made in his adopted land. He resolved to end his days with his surviving brother in the old homestead upon the bare hills, where the cry of the curlew is heard, “one of his three oldest cries in the world,” a cry like the call of the Home Gods that had troubled a lifetime's dreams. So it came to pass that two strange men, brothers by blood, stood face to face. Long they gazed into each other's eyes, each scrutinising, probing into the depths of the soul, seeking to know what manner of man that other had become. They spake not, nor grasped hands; each too busy holding judicial inquiry, upon whose results peace might be made or marred. Then somewhere a closed wall of sentiment was opened in the elder brother's heart. He uttered a broken word—the mother's pet-name for the boy who had run away, and forty years were at once wiped out as a phantom of the night, and two spirits found a single channel, like the two streams at Watersmeet. A common filial memory, a brother's love, made the old home, home again indeed.

In the Maytime, sufficient of beauty, of warmth, of happiness in the great green world and its exuberant life abides to make most souls content. Here in “this world the world of all of us” and no other seems to lie the home that's heaven. But when the sun has gone down, a crimson disc behind the blue hills, and the blackbird and missal thrush fling melodies of other days through the thickening silence, and a breeze like a breath from the Caverns where spirits that feed on Peace have their dwelling wanders wistfully over the land; then the pang of world-strangeness strains at the spirit, then comes the insatiable hunger, the infinite passion of finite hearts that yearn, the homing instinct of the Exiles of God.

J. T. D.

BROWNING AND THE DRAMATIC METHOD.

I READ with pleasure the articles on Browning which recently appeared in THE INQUIRER. Mr. Gow showed us in a most interesting way what a really brilliant amateur the poet was in Mr. Gow's own profession, and Mr. Tarrant added what is so necessary for preachers, for he told us that a former valet of the poet had given his master an excellent character. These are good things to know, but as some of us love Browning most as a great poet one would like to add a few lines on his contribution to the noble art of poetry.

The inspiration of his poetry, the above-mentioned writers think, was his optimism. This may be so, but should at least be qualified by an inquiry into the nature of that optimism. Browning is generally dubbed optimist on the strength of two lines pulled out of their context:

“God's in His heaven,
All's right with the world.”

As the blithe lark-song out of the sweet holiday heart of little Pippa, these words are just a delicious ripple of joy; as the reasoned utterance of a grown man they would be merely silly, sentimental, and insincere. But “Pippa Passes” is a dramatic poem. That is the point. Browning's genius is essentially dramatic; and yet, Browning was dramatic in a distinctive way. Roughly speaking, a drama is a development of character by means of action, and there is very little development of character in Browning, so his plays, as works to be acted, were failures. In Shakespeare the characters are not only revealed to us, but to themselves. The love of Juliet for Romeo discovers her nature to herself; the action taken by Brutus discovers the real man to himself; so Shakespeare's characters give us the distinct idea of life—that they are not moved along the lines of a finished story, but that they falter, choose, and go forward or backward along the ordinary lines of human development. But Browning's characters are static. They are very human and quite alive, but all that makes them personalities, all their qualities, are suddenly revealed to us, intensified and concentrated by the poet's method of presentation. He chooses some supreme moment and gives us the character in the full stress of this crisis.

Now this is really the lyrical method. Shall we call it in his case the lyrical-dramatic? In its simplest form a lyrical poem is the passionate utterance of a mood of the poet, like Shelley's “Ode to the West Wind.” But sometimes the poet sings, as it were, from the mood of another, as in Byron's exquisite letter of Donna Julia, or Burns' perfectly feminine “Tam Glen.” In both these cases the poet utters the emotions of others, and those others women.

Browning extends this method; he does this persistently; he realises a truly marvellous variety of people at all sorts of moments in their lives, when the tension is high, and his poems are the expression of their emotions and thoughts. We never feel that they are, so to speak, thinking out themselves. The crisis is past, the choice is made, but the imagination of the poet has caught them at this delicate pause of life, and we have them in every posture, some full face, some in profile, some with their backs to us, going away sorrowful.

Here is the lover at the garden-gate, whose soul has been called forth by the soft Spanish syllables of a flower's name; and here another lover among the ruins of a dead civilisation, with a living passion in his veins, waiting for the moment which shall extinguish all the past in the present; and yet a third lover, on horseback, rejected and desperate, yet whose present joy shall extinguish even the future. And here is Abt Vogler at the organ, or Lippo Lippi in the flare of the torches. Of course, there may be more than one speaker, but the method will be found the same. Indeed, in “The Ring and the Book” the method culminates, the same squalid story being used by a variety of people to really give expression to themselves; the nearness of the circumstances to the narrator determines the intensity of the crisis, and consequently the emotional fervour of the revelation. And of all those people Caponsacchi tells the most thrilling tale, for to him these facts were as the finger of God, to point him the way out of hell. We naturally ask, Is this dramatic method new? It is old, of course. But its most complete form in English before Browning was undoubtedly in Landor's “Imaginary Conversations,” the best of these being in prose. But Landor is classical and restrained, even in those few dialogues which are at a high pitch of tension, such as that between Tiberius and Vipsania.

Browning is a poet, a romantic, and an impressionist. He has a fine sense of circumstance, atmosphere, suggestion, innuendo, in the moral as well as the physical. He hits with impassioned accuracy the exact but fugitive moment when the soul makes its enormous claim, when it takes command, and captains all the forces of intelligence and feeling, and moves them from the lower plains of experience to the spiritual heights of imagination. Penetrating as would be the vision of such a poet, it is impossible that he should see life steadily, and see it whole; nor does Browning do so. But though this is the best kind of vision, it has its risks for lesser minds, for it may lead to that fatuous complacency as to the best possible world. Browning is an antidote to this. He hails the swerve aside which breaks the regularity, the wholeness, the perfect poise. In his landscape he marks the gash in the mountain range, the silver quiver of water in the ravine, the blob of bold colour, the flash of the lordly jewel; and in the landscape of character he notes where the line of life is broken into points that catch the lights and shadows of passion. Not that he asks for a departure from the conventional, from order, or institutions, but he fears for these if they be not transfigured anew by the burning chivalry of knightly and saintly souls. Without such chivalry we may come to formal perfection with Andrea del Sarto, or logical perfection with Bishop Blongram; but these are but "finished and finite clods untroubled by a spark." Better the failures, the sins even, where the soul shines through, and stirrings of her agony are felt, for here are signs of progress. Thus, by the methods of his art, Browning leaves us in lofty mood. He gives us no definite moral or religious view. But from a variety of characters, seen in distinct crises of spiritual life, he shows us that man in his supreme moments, and woman, too, whether scholar, artist, lover, husband, wife, seeks the unattainable absolute, and is ever dissatisfied after attainment of less, for he and she belong not to the finished and complete—

"Man has for ever."

R. H. U. B.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

DISCUSSIONS AT THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

SIR,—It is evident from the letter of the Rev. W. J. Piggott that at least to one hearer the discussions had more than an academic interest, and had a serious bearing on the vital questions of the day.

He has the courage to point out what many are feeling, that the conceptions of Reality, as presented by current philosophies, have a tendency to undermine that subjective image of Deity which has stimulated the devotion, love, and service of men. It is a grave problem which this generation has to face, for we cannot go back. One of the perils of the time is the use of language which has become unmeaning. It must, we know, be largely prevalent in the Established Church, where many of the clergy must recite the creeds with large mental reservations; and even in our own communion the Ten Services seem to many, in parts, to have an archaic sound. It is necessary for us, I venture to think, as a progressive organisation to face fearlessly in our Conferences the question of the Idea of God.

Perhaps the way out will be found through an acceptance of Eucken's philosophy. In it he contends that ever and against the natural life of man there emerges a spiritual life, wherein man can find his true being, and it is the cultivation of this spiritual life which constitutes man's true existence. God is revealed as the Absolute Spiritual Life, free from all finite entanglements. Communion between God and man forms the basis of all religion. By this mode of procedure we put on one side all those purely intellectual conceptions of God which are at once the source of controversy, disagreement, and doubt.

In discussing social problems we must give credit for sincerity to all sides. Mr. Piggott, in his speech, showed the courage of his convictions, and it is evident from his letter that every position advanced had been well thought out. It is to be hoped that he will not suffer from his outspokenness, and it is encouraging to find among many of our younger ministers a deep interest in social questions. It is, no doubt, natural that many should shrink from these drastic measures, which seem to others necessary to eradicate a deep-seated disease in the social order; but if these think that the application of balm to external disturbances is of little real avail, it is their duty to say so. As with the religious life, so, it appears to me, with the social. The Master gave a short and plain statement of the conditions upon which Eternal Life could be acquired, but they were too hard for the rich young man; and so with the problem of unemployment and poverty the remedy is simple, but it is of too penetrating a nature to be acceptable to many.—Yours, &c.,

E. CAPLETON.

113, Highbury New Park,
London, N., May 20, 1912.

SIR,—Mr. Piggott says: "So, too, with land taxation schemes. The great merchants can always outbid every other competitor, and by organisation can easily regulate prices; indeed, the more easily, as the toll now paid as rent to the landlords will then be paid to the State."

Let us suppose that the great merchants outbid all competitors and rented all the land in England. They, not understanding farming, market gardening, and building, would soon become bankrupt, as they would be unable to carry on the trades which are carried on on the land. They could not sublet except at reduced rents. For a farmer would not pay a higher rent than he had already bid for the farm when he had been outbitten by these merchants; and so with the market gardener and the builder. The merchants would soon be ruined men. They know this, and would not entertain the scheme.—Yours, &c.,

THOS. S. WICKSTEED.

14, Croydon-grove, West Croydon,
May 19, 1912.

ENGLISH STUDENTS' VISIT TO GERMANY.

SIR,—Your readers may remember the visit of German University Students to this country in 1910. May I now call attention to the forthcoming return visit of English students to Germany this summer? The influential German Committee making the necessary arrangements includes his Excellency Herr von Holleben as President; Professor Sieper (Munich) as Chairman; Professor Harnack (Berlin), Freiherr von Stengel (Munich), and other prominent men. Oxford and Cambridge are each sending 15 undergraduates, and we are hoping that London, Birmingham, and the northern Universities will send another 30.

Full particulars of the month's tour, which includes Hamburg, Kiel, Berlin, Jena, Weimar and Munich, will be sent on application to me before the end of May.—Yours truly,

CHARLES WEISS.

Kronengarten, Rickmansworth, Herts.

"TRUE PATRIOTISM."

DEAR SIR,—I should like to recommend to all Sunday-school teachers of the elder classes a little book entitled "True Patriotism," by Margaret Pease, published by the Pilgrim Press, 16, Pilgrim-street, E.C., price 1s. I shall be glad to give a copy of the book to any teacher who will send me a postcard asking for it.—Yours, &c.,

A. M. CARPENTER.

11, Marston Ferry-road, Oxford,
May 19, 1912.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

SIR,—May I through the medium of your paper call attention to the fact that the London Sunday School Society have taken larger premises for their work in connection with the Southend Holiday Home, and that Miss Angles, our lady superintendent, is now quite ready to receive guests.

The new home is situate at 80, Darnley-road, Southend, in a good part of the town, and close to the sea front. It is next door to the Unitarian Church at Southend, the minister of which, the Rev. Thomas Elliot, has kindly undertaken the post of local representative of the committee entrusted with a general supervision over the management of the home. There is a nice garden, and in all respects the accommodation offered is greatly superior to that at Hillcrest-road, and includes a small bed-sitting room, the exclusive use of which can be obtained at a small increased cost.

For elder scholars the cost of board and lodging is 7s. 6d. a week; for Sunday School teachers, mission workers, and persons of the artisan class connected with the London churches, schools and missions, the cost is 10s. 6d. a week, and for all other persons 17s. 6d. a week. Special rates are quoted for week-end visits. At the present time, when persons of the two former classes are not using the home largely, those belonging to the third class can be well catered for, and will find the home the means of furnishing them with a cheap and comfortable holiday at the sea-side. For further particulars, and papers giving the regulations and full rates of admission, application should be made to Miss Angles, at 80, Darnley road, Southend.

R. ASQUITH WOODING, Hon. Sec.
25, Engayne Gardens, Upminster,
May 19, 1912.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

JUSTICE V. SENTIMENT.

The Province of the State. By Sir Roland K. Wilson. London: P. S. King & Son.

THE one thing which is worth everybody's while to seek is justice. What people actually do seek is usually determined by sentiment. And sentiment is the victim of rhetoric. Rhetoric, in turn, as may be ascertained by all the books on the subject, is based on more or less calculated lying. And no liar is permanently comfortable. Hence the prevailing unrest.

Such in brief is the application of the saying: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His justice and all these things shall be added to you." In other words justice must come first. Sir Roland Wilson sets at the beginning of his important book a quotation from the Federalist: "Justice is the end of government." This was the inspiration of Bentham. This is the theme of the book before us.

It is characteristic of the extent to which English politics are run by lawyers in their own interest, that no provision is made for cheap and certain justice. I am contemplating the possibility of myself suffering a certain injustice, but the expense of protecting myself is so great that I shall endure the injustice in question, should it befall me, rather than engage in a conflict which will be ultimately decided by the longest purse. The working classes are perfectly right in their belief that they cannot obtain justice from the English courts. What they are mistaken in is in blaming the judges. The judges are beyond corruption, except in so far as the rules of the legal game have to be observed by them at the cost of equity. Nor are they really to blame even here. Like men engaged in all professions, they treat their occupation as an end in itself, and not as a means. That is to say, the public must be prepared to protect itself against specialists in law, as in everything else. But the dreadful feature of the whole situation is this, that the public have had dust thrown in their eyes. They fail to see that cheap and certain justice would render superfluous many of the measures about which the widest diversity of opinion holds. "English law," says the author, in his preface, "practically denies justice to the poor." Here is the source of much of the misery of the poor. Yet, instead of going straight for this undoubted cause of social distress, the leaders of labour allow themselves to be drawn away upon side issues such as the Osborne Judgment, instead of demanding a reform which shall bring justice to the poor.

Hence it is that the following passage which I will quote from the preface of "The Province of the State" seems to me to be one of the most important statements that have been made in recent times:

"Bentham spent a long life in pressing upon his countrymen (and upon foreigners also when he got the chance) a comprehensive scheme of law reform, based on the general principle of seeking the greatest happiness of the greatest number (individual interests being taken to be the only real interests), and more specifically on the presumption that some adults will, for the most part, be able to look after their own interests, if only they are effectually protected against violence and fraud; not (as is often erroneously stated) on the presumption that each individual in pursuing his own objects is necessarily serving the general interest. The failure of English law, as he knew it, to afford this protection to either rich or poor with reasonable certainty or promptitude, but more especially its practical denial of justice to the poor, was the object of his constant denunciation, and he worked out in minutest detail the changes required in order to convert the existing chaos into a rational system. Only quite late in life, when experience had taught him the hopelessness of trying to convert the then governing classes, did he turn his attention to political reform." It is a mistake therefore to blame the philosophical radicals, as Mr. Ramsay MacDonald does, for the evil results of the policy of laissez faire. What really happened was this: the capitalist could commit almost any injustice against the poorer citizen in the full confidence that the law could not be invoked except with the help of a deep purse. I do not know how far Sir Roland Wilson would accept these inferences. But it is probable also that the new aristocracy of bureaucrats which the exaltation of the State is creating will be not less ruthless than the old capitalists in taking advantage of the law as against possible critics or opponents.

"Justice can never be really the end of government until it is made gratuitous." This maxim is repeated in several places. "As I understand the matter," says the author (p. 199) "justice can never be said to be fairly administered between man and man so long as there is any question of money payment other than restitution to the aggrieved party, or payment of fines properly imposed for breaches of the law." Here I am content to bow down to the technical knowledge of the author.

The separation of justice and righteousness is the great weakness of Protestant doctrine. Christian righteousness is impossible without justice. When John the Baptist began his preaching of the kingdom of God by demanding just conduct from the rich, the tax collector, the soldier, he was paving the way for the beatitude: "Blessed are the poor for theirs is the kingdom of God." Such is the form which is given by Luke. Matthew's addition of the words "in spirit" (blessed are the poor in spirit) has been the loophole for much hypocrisy. It still remains true that the poor will become happy when justice is really administered.

It is the business, the main business, of the State to enforce justice. When this has been done, it will be possible to consider the further functions of the State. Until this is done, no other function of the state can be satisfactorily performed. On the contrary, we flounder on now, as at present, committing injustice in order to satisfy one group of persons; later on, when this type of injustice gives rise to an inevitable reaction, we shall go on to commit another set of wrongs.

The attack upon the existence of the State which is involved in what is called "passive resistance," is severely criticised by Sir Roland Wilson. "Unless the Government is either so inefficient or so oppressive as to make me prefer anarchy or revolution, I am acting ungratefully, vote or no vote, in withholding my support while I avail myself of its protection" (23).

It thus appears that the principle which is laid down by Sir Roland Wilson is a most fruitful one. It opens out to us a way of escape from the interminable maze into which we have been led. For the impulsive and unreasoning acts of the partisan, it seeks to substitute the love of justice to which all heaven is promised.

FRANK GRANGER.

A TRAVELLER IN CHINA.

The New China: A Traveller's Impressions. By Henri Borel, Official Chinese Interpreter in the Dutch East Indies. Translated from the Dutch by C. Thieme. With 48 illustrations, pp. 282. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.

IN the light of the recent triumphant revolution in China the aspects of the New China discussed in this very readable book (it was written in 1909) are already somewhat belated. Yet it may be heartily welcomed on account of the insight of the author into the spiritual no less than into the political aspect of Chinese culture and civilisation. The title is perhaps somewhat too comprehensive, for the book deals only with Peking and the changes which have taken place in that city. Events have moved so rapidly in China within the past year that several of the author's prophecies have already been accomplished. The key to the transformation of the whole situation is given by the remarkably successful efforts made to promote a sound education of the masses on Western lines. The attempts to weld together into one nation the heterogeneous elements comprised in the Chinese Empire by the compulsory adoption of a common language—the Chinese of the Mandarins—will probably be more potent in creating a new and united China than any paper constitutions. One of the most significant features in the amazing progress of education in China is the demolition of ancient temples and the building of schools on a Western basis in their place. The influence on the rising generation is beyond all conception. Already the Chinese are demonstrating their independence of European civilisation and their power of assimilating its methods by building their own railways and warships, by manufacturing large guns and munitions of war in their own arsenals, by organising an efficient police force and fire brigades in the larger cities, by securing an adequate supply of good water and electric light, and by laying macadamised roads. The main obstacle to the natural development of China on its own lines is the suicidal policy of obtaining loans from foreign states. Her internal resources are so marvellously rich, both in agriculture and in undeveloped mineral wealth, that there can be no justification for exposing the country to possible intervention of the Powers on behalf of foreign bondholders. It is, however, necessary first of all, as M. Henri Borel ably points out, to abolish the financial corruptibility and "squeezing" methods of underpaid Chinese officials. Sound and liberal education, inculcating a civic sense of obligation to the State, will go far to eliminate the present tremendous waste of national resources, although the whole bureaucratic system will have to be radically purged and re-modelled.

As translator and editor of the doctrines of Confucius, the author has an unbounded enthusiasm for the personality and teachings of the great philosopher, of whom he declares himself to be a disciple, remarking that "Master K'ung was worthy of the devotion of hundreds of millions during centuries, if only for these texts, enunciated hundreds of years before the Christ revealed himself in Jesus:—'All men within the four seas are brethren,' and 'What you do not desire done unto you, do it not unto others.'" His strong leanings towards mysticism render him well fitted for the task of conveying to Western minds some indication of the point of view of the Chinese, in whom symbolism has reached an extraordinary degree of elaboration and complexity. The author is deeply sensitive to the influence of religious buildings, finding that the famous Yellow Temple at Peking "is surrounded by an ethereal atmosphere of the most subtle vibrations only discerned in the higher regions by the most delicate consciousness of the soul." The droning of the temple gong has for him "a sound of occult import," and he feels that "violet is the ethereal colour of devotional and pious thought." In this respect he is completely in sympathy with the Chinese views, unintelligible to most Westerners, upon the symbolism and religious significance of colour as applied consistently to the decoration of their temples, pale yellow standing for the symbol of the "highest intellectuality," blue for "pure religious sentiment," and violet for "high spirituality."

The translation has, evidently been executed with care and judgment, but it is a matter for regret that the excellent photographs of temples and arches (p'ai- lous) have been reproduced in rather a poor style, which does not do justice to the richness of the tracery and ornament.

FELIX OSWALD.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

THE CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS:—Scientific Management in the Churches: Shailer Mathews. 2s. net.

MESSRS. T. & T. CLARK:—The Religion of Israel under the Kingdom: The Rev. A. C. Welch, Theol.D. 7s. 6d. net.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL & Co.:—The Unity of Faith: Geoffrey Rhodes. 3s. 6d. net.

MR. T. WERNER LAURIE: Wild Flowers of the Hedgerow: W. Percival Westall. 1s. net. Wild Flowers of the Wood: W. Percival Westall. 1s. net.

MESSRS. LONGMANS, GREEN & Co.:—Preventable Cancer: Rollo Russell. 4s. 6d. net. Social Work in the Hospitals: Sydney Phillips, B.A.

MR. ELKIN MATHEWS:—Illusions and Ideals: R. Dimsdale Stocker. 1s. net.

MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS:—What is Judaism? Abram S. Isaacs, Ph.D. 5s. net.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

A WISH.

Now that the new fruit is coming in you will be saying, "This is the first gooseberry I have had this year—I must wish." Perhaps some of you are very practical and will add, "Oh, I am not going to wish for anything much, for I shan't get it if I do," and you'll wish for a fine day for the school treat or a prize at school, instead of for the bicycle that perhaps you used to wish for. Others perhaps will say, "Oh, I'm not going to wish at all; last year I wished for fine weather for the holidays, and it rained nearly every day," or "Last summer I wished to get the average in the cricket team and I was very nearly last—it's foolish to wish." I am not so sure that it is always. I heard a very interesting story of a man to whom was to be granted one wish and only one. He was working in the fields one day when an elf came along and said "Why do you work so hard? Here's a ring, and if you wear it you can wish, and whatever you wish will come true; but you can only have one." The man was delighted; he went home to his wife, and she said, "Oh that's lovely; we can now have that beautiful field with the pretty little lake in it." "No," said her husband, "I'm not going to spend my wish on that; I'll work very hard and then we can buy that field and still have the wish left. So he worked very hard and at the end of the year bought the field. Then his wife said, "Let's use the wish to get a cow." "No," said her husband, "I'm not going to waste my wish on a cow—I'll work hard and earn enough money to buy the cow." So he worked hard and bought the cow. Years went on and still the wish was not spent. Children grew up, and the whole family were very happy, and the woman said to her husband, "You seem so different; you are so much more contented than you used to be." Years after the man and his wife died, and the children considered who should have the ring; but one said to the other, "We'll bury it with him; he used to look at it so seriously, and mother, too, used to look at it as though it were something mysterious; so we'll leave it on his finger." And so they did. The wish was unused, but you see it had kept the man and his wife cheerfully working right through life, and life had become brighter for them since they had made up their minds to work to carry out their own wishes.

Supposing you were to be allowed to have one wish—and only one—fulfilled. I wonder what your wish would be? I am afraid some of you would wish something that you would wish you hadn't wished later on. Perhaps one of you is very fond of chocolates, and you would wish for as many as you could eat. I heard of a little boy who came into a shop at Christmas time and asked for a Christmas card. "A halfpenny one?" said the lady in the shop. "A halfpenny one, indeed," he said; "she gave me a two-guinea box of chocolates, and I must give her a penny one!" A two-guinea box of chocolates! I think he must have made a mistake, for I have never seen such an expensive box, and I don't suppose you have. Perhaps the mention of it makes your mouth water, but supposing you spent your one wish on something like that, wouldn't you soon wish you had it back? And even if you exchanged it for a doll, a box of soldiers, a doll's house or a bat, wouldn't there come a day when you wished you had waited and got more value for it? Maybe if the wish came to you when you were getting towards the end of your schooling you would wish to be whatever you wanted to get your living by being. Perhaps a boy would say, "I'll wish to be a sailor (it's so lovely to be wrecked on beautiful desert islands like the 'Swiss Family Robinson'!) or a fireman (it's so interesting to watch fires in order to earn your living!)" Yet I don't think that is worth wasting one wish over. It is said that somewhere or other there is a tombstone on which are the words "Born a man and died a grocer." Oh, what a pity! Why, you say, is not a grocer's an honourable trade? Yes, but to have become only a grocer, and nothing more than a grocer; to have done nothing better for the world than weighing out its tea and sugar! Oh, that isn't good enough. What we call our business must not be everything to us; we must see that we have other interests and cherish higher ideals than just earning money. The poet Browning has a fine poem called "The Shop," in which he simply describes a shopkeeper who attended to his work well but had other interests too, that really made the best part of life for him. And the poet says in one verse—quite simple enough for you to understand:—

I want to know a butcher paints,
A baker rhymes for his pursuit,
Candlestick maker, much acquaints
His soul with song, or haply mute
Blows out his brains upon the flute.

What the poet wants, you see, is to see the shopkeeper thinking of something higher than how to get more customers into his shop and money into his till. Tolstoy, the great Russian writer who died not much more than a year ago, tells us a fine story of a man who put all his efforts into one wish—a wish to get more land. He sold what land he had in order to buy more where he heard it was cheaper. Then he heard of another place where it was cheaper still, so he sold up again and went there. Then someone told him of a country beyond the border where land was given away, and immediately he sold all his land to enable him to travel there. In due course he found the country; he met the chief, and was told that he could have as much land as he could walk round in one day from sunrise to sunset, but there was one condition—he must get back to the hillock from which he started or he would have none at all. He accepted the condition, and got up early next morning and started at the very moment of the sun's appearance, rejoicing at the prospect of becoming very rich. He walked on until mid-day, and then wondered whether he ought to return. "No," he said to himself, "I'll go a little farther; I can run part of the way back, and I want more land yet." So he went on. Early in the afternoon he again wondered if he ought not to commence the return journey, but just then he saw a field a little bit out of his way that looked very fertile, and he said, "Oh, I should like to take that in; I'll hurry along and get round it before I go back." So he did. Then he began to hurry back, but, alas, he found he had grown tired through much walking, and the road seemed much longer than he had expected. He dragged himself along, and he saw to his horror that the sun was hastening towards the west. He hurried on as best he could, and it sank lower. Still he was out of sight of the hillock, and still, therefore, he was compelled to force himself to hurry. At last, when the sun was very low, he saw it in the distance; he ran as best he could, and just as it set he threw himself at the hillock and fell down—dead. So the only land he needed and the only land he had was six feet of earth for a grave. Jesus told a story very much like that: we call it the "Parable of the Rich Fool." It was about a man who had plenty in his barns and wished only to eat, drink, and enjoy himself, but his wish was a worthless one, and death stepped in and he had nothing to show God for his life on earth. There are plenty of people like the two men I have just spoken of. They spend all their lives trying to get something that is of very little use when they get it, and which may be taken away before they can enjoy it. What should we wish for, then? Something that will remain after death—a loving heart, a noble work, a life that shall remind men of Jesus.

When Dickens was a little boy his father showed him one day in the course of a country walk a great house called Gad's Hill Place, and told him he might be able to have it for his own if he worked hard. I don't suppose his father thought much more about what he had said for years, but Dickens did come to own that house and to live in it for the closing years of his life. Work was behind the wish, and work should be behind all our wishes. If they are good wishes, we shall be the better for working for them if they never come to pass, and oftentimes they will.

You wish I would leave off? All right, I will. W. K.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

THE NATIONAL PEACE CONGRESS.

WHILE the memory of the exhibition of aviation for purposes of war which the King recently witnessed at Weymouth, and the speech by Mr. Winston Churchill on further naval development were uppermost in the public mind, the eighth National Peace Congress met last week at Caxton Hall and for three days discussed various matters relating to armaments and arbitration. The discussions were of an extremely practical nature, and in reading them we are perhaps less impressed with the progress that the cause of peace is making than with the general consensus of opinion as to the necessity for driving home the economic facts so strikingly put forward by Mr. Norman Angell in his famous book, securing the exemption of private property from capture at sea, and strengthening the goodwill which already exists between the commercial men of our own and other countries. Sir Ernest Tritton declared that "war and finance were absolutely antagonistic," and dwelt on the ever-growing interdependence of the Powers through finance; Mr. F. W. Hirst (editor of the Economist) brought some powerful arguments to bear in support of his contention that "whatever captures and destruction of floating property occur in war are almost bound to injure British interests"; and Dr. J. T. Lawrence (member of the Institute of International Law) said the next reform to be striven for at the Hague Conference must be in regard to submarine mines "laid off the coasts and ports of an enemy with the sole object of intercepting commercial navigation."

But there are deeper reasons underlying all these material considerations which must, after all, be pressed home to the mind and conscience of the nation unceasingly if we are not to be hurled back into barbarism by the accumulation of armaments and the fostering of suspicions which they actually cause to exist. War is an evil which every civilised Christian Power must seek to prevent, as Monsignor Benson said, and he was entirely right in laying stress on the principles, so antagonistic to the spirit of religion and humanity, which produce conflict. Speaking at Westminster Cathedral on the same subject last Sunday, he said it was not merely the industrial unrest which threatened civil war that required a remedy; a remedy was required for the wider and deeper unrest that threatened to plunge nations into the horrors of unnecessary wars, and threatened to plunge the Western world into a war the world itself had never dreamed of before. The consciences of men were beginning at last to awaken, for efforts were being made on every side in the cause of peace. The human remedy was the remedy so far as anything human could be. It was the placing of ordered reason before the minds of men, but they could never conquer the passion for war by mere humanitarianism. They could only conquer it by loving their neighbours as themselves, and to love their neighbours as themselves they must first of all love God.

Lady Barlow, speaking on the subject of "Peace and Democracy," urged that peace was a fundamental necessity for social reform, and it was not to the Court or the aristocracy, the upper middle class or the rich manufacturer, that they must look for a remedy of the warlike spirit. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, M.P., said, at the evening conference on Thursday, "there is no Jingoism among the working classes when they are in their normal frame of mind. Sometimes, however, they become insane, and are impelled by their emotions either to support in a negative sort of way a war or call for one. As democracy is beginning to rule the world the great problem before us is to devise means by which, when wars are being worked up, the working classes will continue to remain in their normal frame of mind. Solve that problem and you solve the problem of peace."

The Rev. J. H. Harris, who has just returned from a visit to Central Africa, submitted for the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society a resolution calling public attention "to the menace to international peace created by the growing tendency of our own and other European Powers to train African troops in the methods of European warfare," and asking that the subject might be placed on the programme of the forthcoming international Congress. Mr. Harris contended that it was inconsistent, while educating natives in the eternal principles of "liberty, equality, and fraternity," to train them in the theory of European warfare. The resolution was passed. Another resolution which was carried with a slight verbal alteration was the following, proposed by Mr. F. Maddison:—"That this Congress protests against the rapid extension in the use of aerial vessels in war, and appeals to all Governments to foster by every means in their power an international understanding which shall preserve the world from a practice which will add a new hideousness to warfare. This Congress earnestly invites the International Peace Bureau to place this question on the agenda of the forthcoming Universal Peace Congress at Geneva."

The Rev. Dr. Estlin Carpenter, Miss Kate Stevens, Mr. J. A. Hobson, and Mr. F. J. Gould (Moral Education League) contributed papers to the Conference on Education and International Peace on Wednesday. Among others who read papers or took part in the discussions of the Congress were Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, M.P., who made some trenchant allusions to the upper "or worst educated class" which had very much to do with bringing about occasions of war; Mr. G. H. Perris, whose subject was "Rival Naval Armaments"; Dr. W. Evans Darby (Peace Society), the Rev. Canon Grane (Church of England Peace League), Mr. Percy Alden, M.P., Mr. George Barnes, M.P., and Mr. W. C. Anderson. A resolution advocating general strikes by international agreement for the prevention of war was not passed, being defeated by 89 votes to 47.

THE NATIONAL COMMITTEE

FOR THE

PREVENTION OF DESTITUTION.

THIRD ANNUAL MEETING.

A VERY warm welcome was given to Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb, who have just returned from a long tour in the East, at the annual meeting of the National Committee for the Prevention of Destitution which was held at Essex Hall on Monday, May 20. The Bishop of Birmingham, who presided, said that although Mrs. Webb had told him that she and her husband did not intend to write a book on their travels, she admitted that many of the new ideas and information they had gained would go into such books as they might write in the future. Referring to the record of the past year's work, which might seem to indicate that little actual progress had been made during the twelve months covered by their report, he said he thought there were nevertheless many signs of real progress. Undoubtedly a great desire was being shown on the part of those responsible for legislation to advance on the lines laid down by the Minority Report, which was being carried through piecemeal. The Bill for the Control of the Feeble-minded would have been delayed much longer, he believed, had it not been for the cumulative effect of the Minority Report, for there was nothing that the legislator was more tempted to do than to put things off as long as possible. It was only by very hard knocking at the door they wanted to have broken down that anything could be accomplished. Then there was the unquestioned formation of public opinion, which was going on slowly. He thought it was as well that it should go slowly, because there were so many things in the way of the necessary reforms, and it was better that the demand, when it came, should be an irresistible demand. It was a gross misstatement of their position, the Bishop added, to say, as so many did, that they were undermining individual responsibility. What they wanted was to place people in such a position that they could exercise their responsibility more completely than was possible as present, in regard to sanitation, education, and even decency. He himself was heart and soul with their movement, although he was unable to do as much spade-work for it now as he wished, for he believed that it would help to create self-respecting citizens. He would do all that lay in his power, in season and out of season, to support the National Committee.

Mr. Hamilton Fox, hon. treasurer, moved the adoption of the report and accounts in the absence of Mr. Graham Wallas, to whom this duty would otherwise have fallen. He expressed the warm appreciation of the Committee for the self-sacrificing work which had been done in the office by their voluntary helpers, adding that if it had not been for their assistance he thought it would not have been possible for them to report a balance on the right side, which meant that they had money to carry on their great campaign. Mr. E. R. Pease, in seconding the motion, said the chief value of their work was that it provided organised and not only statistical information for the administrators of every country.

Mrs. Sidney Webb expressed her great pleasure at being among her colleagues once more. She could not be expected, she said, to give a very lucid account of what had been done in her absence, as she had at present a rather muddled mind, but she had discovered one thing since her return, that while she was in the Far East the Nation had been carrying out the work which the National Committee for the Prevention of Destitution set out to do in its early days, namely, the breaking up of the Poor Law. The National Insurance Act, involving huge expenditure, with its immense staff and paraphernalia, was an instrument for breaking up the Poor Law, and it gave money to the Education, Health, and Lunacy authorities as the Minority Report had recommended. She wished she could say that it was going to prevent destitution. There were always two ways of doing things, the clever way and the stupid way, and she thought if the Government had taken up the Minority Report they would probably only have incurred one-quarter of the expense they were faced with now. There were three lines on which their society ought to plan a great campaign in the autumn. First of all, they must watch very carefully the working of the Insurance Act, if it was found to be workable, and advocate their own methods when any little hitch occurred. Then as the Government was not pledged to do anything next session, there was a chance of getting them to take up this matter of the Poor Law. There was also the question of the Minimum Wage, in regard to which such a great step had been taken during their absence. They had always said that the whole possibility of bringing home to a man his obligations as a parent and a citizen rested on his being provided with work at a proper wage. They had to see that the legal minimum wage was extended to the whole of industry.

Mr. Sidney Webb pointed out briefly some of the valuable features of the Insurance Act, especially commending the disablement clauses. The most hopeless person to deal with under the present system was the person who broke down before reaching old age, say at 45 or 50, especially hard-working women who were thus prevented from getting even the miserable wage they had been able to earn perhaps by charring or laundry work. A provision of 5s. a week was now to be made for every one of these people, which would take them out of the Poor Law, and in every way the power of the Poor Law was being rapidly diminished as the Minority Report advocated. Major-Gen. Evatt, in moving a vote of thanks to the Bishop of Birmingham, said the whole of England seemed to have moved out of its old apathy, and that was the only way in which the Empire could advance.

Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb were entertained to dinner the same evening at the Holborn Restaurant by the Members of the Fabian Society.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE London District Unitarian Society maintains its reputation for energetic and valuable work in rendering aid to existing churches in the London District, assisting in the formation of new churches, promoting social intercourse between members of congregations and others interested in the spread of liberal religion, in organising or supporting special religious services, or in the delivery of lectures and the circulation of literature. In the sixty-second annual report it appears that eleven congregations receive grants from the funds, eight of which have provided two services a day throughout the year, the Finchley Church having been added to that number since November. The district minister has put in another year of strenuous work, and given considerable attention to the weaker churches, especially those without a settled minister. High appreciation is recorded of the services of members of the Lay Preachers' Union without whose assistance the Society would have had considerable difficulty in providing regular services at the churches for which it is responsible. At Acton, where the Rev. A. C. Holden is the minister, there are more members on the congregational roll than there have ever been. Mr. H. N. Caley, as lay worker, gives himself freely to the work at Bermondsey, and Finchley is hoping for the services of a regular minister. A fine spirit is manifested at Stratford and Forest Gate; Kentish Town progresses under the guidance of Rev. F. Hankinson, and the new year opens encouragingly at Lewisham. Peckham loyally supports the work of the Rev. Douglas W. Robson, and at Walthamstow remarkable capacity for development has been shown under the Rev. Douglas Hoole, a development only protracted by the breakdown in health of Mr. Hoole shortly before Christmas. Mr. Wm. Lee, B.A., has charge of Wimbledon, and at Woolwich, the Rev. T. F. M. Brockway has succeeded the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones. The Society has suffered a great loss by the death of Mr. David Martineau, J.P., and Miss Preston.

At the annual meeting of subscribers and friends of the Society, held at Essex Hall, on Thursday evening, May 16, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C. (President), was in the chair, supported by Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Mr. C. Hawksley (president of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association), Mr. A. Wilson, the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson (district minister), Mr. Ronald P. Jones (hon. treasurer), and Mr. Ronald Bartram (Hon. secretary). Amongst those present were the Revs. W. W. C. Pope, W. Tudor Jones, F. Hankinson, W. H. Rose, W. Copeland Bowie, John Tovey, Chas. Roper, W. G. Tarrant, Douglas W. Robson, John Ellis, A. C. Holden, Hugon S. Tayler and Miss Sharpe. Letters regretting inability to attend were read from Messrs. F. D. Bowles, E. Gauntlett, G. H. Clennell, and Mrs. Bartram.

The Chairman (Dr. Odgers) spoke of the work the Society was doing in endeavouring to lay before the population of London the truth of Unitarianism. He wondered if they had been doing their utmost in the past, if they were doing it at that moment, and if they were prepared to do their utmost in the future to make that great seething population understand what it was for which they stood and worked. They were undoubtedly more respected than they used to be, but he did not think that was any reason why they should abate their efforts or cease to imitate their predecessors in the zeal with which they worked in the cause. It was not the time to rest when the battle was half won, but it was the time to do more. He was of opinion that there were not enough Unitarian chapels; there ought to be one in every square mile of London. Dr. Odgers said that there was a scheme which the Society hoped to be able to carry out, requiring some £12,000 or more, and it had been his experience that when a good workable scheme, with a reasonable chance of success, was put before them the money and support was readily forthcoming. He felt that they were not doing their utmost by the great city in which they lived, and they were going to work to make everybody in London know what they believed and for what they stood, and to carry the cause forward for the uplifting and the betterment of the inhabitants of the metropolis.

The Secretary in presenting his report said that the two churches without a settled minister were Finchley and Wimbledon. Mr. Lee was taking the place of a minister at the latter place. They hoped to be able to help Finchley to a minister of its own very soon, and at Stratford, since the printing of the draft report, the Rev. John Ellis had resigned his ministry to take charge at Stalybridge. The Secretary noticed how few of the younger generation were subscribers to the Society, reliance being placed too much upon the older people. He appealed to the young people to take more interest in the work of the Society that they might be better able to carry on the good work that would be handed down to them.

The Chairman moved the adoption of the report, and, in seconding, the Rev. H. Gow, president of the Provincial Assembly, spoke upon "The Problem of our London Churches." There was no reason for taking a dismal view of the London churches. It was better to have an outlook and a call to something bigger; a sense of larger responsibility, as they had it in London, of the infinite. There was great work to be done in London and that Society could feel that it was doing something well worth doing on the lines of spreading the views they held dear, but there was a large amount of work to be done still. London was a little unique and emphasised the problems and difficulties going on in the kingdom in all the churches. Especially in London was there the lack of the spirit of worship amongst the people. He thought it was only a passing phase. There was an enormous exodus of people from Saturday to Monday, going out to the country or to some city or other. Whilst there was a certain amount of good, health and pleasure derived from that change, it presented a common and serious problem in connection with the churches. There was a sense of being able to get on pretty well without churches. Were the question put to them, many of those people would say, "Oh yes, those are my views pretty much; I think you Unitarians are right," but they would not dream of troubling themselves in the slightest degree any further. It was not merely Unitarian views that were wanted. Those people were too easy-going, and a religion which was purely comfortable and easy-going, and had not the doctrine of the Cross in it, was a religion which only made appeal to the reason and would not fasten on the imagination or gain their discipleship. Their religion was the most optimistic religion in the world in the deepest and highest sense, because it was essentially based on the belief in the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man; on the faith that beneath all the vice and selfishness and suffering there was a great, good, and noble purpose in life. He thought that optimism which they preached without the doctrine of the Cross making claim upon a man's whole duty and self-sacrifice was not going to touch those comfortable people. They needed to feel the spirit of worship of the old Puritan ancestors. In connection with the formation of new churches three things were desirable; ministers, a fine earnest nucleus of devoted men and women, and a building which impressed people with the sense that they were determined to succeed in the permanent establishment of their cause.

Mr. Charles Hawksley, supporting the motion, said there would be opportunity before long of assisting a movement about to be proposed for providing a Unitarian Church in Central London of which they would be proud, and which would, it was hoped, attract not only a good congregation but ministers whom it would be a pleasure to hear and help. More ought to be done to encourage young people to attend the churches. Whilst visiting among the Lancashire and Yorkshire churches he felt that some of them would put London to shame not only by the size of the congregations but also by the beauty of the churches. He hoped that would not always be the case, because London ought not to be the worst off in that respect.

Dr. Odgers here vacated the chair to the occupation of his predecessor in office, Mr. Alfred Wilson, in order to fulfil an engagement at the Middle Temple; and Mr. Hawksley moved, Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence seconding, a vote of thanks to Dr. Odgers.

Mr. H. B. Lawford also supported the adoption of the report, and said he always felt a debt of gratitude to that Society, because it was the parent of the Wandsworth Church, to which his family had belonged since the beginning. As a Londoner, he felt that the experiment started some time ago of the missionary minister's work had been extremely successful, and that Mr. Pearson's work in and around London was invaluable. The motion was carried unanimously.

The Treasurer presented his financial statement, which showed receipts of £937 9s. 1d., and expenditure of £853 6s. 10d., leaving a balance of £84 2s. 3d. Considering that there were thirty-four churches and only 200 subscribers, making not more than five or six subscribers to each church, there was room for much increased support and interest. The present year was an extremely critical one in the affairs of the Society. With one exception the special subscriptions promised for a five years' period all terminated with the current payment, and the problem had to be faced of renewing or otherwise obtaining subscriptions amounting to over £300, or nearly half of the subscription list. It must be the first task of the new committee to deal with that problem during the year, and in the meantime an urgent appeal was made to the supporters of the Society and the whole body of Unitarians in London to maintain the work at its present level, at least, by new or increased contributions. The chairman moved the adoption of the statement, Mr. T. H. Terry (Brixton) seconded, and the statement was adopted.

The Rev. J. Arthur Pearson reported the completion of another year's work as district minister of the Society. He had preached seventy times in twenty-eight meetings for worship, delivered nine van or other open-air addresses, given four lectures to branches of the Liberal Christian League guilds and adult schools. The success attending efforts at their churches compared favourably with that of such other agencies at work, and the churches made a positive contribution to the religious life of the neighbourhoods in which they were to be found. A noticeable fact at all church committee meetings he had attended was that the services were recognised as the centre of life of the church. The religious idea was paramount and the various agencies at work were expressions of that idea. In the autumn services were arranged at Hounslow, but the experiment ended with the tenth service as sufficient support was not forthcoming to warrant their continuation. New work would be begun next autumn at Leytonstone and Muswell Hill, and a visit of the van was being planned to each of those districts. Experience strengthened the belief that open-air work was good in so far as it removed false impressions, and made plain the fact that "heterodox" as well as "orthodox" people were trying to serve God among men. The Rev. W. H. Drummond and the speaker officiated as vice-presidents of the Lay Preachers' Union, and in various ways at the regular meetings of the Union tried to be of service to the members. The religious associations and activities of their young people were a legitimate concern of the Society. It was a pleasure to participate even a little in the plans and purposes of their churches, to know the excellent spirit that animated both ministers and people; and he waited confidently for the time when this church and the other could launch their schemes, and the Society would be able to furnish both men and money, recommending that only the biggest and most far-reaching proposals be undertaken. There were great plans under consideration, and the next few years would see a marked development in their common work, and their power to do that work.

Mr. A. A. Tayler moved the adoption of the report, and Mr. F. W. Elsdon (Woolwich) seconded. Mr. A. Savage Cooper (Finchley) moved the re-election of Dr. Odgers as President of the Society for the ensuing year, and Dr. W. Tudor Jones seconded. Both motions were carried unanimously, and the Rev. W. W. C. Pope moved the election of officers and committee, Miss Tarrant seconding. A vote of thanks was moved to the lay preachers by Mr. Dowson, and seconded by Mr. T. L. Rix (Finchley). During the meeting a collection was taken amounting to over £7.

THE WHITE SLAVE TRAFFIC.

A NEW Committee called "The Pass the Bill Committee" has been formed for the purpose of bringing before the public the need for immediate legislation to stop the infamous White Slave Traffic. Amongst the promoters are many who have felt this effort to be especially incumbent on them since the irreparable loss of Mr. Stead, to whose courageous self-sacrifice the passing of the Criminal Law Amendment Act in 1885 was due. The Committee will work for the enactment during this session of the Criminal Law Amendment (White Slave Traffic) Bill, 1912, of which Mr. Arthur Lee has charge. This Bill was drafted in collaboration with the Home Office, and it has in principle been approved by three successive Home Secretaries. What is now needed is to press the Government either to give facilities for the Bill or to bring it in as a Government measure. Lady Bunting has kindly consented to act as hon. treasurer; contributions should be sent to her at 9, Torrington-place, London, W.C. Miss Howes has been appointed as secretary. Further particulars will be announced shortly.

WHIT-WEEK MEETINGS.

UPWARDS of a hundred ministers have already intimated their intention of being present at the anniversary meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Many of the churches and nearly all the district societies will be represented. In addition to Dr. Crothers, the American Unitarian Association will be represented by the Rev. D. W. Bacon (Salem), Dr. Perkins (Portland), and Miss S. B. Williams (Boston); the Brahmo Samaj of Bengal by Sir Krishna Gupta, and of Madras by Mr. V. Govindan; South Africa by Mr. R. C. Brown (Johannesburg) and Mrs. Woodhead (Cape Town); New Zealand by the Misses E. and L. Moon (Auckland); Italy by Dr. Angelo Crespi; Holland by Miss Van Eck (Leiden); Germany by Miss von Willezeck (Cologne); Canada by Professor Howard Barnes, F.R.S. (Montreal). At the President's luncheon a welcome will be given by Dr. Carpenter to eleven ministers who have entered upon their duties since the last annual meeting of the Association. Dr. S. H. Mellone will respond to the toast of "Our Colleges." At the religious service a choir of fifty voices will lead the singing, from the churches at Highgate, Islington, Kentish Town, Kilburn, Newington Green, and Wandsworth, also members of the Choral Society of the Women's Social Club. Tickets to ministers and delegates have been issued to all who have sent in their names to Essex Hall, and hospitality has been arranged for a great many ministers. Afternoon tea will be provided in the Small Hall on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, from 4 to 5. The railway companies have referred visitors to their Whitsuntide excursion lists, and are not issuing vouchers this year.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Blackpool: Appointment.—The Rev. H. Bodell Smith has accepted the unanimous invitation of the members of the Lytham-road Church to become the resident minister. The appointment has the support of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission. Mr. Smith was formerly the minister of the church (which has had no other resident minister) for a year (1900). He will enter upon his duties early in June.

Brixton: The Late Mr. Richard Keating.—The Unitarian fellowship and the Effra-road Church have lost a strong and earnest supporter in the death of Mr. Richard Keating on May 15. Mr. Keating was born at Nottingham on March 19, 1827. He enjoyed early religious instruction at the High Pavement Chapel School, receiving testimonials from teacher and scholars when he left Nottingham in 1855, which bear witness to his zeal and interest in the cause of religion. He connected himself in London with the Carter-lane Mission, working there with Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, Mr. S. Preston and others until his marriage in 1861. From that time he was a constant attendant and supporter of the Brixton Unitarian Church, one of the most prominent and esteemed members of the congregation. His religion was part of his life, characterised by simplicity, sincerity and strength of conviction. To the last he was anxious, whenever possible, to be present at the services of his church, for it was to him not only a place of thought and meditation, but also of worship and the communion of the soul with the highest. He was deeply interested in all the work of Liberal Christianity. Youthful interest in all the world's work was, in truth, a delightful quality of his long life, and no one could meet him without feeling that in him old age was, as Longfellow expressed it, "Youth itself, though in another dress." He has passed away "full of years" and rich in the love of family and friends. His life was long, prosperous and happy, distinguished by its simplicity, usefulness and fidelity to spiritual duty.

Crewe: Free Christian Church.—The Rev. G. Pegler, B.A., late of Newcastle-under-Lyme, who has just settled in Crewe, received, together with Mrs. Pegler, a hearty welcome from the congregation on Wednesday, May 15. The chair at the meeting was occupied by Alderman J. Briggs, a staunch supporter of the Church. Among those present were the Rev. Enfield Dowson, B.A., of Gee Cross; the Rev. B. C. Constable, of Stockport; and Mr. J.

Oliver, of Stalybridge, as representatives of the East Cheshire Christian Union; the Rev. H. D. Roberts, of Liverpool, as representative of the Liverpool District Missionary Association; the Rev. W. A. Weatherall, of Nantwich, as representative of the South Cheshire and District Association; also the Rev. Wm. Griffiths, B.D., Ph.D., of Congleton; Councillor Cameron, of Accrington, lay missionary on the Unitarian Van; Mr. F. Cooper, secretary of the Newcastle Old Meeting House, and other friends. The chairman, in his speech, assured the new minister of the hearty support of the congregation. The Revs. Enfield Dowson, B. C. Constable, H. D. Roberts, W. A. Weatherall, and Mr. J. Oliver also spoke, expressing their good wishes for the success of the cause at Crewe. In his reply, the Rev. G. Pegler said that while men were hard to gather into the churches, he would do his best to build up a church which should do good work for God and man. A programme of music, arranged by Mr. Hilditch, organist of the Church, followed.

Evesham: Presentation to the Rev. Joseph Wood.—The monthly meeting of the Protestant Dissenting Ministers of Warwickshire and Adjoining Counties was held at the Oat-street (Unitarian) Church, Evesham, on Wednesday. Special interest attached to it by reason of the fact that this was the last time the Rev. Joseph Wood, of the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, who is now retiring from the active ministry, would address the ministers' meeting. Among the ministers attending the meeting were the Revs. Jos. Wood (Old Meeting Church, Birmingham), J. Worsley Austin (Church of the Messiah, Birmingham), I. Wrigley (Lye, Stour-bridge), A. H. Shelley (Cradley), J. H. Smith (Cheltenham), Rudolf Davis (Gloucester), T. Paxton (Handsworth), J. E. Stronge (Kidderminster), J. Hipperson (Oldbury), A. E. Voysey (Old Meeting, Birmingham), W. J. B. Tranter (Birmingham), W. E. Williams (Evesham), J. A. Shaw (Wolverhampton), C. J. Sneath (Birmingham), and Felix Holt (Leigh). The service in the chapel was conducted by the Rev. Jos. Wood, who delivered an impressive address. The visitors were entertained to luncheon in the schoolroom by the Evesham congregation, Alderman Geoffrey New presiding. After the loyal toasts had been honoured, Mr. A. H. Martin proposed "The Ministers' Meeting." The Rev. J. A. Shaw responded. The Chairman then proposed "The Preacher of this morning." He referred to the fact that that was the last occasion on which they would welcome the Rev. Jos. Wood as a member of the monthly meeting. Mr. Wood's connection with them had done an enormous amount of good to the body and to everyone connected with it. They highly appreciated his work. Many movements which had been set on foot among the Unitarian body had been due to him, and they must all appreciate the fact that they had had amongst them a prophet indeed. It was with regret that they lost him; they thanked him for all he had done for them, and the Evesham congregation thanked him for coming so frequently amongst them. Mr. New added that Mr. Wood had promised to visit them once a year as long as he lived. The Rev. J. W. Austin, who seconded, said a little while ago the Ministers' Meeting passed a resolution expressing their appreciation of Mr. Wood's great services in the Midlands and their personal affection and esteem for him. The ministers wished to give him a little memento, and he now had much pleasure in presenting him with a gold watch, inscribed: "Presented to the Rev. Jos. Wood by his ministerial friends in the Midlands with affection and esteem. May 15, 1912." The ministers felt they would like to make the presentation at Evesham, because they always looked forward to the Evesham meeting more than to any other they had in the year. Mr. Austin went on to say that there was not a minister in the district but revered and esteemed the man they called their leader. They wanted him to know that now he was leaving, he was leaving a mark on their hearts that time would never efface. They were all the better for the work he had done and for the example he had set them. In replying, Mr. Wood said he could not say how deeply he felt the words that had been spoken by Mr. Austin, and the expression of affection and regret on the part of his ministerial brethren. It was a great deal for a man, when he came to the end of his active career, to know that he had a place in the hearts of those who had worked with him side by side in so many ways and for so many years. Although he had come to the end of his ministerial life, he hoped he had not come to the end of his connection with these churches and the good work they were doing; he hoped to have more leisure for visiting his friends and perhaps preaching for them. As this was the last meeting he would attend in his present capacity, he wished to say that after spending twenty-eight years amongst them, and some forty-eight years in what he might call the Liberal Christian ministry, he had found the message he had to give one of great joy. It had been for him a long and happy experience. His faith in the gospel of Liberal Christianity grew with years, and he would like to encourage the men who were bearing the heat and burden of the day in their churches by telling them that the future was theirs. The past had had its martyrdoms: the present had its difficulties; but the future would have its triumphs. The great cause of Liberal thought and Free Christianity was bound by all the forces that were in the universe to go on to greater and greater triumphs. Intellectually the Free Churches had their differences, but the thing for which they stood was pure and undefiled religion. His last advice to his brethren was to preach what Christ preached, and not to care two straws about preaching what St. Paul or anybody else said about Christ. It was not what men said about Christ; but what Christ himself said, the Gospel which he preached, which, if they were faithful to it, would carry Liberal Christianity to a success of which they had never dreamed. In accordance with custom at the Evesham meeting, the Chairman proposed "Civil and Religious Liberty all the World Over," to which the Rev. J. E. Stronge responded. The Rev. Rudolf Davis proposed: "The Evesham Congregation," and Mr. J. L. Felton (Chairman) and Mr. W. Gill Smith (Hon. Secretary) responded. Mrs. Cliff afterwards entertained the visitors to tea at her house on Greenhill.

Liverpool Domestic Mission Society.—The 75th annual meeting of the subscribers and friends of the Liverpool Domestic Mission Society was held at the Mission, Mill-street, on Monday evening, the 13th inst. About 120 were present at the meeting, the President (Councillor F. Bowring) being in the chair. Mr. Bowring referred sympathetically to the illness of Sir Edward Russell, who had intended to be present at the meeting; and also alluded to the resignation, after 18 years' service, of the hon. secretary, Mr. Harold Coventry. He was glad to say they had found a capable successor in Mr. Harold Armstrong. The report of the Committee contained no new feature, the income of the Society being still some £200 to £300 below the expenditure, necessitating a constant appeal for special donations. Mr. Walter Holland (hon. treasurer) seconded the adoption of the report. Sir W. B. Bowring moved, and Mr. Hugh Rathbone seconded, a vote of sympathy with the missionaries and their devoted band of voluntary workers, the latter referring specially to the long and faithful record of Mr. Fred. Robinson, who has been organist and choir-master for more than 25 years. Besides the Sunday services, he has given an organ recital, and conducted the choir practice every week, in addition to his service in the Sunday school. Mr. Rathbone alluded to the attempt now being made to systematise the dock labour of Liverpool, and wished it every success. Mr. G. H. Ball also spoke in support of the resolution. The missionaries, the Revs. T. Lloyd Jones and Joseph Anderton, briefly responded. Mr. Arthur Hall moved the election of the Committee, which was seconded by Mr. George R. Brace, and the meeting concluded with a vote of thanks to the chairman, moved by the Rev. E. S. Russell, and seconded by Mr. Laurence D. Holt.

London Guilds Union.—The London Guilds' Union held its annual meeting on Saturday, May 18, at Ilford. Tea was taken in the schoolroom, after which the business meeting, presided over by the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, was held in the church. The general secretary, treasurer, and local secretaries presented their reports, which were adopted. The work in the local guilds is of a very varied character, but all have a religious basis, and aim at fostering deep spiritual and personal service. The great object of each guild appears to be thought and service for others. Teas and entertainments to the inmates of an almshouse, the feeble-minded, crippled children, the blind and their guides, a weekly allowance of 2s. for four years to a crippled "friend," toys for poor children, a gift to the President's Poor's Purse, are among the efforts made by members to lighten the burden of their less fortunate brethren. For their own enjoyment, education and uplifting, the guilds report lectures and addresses by specialists, debates and conferences among themselves, reading circles, a question class between president and members, and a dramatic and orchestral society. One guild even boasts a manuscript magazine. The Rev. Gordon Cooper, seconded by Mr. Woolland, and supported by Mr. Clark, moved that the best thanks of the meeting be given to the officers for their services in the past year, and that they be re-elected for the ensuing year. This was unanimously carried, the officers being Rev. J. Arthur Pearson (president), Miss Mary Francis (hon. secretary), Mr. F. Talbot (hon. treasurer). The president (Rev. J. Arthur Pearson), in reviewing the work of the guilds, drew attention to the fact that there were 34 churches and missions with a roll of 1,500 young people over 16 years, many of which had no guilds as such. The name "guild" appeared to be an obstacle to some, being regarded as medieval and antiquated, whilst others thought it savoured of trade unionism. He wanted the guild to be the active and impressive force it could be; he saw splendid opportunities for missionary work among the young people, but it would necessitate hard work, cheerful work, if their power for good was to be felt. A discussion followed, after which an excellent musical programme was given. There were about 100 present, including representatives from Ilford, Stratford, Mansford-street, Blackfriars, Highgate, and Rhyll-street.

Mansfield.—A Confirmation Service was held in the Old Meeting House on Tuesday, May 21, conducted by the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, assisted by the minister, the Rev. F. Heming Vaughan, B.A. Seventeen young people, who had previously attended a preparation class, were presented by the minister for admission into the Church Fellowship. Mr. Wood, after an impressive address on "The Grace of Christ," spoke a word of encouragement to each candidate and gave the right hand of welcome into the Church. The service concluded with the celebration of the Lord's Supper. There was a good attendance of members and friends. Each of the newly-confirmed members received a copy of the Prayer Book or New Hymnal as a welcome gift from the congregation.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE CHILDREN AND EMPIRE DAY.

Mr. Carl Heath has written to the press explaining that the National Peace Council, of which he is the secretary, representing thirty allied organisations, social, political, religious and educational, desires to draw attention to the more humane and world-wide aspect of national life which should lie at the basis of all teaching in connection with, and celebration of, Empire-day in the schools. This has been admirably expressed, he says, in the circular letter issued this year by the London County Council Education Committee to the heads of schools (London). No finer exposition of national ideals can be set before the children than is therein suggested to the teachers. The spirit of the whole circular is shown in the concluding paragraph: "It is the quality rather than the quantity of British rule that ought to be emphasised. On Empire-day the children should indeed be taught 'to think imperially'; but to think imperially should be to think not materially but spiritually, not arrogantly but magnanimously, not proudly, as in contemplation of a great possession, but humbly, as in recognition of a great duty." Leaflets on these lines will be sent to any teacher on application to the National Peace Council, 167, St. Stephen's House, Westminster.

CONFERENCE ON THE FEEBLE-MINDED.

At a Conference on the Feeble-Minded, held on May 13 at the house of Mr. and Mrs. Reginald Halsey, Portman-square, presided over by Sir George H. Savage, the following resolution was passed:—That this Conference supports the Bill for the Care and Control of the Feeble-Minded, promoted by the Association for the Feeble-minded and the Eugenics Education Society, and further urges the necessity of providing greater facilities for the medical and psychological examination and observation in Reception Houses, adequately staffed for the purpose, of persons brought before the Criminal Courts. The Resolution was moved by Miss A. H. P. Kirby (secretary National Association for the Feeble-Minded), seconded by Mr. W. H. Dickinson, M.P., and supported by Mr. Thomas Holmes (secretary to the Howard Association), Dr. Robert Jones, of Claybury, Dr. C. W. Saleeby, Mr. Eliot Howard, J.P., and others.

THE "REVIEW OF REVIEWS."

The May number of the Review of Reviews contains a characteristic portrait of Mr. W. T. Stead, in which the expression of the visionary predominates strikingly over that of the dauntless fighter which he undoubtedly was. There are several tributes to the power of his personality by men of very different types, including Lord Fisher, who describes him as a "human Dreadnought," fearing God and fearing none else; and Lord Milner, who speaks of the intense vitality which made his conversation more brilliant and stimulating than his writing. Mr. Alfred Stead is now editor of the Review of Reviews, which he intends to carry on in the same spirit and actuated by the same ideals as his father.

THE PICTURE PALACE AND JUVENILE CRIME.

It has been stated recently by a stipendiary magistrate that there has been an extraordinary increase in juvenile crime of late, traceable to melodramatic films shown at picture palaces. Mr. Silvester Horne asked the Home Secretary in the House of Commons on Monday whether his attention had been called to this statement. In his reply Mr. McKenna said that he had recently received a deputation from the principal makers of films on the question of the formation of a committee by the manufacturers, with the duty of examining all films before they are used. He understood that such a committee was in process of formation, and in view of the serious bearing of his matter on the moral development of our young citizens, we shall all share his hope that good may result from this step.

* * *

There are, however, less obvious ways in which the wrong bias is given, not only to childish minds, but to untrained minds in general at picture palaces, as in certain sensational stories woven round the war in Tripoli which we witnessed recently. The sympathies of the audience were enlisted by a process of suggestion entirely on behalf of the Italians, and nearly everyone, we imagine, left the theatre imbued with the idea that only the Arabs could be guilty of "treachery." In such cases, perhaps, little harm is done at the moment, and the vivid impression produced by the pictures may be soon forgotten; but anything that tends to strengthen race prejudice must be deprecated by all who are anxious to promote fair play between the nations.

THE LAND QUESTION IN THE CONGO.

Mr. E. D. Morel recently pointed out in the Daily News and Leader that, under the old law, the Congo natives have no legal rights whatsoever in the land. It is, however, in the direct interest of the Belgian Government that the native population of the Congo should add to its harvesting of natural products the cultivation of products for the world's markets, such as cocoa, rubber, and so on. He repudiates the misleading notion that the black man is incapable of utilising the soil economically, and reminds us of the enormous cocoa industry which the Fanti and the Ashanti have built up on the Gold Coast, the hundreds of square miles which have been covered with rubber plantations by the Binis in Southern Nigeria, the vast acres planted with the ground nut by the Senegalese, and the similar results which have been accomplished in little Gambia. "In Northern Nigeria," Mr. Morel adds, "Well, I invite the person who thinks the native of West Africa will not work and cannot cultivate the soil to go and visit the admirably kept and extensive cotton plantations in the Kano Province, with the products of which half Mohammedan Africa is clothed to-day."

JOHN TREVOR,

Photographic Artist.

Studio: 82, High St., Hampstead, N.W.

Mr. TREVOR does all kinds of photographic work at moderate charges. He makes a speciality of photographing people in their own homes. This gives greater ease and naturalness to the sitter and produces more characteristic portraits. Appointments should be made for interviews and sittings. Price list and specimens on application.

UNIVERSITY HALL,

Gordon Square, W.C.

(Between Russell Square and Euston Square.)

Services at 11.15 and 7.

PREACHERS (both Services):

May 26.—Rev. HERBERT McLACHLAN, M.A.
(Warden of the Home Missionary College, Manchester).

June 2.—Rev. H. D. ROBERTS (of Hope Street Church, Liverpool).

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
Miss ORME. HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by
Christian Scientists.

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.

BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 135, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCs.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z. INQUIRER OFFICE, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, LAYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

COUNTRY COTTAGE TO LET, twenty-five miles from London. Pleasantly situated, with good garden; two sitting-rooms, three bedrooms.—Yewhurst, Coombe Hill, East Grinstead.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE
& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming Irish Linen Summer Costume Fabric, "Flaxzella." Washable. Wide range of fascinating designs. Beautiful shades, durable, looks smart for years.—Write, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

REMNANT BARGAIN!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen. Big pieces suitable for making Teacloths, Traycloths, D'oyleys, &c., 2s. 6d. per bundle. Postage 4d. Irish Linen Catalogue FREE.—Write, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY."—Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda. Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 1½d.—1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to EDITOR, "Dove-stone," Denton-road, Gorton, Manchester.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, May 25, 1912.

* * * Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3649.
NEW SERIES, No. 753.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 1, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.]

UNITED SUMMER SCHOOL,

The Hayes, Swanwick, Derbyshire.

Under the auspices of the Inter-Denominational
Conference of Social Service Union,

JUNE 22 to 29.

Charge, 5s. 6d. per day or 35s. for the week.

Applications, accompanied by booking fee of 5s., should be sent before the end of this month to J. J. STARK, Ashmead, Orleans-road, Upper Norwood, S.E.

THE FARRINGTON MEMORIAL.

Various friends of Mr. and Mrs. FARRINGTON are anxious to place some memorial of him in the church at Richmond, and a sub-committee has been formed to take into consideration the form it should take. It has been suggested that a window in the church would be a suitable reminder of his ministry there, but the committee will be glad to receive and consider any communications on the subject from friends.

Letters and subscriptions may be sent to Mr. E. WILKES SMITH, 2, Waldegrave-gardens, Strawberry-hill; or Mrs. G. H. EDWARDS, The Barns, Eastcote, Middlesex.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
Miss ORME. HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

SAMUEL JONES FUND.—The Managers meet annually in October for the purpose of making Grants.

APPLICATIONS must, however, be in hand not later than WEDNESDAY, JUNE 12, and must be on a form to be obtained from EDWIN W. MARSHALL, Secretary, 38, Barton-arcade, Manchester.

Opposed to Nothing that is Good.
Afraid of Nothing that is True.

THE CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH.

Organ of the World-wide Progressive
Movement in Religion & Social Ethics.

A Sermon and Prayer by the REV. R. J. CAMPBELL, M.A., appear every week; also Answers to Questions on Religion and Problems of Life by REV. W. E. ORCHARD, D.D., a Parliamentary Article by PHILIP SNOWDEN, M.P., and a Contribution by REV. E. W. LEWIS.

This Week's Issue (May 29) contains a SPECIAL INTERVIEW with Principal J. ESTLIN CARPENTER,
With Portrait.

Also "The Transfigured Face," by Rev. R. J. CAMPBELL; an Interview with the Grand Mufti, by Dr. C. W. WENDTE; "The State and the Railways," by PHILIP SNOWDEN, M.P., &c., &c.

Every week with the "Christian Commonwealth" there is published a Supplement, containing notable Sermons and other utterances by Preachers and Leaders, at home and abroad, who voice the religious and social message of the twentieth century. Among those whose discourses have appeared in this series are:—

BISHOP GORE; Rt. Hon. D. LLOYD GEORGE; MR. G. BERNARD SHAW; DR. LYMAN ABBOTT (Editor of the "Outlook," New York); PASTOR HERMANN KUTTER (Zurich, Switzerland); PROF. T. L. VASWANI (Brahmo Samaj); MR. C. MONTEFIORE, M.A. (Liberal Jewish Synagogue); PRINCIPAL J. ESTLIN CARPENTER; DR. W. E. ORCHARD; Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS ("The Social Challenge of the Churches").

The price of the "CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH" and the Supplement together is 1½d., post free 2d. (Newsagents supply the Supplement to order only.) Either can be obtained separately at 1d., post free 1½d.

Dr. CROTHERS' SERMON, preached for the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in Essex Church, on Tuesday evening last, will be published shortly as a penny pamphlet by the "CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH."

AN INTERVIEW with DR. CROTHERS will appear shortly in the "CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH."

EVERY WEDNESDAY.

One Penny.

Order of your Newsagent.

By Post: Per annum—Inland, 6/6. With Sermon Supplement, 8/8. Abroad, 8/8.
With Supplement, 10/10.

THE
CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH,
Salisbury Square, LONDON, E.C.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL,
AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

CHANNING HOUSE SCHOOL,
HIGHGATE, N. — Wanted, in September, a resident Mathematical Mistress. Write, stating age, qualifications, experience, and subsidiary subjects offered. Salary £50, with laundry free.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.
—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad. Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon). Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

CROW'S NEST.—Mr. E. W. LUMMIS proposes to take a party to Eastern Switzerland in August. Inclusive cost: a fortnight abroad, 14 guineas; a month abroad, 19 guineas. Persons wishing to join should write early to 15, Green-street, Cambridge.

PEARL ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000
Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHRUBSALL, } Directors.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, June 2.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN.
 Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. G. C. CRESSY, D.D.
 Child's Hill, All Souls', Weech-road, Finchley-road, 11.15, Rev. E. DAPLYN; 6.30, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN, M.A.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D. Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11 and 7, Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. THACKRAY, M.A.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Rev. JOHN ELLIS; 6.30, Mr. S. P. PENWARDEN.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15 and 7, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, M.A.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15, Rev. Dr. CROthers; 6.30, Rev. H. Gow, B.A.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30.
 Ilford, High-road, 11, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.; 7, Rev. F. H. JONES, B.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Rev. Dr. TUDOR JONES.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11 and 6.30, Rev. F. HANKINSON.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 and 7, Rev. HAROLD RYLETT.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE; 7, Rev. Dr. CROthers.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. GORDON COOPER.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. W. ROBSON, B.D.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. F. W. G. FOAT, Litt.D., M.A.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLOR.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Mr. VICTOR FOX; 6.30, Rev. JOHN ELLIS.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C., 11.15 and 7, Rev. H. D. ROBERTS.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
 Wimbledon, 27B, Merton-road, 7, Mr. WM. LEE, B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11, Mr. F. R. NOTT, LL.B.; 7, Mr. H. G. CHANCELLOR, M.P.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. FRED. BROCKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30. Supply.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. Wood.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. W. AUSTIN, M.A.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. BODELL SMITH.
 BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45, Scholars' Service; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.

BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. V. D. DAVIS.
 BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, M.A.
 BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.
 BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. GEORGE WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CAMBRIDGE, Assembly Hall, Downing-street, 11.30, Rev. E. W. LUMMIS, M.A.
 CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street, Mr. E. R. FYSON.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BECKH.
 { DEAN ROW, 10.45 and
 { STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A.
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11, Rev. H. E. DOWSON; 6.30, Rev. E. H. PICKERING.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS.
 HOBHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. I. FRIPP, B.A.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. CHARLES CRADDOCK.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. Dr. S. H. MELLONE.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11, Rev. E. S. RUSSELL, B.A.; 6.30, Rev. J. C. ODGERS, B.A.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. DOUGLAS WALMSLEY, B.A., of Windermere.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, Rusholme, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WHITAKER.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. ALEXANDER FARQUHARSON.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. ALFRED HALL, M.A.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. Dr. ODGERS.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVERS.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. JAMES HARWOOD, B.A.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. NICOL CROSS, M.A.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. B. STALLWORTHY.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.
 Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.
 Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

MARRIAGE.

PEGG—READ.—On May 26, at Chelmsford Unitarian Church, by the Rev. A. H. Biggs, of Ilford, Alice Maud Read to Harry Pegg.

DEATH.

MACE.—On May 26, at 11, Chase Green-avenue, Enfield, Middlesex, Elizabeth, widow of Charles Mace, in her 82nd year. Interred at Tenterden Churchyard on Friday, May 31.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

CLEANING or CHARING.—A couple of days' work per week wanted by member of one of our London Missions, who has, for years, done work of this kind at houses of well-known members of our churches. Highest references can be given.—Apply to "X," INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-strand, Strand, W.C.

ENGAGEMENT REQUIRED as Companion or Companion-Housekeeper, temporary or permanent, or to accompany invalid to country or seaside, or take charge of household during absence. Experienced, capable, highest references.—Address, C. M., 20, Alyth-gardens, Golder's Green, N.W.

TYPEWRITING.—Sermons, Articles, and MS. of every description accurately typed. 1s. per thousand words. Price List on application.—Miss KENNEDY, 21, Cheverton-road, Hornsey-lane, N.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	371	The History of Rosslyn Hill Chapel	375	MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES :—
THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT :—		CORRESPONDENCE :—		British and Foreign Unitarian Assoc.	377
Uniformity and Nonconformity	372	“The Province of the State”	375	The Sunday School Association	380
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS :—		Discussions at the National Conference	375	NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	382
The Month of Song	374	FOR THE CHILDREN	376	NOTES AND JOTTINGS	383

* * All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

SIR T. VEZEY STRONG'S weighty and dignified protest against the attempt on the part of the most tempestuous section of the London Press to embitter the relations between Germany and England by exaggerated and distorted accounts of the recent Potsdam incident is exceedingly well-timed. The pity is that such attempts apparently mislead the thoughtless public. All the more reason is it, then, that the Peace Societies, the churches (each of which ought to be a peace society), and associations like that newly founded by Sir Vezey Strong for the promotion of friendship between the several European nations, should continue their beneficent work of trying to infuse a little sanity, not to say morality, into the public relations between the great States of the Continent.

* * *

THE Society of Friends have this year taken the unusual step of holding their Yearly Meeting in Manchester. As usual, the discussions were full of interest and vigour, and exemplified once more the breadth and sure ethical instinct for which the Society throughout its honourable history has been so remarkable. In the course of an interesting discussion on the work of the virile adult school movement, Mr. Rowntree Gillett said that the object of the schools “was not to make Quakers, but to make, to build up men and women.” Probably this fact is to a large extent the cause of their success. Perhaps the most interesting of all the proceedings at the Meeting, as it was certainly the most topical at the moment, was the conference on the relation between Christianity and business. By way of introducing the subject a committee, authorised by the meeting, had prepared a paper, the main principle of which was that business in the fullest and broadest sense of the word was not an end but a means, not merely a profit-making occupation but service of the community. “It is clear,” said the committee, “that some of the effects of the competitive system are becoming intolerable to the Christian consciousness. The strain for the rank and file is at present seriously out of proportion to the results achieved, and the provision of better conditions of life would clear the way for belief in the Father who distributes His sunshine and rain to all, and would lay a solid foundation upon which human brotherhood might be built. . . . It was well that the conscience of the Christian community should be aroused to the immorality of a system which demanded a reserve of labour waiting employment, without at the same time providing that those standing by should be maintained in a condition of industrial efficiency.”

* * *

IN a discussion on the foregoing paper Mr. Seeborn Rowntree, of York, whose own sociological investigations are of the highest interest and value, said that out of about eight million people in regular work probably one-third received wages of not more than 25s. per week, and about one million received a weekly wage not exceeding 20s. As he has elsewhere pointed out, 23s. per week is the very least sum upon which a normal family can maintain the barest physical efficiency. It is the dim, sometimes blindly groping consciousness of the crude injustice of facts like these amid rapidly growing national wealth, and not the mere retention or otherwise of some workman who does not belong to the approved trade union, which is the cause of the present industrial discontent. It is only a superficial diagnosis of the case which attributes labour unrest to the efforts of a few unscrupulous agitators. Those who know the Labour world from within are quite convinced that the movements of recent months have, speaking generally, come from the rank and file. And if labour, as is only too evident, does not always know what it wants, it is all the more incumbent on disinterested people to use their best efforts to determine what on any just or rational distribution of wealth labour should have.

* * *

THE public meeting at Essex Hall on Wednesday evening last was in point of numbers and interest one of the best that has been held for many years. The subject for discussion, “Religion and International Relationships,” was entrusted to the capable hands of Sir T. Vezey Strong, Dr. Crothers, and Mr. J. A. Hobson. Sir Vezey Strong was, to the general regret, unable to be present, but sent his paper, which was read con amore by Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P. The ex-Lord Mayor's paper dealt with various movements already at work for the maintenance of friendly relations between the European nations. Dr. Crothers, with delicately barbed wit and sly, dry humour, pleaded for a better intellectual understanding between the United States and the British Empire, pointing out that the mutual ignorance on the part of the two peoples of even the most ordinary facts in the life of each is often incredible. Mr. J. A. Hobson, in a thoughtful address on the “Ideals of the Working Classes,” maintained that notwithstanding much exaggeration and sometimes violence, the aims of labour, though not always clearly realised or articulated, are in the main a demand for justice, reason, order, amity. Moreover, the organised working classes were nearly always, in matters outside their own particular claims, on the side of justice, freedom, concord and sanity.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT

UNIFORMITY AND NONCONFORMITY.*

BY THE REV. J. E. ODGERS, M.A., D.D.

"Look unto the rock whence ye were hewn."
—ISAIAH li. 1.

TO-DAY is the 19th of May, and on this day 250 years ago the Act of Uniformity received the Royal Assent, and with the ejection of the 2,000 ministers consequent upon this, begins the line of religious ancestry represented by this College. We look back to

"... those Unconforming, whom one rigorous day
Drives from their cures, a voluntary prey
To poverty, and grief, and disrespect,
And some to want, . . .
Their altars they forego, their homes they quit,
Fields which they love, and paths they daily trod,
And cast the future upon Providence,
As men the dictate of whose inward sense
Outweighs the world."

I am appointed to address you on the historical and religious significance of this event, and on its place in the national life of England.

All the troubles of Protestantism, where once established, are traceable to the notion that the civil ruler takes on, as by right of succession, the Papal dominion over the Church. This is exemplified in the great compromise arrived at in the German Diet, and expressed in the words "Cujus regio, ejus religio: whose is the territory, his is its religion." The German prince devises or sanctions oppressive Church regulations for his territory, however small. The Swiss municipality assumes to dictate to the ministers who shall and who shall not be admitted to Communion; and this produces the tremendous turning of the tables which we know as the Rule of Calvin in Geneva. The English monarch admits or stints measures of reformation at will, on the Tudor principle that "whatsoever His Majesty should enjoin in matters of religion should be obeyed by all his subjects." Henry VIII., as Supreme Head of the Church, applied this principle as he chose, and men suffered simultaneously for the denial of his supremacy and the denial of transubstantiation. After the interval of Roman reaction and the Marian persecutions, the Church of England approached its definite settlement. The supremacy of the Crown was again defined; to it was reserved all power of alteration, revision, and addition, alike in matters ritual and doctrinal. Queen Elizabeth was in a hurry to enforce uniformity; she believed that external conformity would lead to unanimity. She devolved the power reserved to the Crown upon a Court of High Commission, and spurred the Bishops to action with injunctions and admonitions. The returned exiles (and among them were many of the Elizabethan Bishops) who had lived during the Marian period in communion with the reformed Churches of the Continent, found themselves forbidden to take any steps to win England to a definite Protestantism, which seemed to them the one thing needful. The Queen would have no preaching, because this might lead to discussion and difference; she could not, however, prevent the growth of a party of further reformation. Within this party two sections developed; one moderate, conformable, and wishful to maintain the national and parochial character of the Church; the other more attached to the model presented by the reformed Churches of the Continent, which they believed to be closer to the New Testament pattern, and espousing a Presbyterian theory of Church organisation. Both demanded the institution of Discipline which the Edwardian reformers had declared to be most necessary (see the Communion Service).

Outside these parties we have on one side the colourless conformists—those who had been Protestants under Edward and Catholics under Mary, and were now disposed to be anything that the Queen liked to make them or call them; and on the other the Separatists, who held that the particular Church, gathered, planted, and covenanted, is that to which all the promises of the New Testament are applied and in which all the power of Christ may be exemplified. The charter of the Moderates was the exception made for their case in the Act of Subscription to Articles, 1571, an Act passed by Parliament in spite of the Queen's disapproval; she was perpetually insisting that such legislation infringed her own supremacy. By this Act, which authorised the Thirty-nine Articles, the minister was required to subscribe to all the articles of religion "which only concern the confession of the true Christian Faith and the doctrine of the Sacraments," the Articles which embody a theory of the Church and its ministry being thus allowed to be non-essential. This continued to be the charter of those who held views as to the parity of ministers, who thought it desirable that Bishops should not be officers of State, and who demanded more freedom and initiative for the parochial clergy.

On the accession of James I. the hopes which had been built upon his Presbyterian education and antecedents were rudely disappointed. From the Hampton Court Conference, James brought away the motto—No Bishop, no King, and proceeded to put forth the canons of 1603, which had no Parliamentary sanction, and by which every minister is ordered to declare that he acknowledges all and every Article to be agreeable to the Word of God, and that he willingly and ex animo accepts the new form of subscription and all things contained therein. Between seven and eight hundred ministers declined this subscription, and from this time the question of subscription to articles, leading directly to the discussion of fundamentals in Christian doctrine and Church polity, becomes prominent in this country. In the later years of James, under the primacy of Abbot, himself very much of a Puritan, we find a number of ministers, episcopally ordained, who would not qualify for benefices by the new terms of subscription, who were maintained as preachers or lecturers, often by the corporations of towns (as in the case of Baxter), and sometimes by funds privately raised, especially in cases where the rector or vicar did not preach. These lecturers incurred the particular enmity of Archbishop Laud. I cannot dwell upon his assiduous efforts to enforce a uniformity after his own mind and that of Charles I.; but there is a kind of judicial blindness which is almost pathetic about his production of the Canons of 1640, just on the eve of the breakdown of Church and Royalty alike; it is like the sinking ship firing a broadside as she goes down. From the issue of these Canons Richard Baxter dated his nonconformity.

When the Long Parliament met in the same year, the extreme Presbyterian party was nowhere. The whole sense of the House was with the Moderates, and it looked as if a reformed episcopacy after the model of Archbishop Ussher or that of Bishop Williams would have satisfied everybody. But the war in its early stages went against the Parliament, and political exigencies compelled alliance with Scotland; foremost among the conditions imposed were the taking of the Solemn League and Covenant by the members of the English House of Commons, and their undertaking to promote a Presbyterian Church polity in England, and so to ensure a uniform religious organisation on both sides of the Tweed. Apparently, nobody was very much in earnest about Parliamentary Presbyterianism; Lancashire was the first county to adopt it. The City of London, largely influenced by the Scottish delegates who attended the Westminster Assembly, did more than adopt it; it developed a high doctrine of the divine right of presbytery, but Presbyterian organisation seems hardly to have been effective elsewhere. The Parliamentary army, besides developing a number of religious eccentricities, fostered a serious objection to what it supposed to be a new clerical domination. The Little, or Barebones, Parliament of 1653 was entertaining projects for disendowing both the Church and the universities for the purpose of relieving the burden of taxation consequent upon the war, when Cromwell summarily closed its proceedings. Becoming at once Lord Protector, he constituted what may be called the Established Church of the Protectorate. Many people fail to understand who were the clergy ejected in 1662, and identify them in their minds with Ranters and Fifth Monarchy men and other unlicensed preachers of the Commonwealth days. But the Church of the Protectorate to which the ejected belonged was in form the Church of England, retaining its parochial system and the support of the clergy by tithes, and respecting the rights of patrons; for instance, Richard Frankland, founder of the Northern Academy of which this College is the descendant, held the living of Auckland St. Andrew on the presentation of Sir Arthur Hazelrigge. But in every case the presented person had to go before the Triers for approval. Of course, there were complaints that they were prejudiced and capricious, but Baxter defends them. The Moderates were now the exponents of the situation; Baxter's scheme of voluntary association extended from Worcestershire into counties where Parliamentary Presbyterianism had made no progress. The several ministers might organise their parishes as they would. Some did so on the Congregational model. Baxter and others preferred the old way with churchwardens and sidesmen. So we have a system, national and parochial, worked by men divergent in theory, but united by voluntary association in common work and interest.

* The substance of an Address given in Manchester College Chapel on Sunday, May 19, 1912.

The breadth of Cromwell's own view had been expressed in the Instrument of Government (1653), "that such as professed faith in God by Jesus Christ (though differing in judgment from the doctrine, worship, or discipline publicly held forth) shall not be restrained from, but shall be protected in, the profession of the faith and exercise of their religion, provided this liberty be not extended to Popery or prelacy, nor to such as, under the profession of Christ, set forth and practise licentiousness." Hereupon, Baxter tells us, the orthodox party said that the words "faith in God by Jesus Christ" should mean nothing less than the fundamentals of religion; and he was appointed a member of a committee of divines to draw up a statement of fundamentals "to be as a test in this toleration." Then follow his often quoted words: "I would have had the brethren to have offered the Parliament the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and Decalogue alone as our essentials or fundamentals, which, at least, contain all that is necessary to salvation, and hath been taken by all the Churches for the sum of their religion. And whereas they still said, 'A Socinian or a Papist will subscribe all this,' I answered them, So much the better and so much fitter it is to be the matter of our concord." What does this mean? Not that he was indifferent to further points of doctrine, not that he cared nothing for theological refinements—he spent his life among them—but that, as he explains, it is always better to take a man into, than to leave him out of, your religious polity. Begin by making him an outlaw, and you lose all influence over him. Make the essentials such as he can readily admit, or his acceptance of what you impose becomes a mere form which he will probably treat disingenuously. Make them uniform for all, so that there may be no distinction at the outset between him and the man who subscribes more than he.

Baxter had faith in the practical union of moderate men. He tells us exactly this in speaking of the associated ministers of Worcestershire. After excepting a few Episcopalians and Independents who held aloof, he says: "All the rest were mere Catholics, men of no faction, nor siding with any party, but owning that which was good in all as far as they could discern it, and upon a concord in so much, laying out themselves for the great ends of their ministry, the people's edification." I doubt not that a great number of the ejected ministers were such "disengaged faithful men," as he calls them. I think our religious ancestry runs back to those men whom Baxter afterwards defended as the "mere Nonconformists"—"those who had addicted themselves to no sect or party at all, though the vulgar called them by the name of Presbyterians." "I am loth," he adds, "to call them a party, because they were for Catholicism against parties." How strong in numbers the Moderates were, may be gathered from Baxter's estimate that if the Restoration settlement of the Church had been on the lines of Charles II.'s October Declaration passed into law not more than three hundred ministers would have refused to conform. As it was, the restored Bishops and a vindictive House of Commons were bent on making such comprehension impossible, and won a mean triumph in the Act of Uniformity.

Before Charles II. returned to England, in his Declaration from Breda, and afterwards, in the October Declaration of 1660, to which I have alluded, he showed an exact knowledge of the wishes and demands of the Puritan clergy, and a generous spirit of concession to them. He proposed to take subscription back to the terms of the Elizabethan Act ("which only concern," &c.); to make Bishops primi inter pares by associating presbyters with them in local synods, and even in ordination. Option was to be allowed in matters of ceremony, University subscription to be abolished, the Prayer Book to be revised, and liberty granted to those who could not conform even on these terms. This might have been the charter of a comprehensive National Church for that age and for many generations. The Act of Uniformity, which was passed in 1662, was practically equivalent to the Elizabethan Acts of Uniformity and Subscription, with no loopholes and no exemptions. The Act was to come into operation naturally within six months of the Royal Assent of the 19th of May; but by an arbitrary act of cruelty it was to be enforced on August 24 (St. Bartholomew's Day), so that those who did not conform should not receive the Michaelmas tithe. The Prayer Book which the Act authorised did not issue from the press until a few days before August 24, and did not find its way into the hands of many of the clergy by that date.

The story of persecution under the successive acts of the Clarendon Code I cannot now relate. With a break, due to Charles' abortive Indulgence in 1672, the harrying and imprisonment of Nonconformist ministers continued almost to the eve of the Revolution of 1688. Their offence constantly was ministering in private houses to friends, and members of their former congregations. The Toleration Act of 1689 allowed the meeting of "Their Majesties' Protestantist subjects dissenting from the Church of England," under conditions, in licensed premises; the Comprehension Bill, which embodied the hope still strong in the mind of the moderate Nonconformist of being restored to a place within a National Church, did not pass. In fact, it is strange to note how little that one might reasonably have expected came to pass in fulfilment of the hopes of the moderate Nonconformist. He had liberty of worship; he and his fellows need meet no longer in holes and corners guarded with devices for preventing the constable or the spy from being able to identify the preacher. But the elders among them had misgivings as to the institution of separate worship, and were careful that their meetings should not take place in the "public time," that is, while service was proceeding at the parish church. Constantly the retired position of the old meeting house is a reminder of the desire of its founders to avoid every appearance of aggressiveness. The minister did not look beyond his own little society, and disclaimed all notion of religious competition with the Established Church. There was a temper of mind generated by the long period of enforced patience and disappointed hope; a calm piety that knew little of the exaltations and depressions of the fervid soul; a deep sense of moral duty, and a punctual discharge of the offices of religion in the meeting house, the family, and the private hour.

Liberty of education was long delayed. The Conventicle Acts had forbidden an ejected minister or any member of his family to teach any body anything. The Universities were closed against Dissenters; Richard Frankland and his students were obliged to hide in places in the Lake District that are even now difficult to identify. But when at last the Dissenting academies escaped the threats of suppression which menaced them in the reign of Queen Anne, they were willing to extend to others the liberty they claimed for themselves. This at least was the tradition of that Nonconformity with which we are allied. You will, perhaps, be interested in a quotation from the address of Dr. Barnes, the first Principal of this College, in which, in the year 1786, he dedicated it "to Truth, to Liberty, to Religion." After pointing out that prejudice, especially in the form of quiet depreciation of those who differ from you, is no more justifiable in one religious party than in another, he thus addresses the liberal Nonconformists of his day:—"You are a Dissenter; perhaps, a Hebrew of the Hebrews, you can trace back your lineage to the first confessors of Nonconformity; and you wish your son not to swerve from a profession which his ancestors have held so long and so firmly. Do not endeavour to accomplish this by infusing into his mind the false notion that all worth is confined to the communion with which his birth has connected him, or that its opinions have some higher authority than the judgment of those who profess them. Take no unfair advantage of his respectful feeling towards you, to make him think it a breach of filial duty to differ hereafter in his judgment from you and them. Let him know the truth, and the whole truth, on every subject connected with religion, without anxiety or reserve. But teach him also to love and reverence the truth for its own sake, and to spurn all compromise or concealment of his sincere and well-considered convictions. Let him feel in himself the value of a free mind; accustom him to a high standard of moral action, cherish in him a sense of independence, give him a right estimate of the worth of those worldly honours which tempt men to a dishonest or thoughtless profession of conformity with an endowed and established faith. Do this, and you will neither have overstepped your duty nor have fallen short of it; you will probably leave a zealous successor in the place which you have occupied in the House of God; but, at all events, you will have given to society an intelligent and honest man."

The third thing demanded by the Dissenter was liberty of public usefulness. He was still barred by the Test and Corporation Acts from holding any commission under the Crown, any office of public trust, even from being a town councillor of his native place. Such functions were open only to those who had taken the communion according to the rite of the Church of England. And these Acts were not repealed until 1828; but who could charge the "Dissenting interest" with indifference to the public good, and slackness in the causes of justice and mercy?

I must notice in conclusion two characteristics of our religious inheritance which grew out of the experience of the Old Dissent, almost as soon as it became a recognised body and had to arrange, however unwillingly, for its own continuance. The Comprehensive Church, which England refused to make actual, became an ideal. When the first Dissenting ordination in London was to be held (1694), the candidates, among whom was Edmund Calamy, who tells the story, insisted on being ordained "ministers of the Catholic Church of Christ, without any confinement to particular flocks or any one denomination." (Notice the persistence of the Baxterian term.) The very language lifts the thought from a mere question between Presbyterian and Congregational. The minister is to be V.D.M.—the professional description he appended to his name: Verbi Divini Minister, servant of the word of God, not servant of Salem Chapel! And for us even now the Church in which we take service is not so much actual, as becoming.

And finally, was it not inevitable that the limitations in practice of broad and inspiring ideas should become intolerable? Questions of the subscription demanded by law, of doctrinal tests at the ordination or settlement of ministers, successively arose, provoked controversy, and again and again divided the Dissenting ranks. With the minority abode the principle of a broad Church Fellowship, of freedom of thought for the student, and freedom of expression for the preacher, which is our inheritance to-day.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

THE MONTH OF SONG.

AND so, once more, the great days of the air creatures have come and passed—nest and song and love in woodland coverts and in the wide, open spaces of the world. And once more the old delicious wonder of it all gets possession of us: Is there, we ask again, and yet again—is there anything quite so amazing and quite so full of enchantment as this fruition of bird-life which, for England, in May, never fails of achievement? No matter about the weather—that delightful uncertainty of English springtime—nor what disasters and afflictions harass the human folk; there they are, by the end of May's first week—all the countless wayfaring migrants, back from their winter homes in the south or west. Since the late days of March and all through April, they have come drifting in to find their last year's nesting haunts, heralded, most likely, by the lively chiffchaff, whose shouts, from some high beech or pine, cheer us while the east wind holds; unfalteringly they come, on tired wings, to keep their ancient tryst with the Great Mother, who needs and calls them for her yearly festival; until, at last, we hear the shy notes of the sedge warbler, or the harsh vibrant voice of the corncrake, and know that the long hazardous pilgrimage is at an end.

Wonderful enough has been the presence and earlier music of those who stayed with us through the winter, and who waited not for its passing before breaking into song—throstle and skylark and wren, robin and hedge warbler, and, on serene evenings, quite early in March, the rare mellow flutings of the blackbird. Listening to these homeland voices, such as we listened to in childhood and every year of later life, the amazement of familiar things comes upon us as of old. But when we hear again, one after another, the strains of the returned migrants, and think of their adventurous flight, perhaps of a thousand miles and more, over sea and land, then the "shock of mild surprise" strikes deeper and deeper into the heart. The magic strangeness of it all—the joy, the pain, the passion of life's unfathomable mystery!

Much has been learned, in recent years, by patient observation, of this annual movement of birds to and from our shores; yet the full interpretation of it seems as far off as ever. The facts are known—the perils encountered, the vast distances sometimes travelled (the American Golden Plover journeys some eight thousand miles, almost from antarctic to arctic zones), the dauntless energy with which they wrestle with adverse winds, and brave the foes that beset their way. But why they do it, and how they achieve it, is still their own secret. Musing on this, and on what the birds are to us in the manifold life of Nature, we must say that these air creatures do express or embody the wonderfulness of that life, with a sort of careless unconcern that baffles while it enchants the human soul. The grace of form and movement in some, the exquisite shadings and blendings of plumage in others, the marvel of their nests, the delicate colouring of their eggs, the fine modulations of their voice, such as that of the willow wren, who sings as if he were but a lyre for the breeze among the leafy boughs where he is hidden—these things surprise us anew, each year, till we wonder if we have ever really seen and heard them before. That passionate song of the tree pipit, half rivalling the lark, as he descends, quivering from his upward flight, to the branch from which he rose; that clear, delicious lyric of the blackcap; that wandering melody of the garden warbler; that exulting pæan of the throstle; that soft, slow, measured strain of the blackbird, whose voice, at the close of a rainy day, seems to express in melody nearly all that we have ever thought and felt of the mystery of life and the world: we have heard all this again, in this last month of another English spring, and the heart is filled once more with the old wonder and the new delight.

An old labourer was dragging very weary steps homeward, after sunset, a few days ago; so tired he was that only with difficulty and pain the bent form made progress along the dusty road. Slowly he passed where, in a dense thicket, a nightingale was singing. Would he hear that and stop to listen? He did not stop, but as he passed another listener, unnoticed by him, caught the words, "You beauty!" and he trudged onward to his home. So, into the heart of the old toiler of the field sank the music and the mystery of the night. The bird sang to himself and his mate, careless of other listeners; but the world was richer than he knew, and love was giving and receiving, in its own unconscious, unpremeditated way.

I think that while the wonderment of things, whereof this varied bird-life is so beautiful an embodiment—while the wonderment increases the longer one lives, yet every year gives some fresh hint of its meaning. "Ah, yes," we say, "I see, I feel, I know." But if someone ask, "Well, then, what do you know, and what does it mean?" we are silent. That amazing impulse which brought these fragile creatures of the air on their adventurous flight, to nest again in the old haunts, that burst of song from the hawthorn, that soft purring of the turtle dove in the larchwood copse—it is life; it is passion; it is beauty; it is pain. And we are at one with the spirit of it all, or we should not care, we should not suffer, we should not rejoice. And every season brings its fresh and vivid experience; and that experience is knowledge, insight, vision. Only we are unconcerned to tell it in language, knowing it is mystery still.

One splendid afternoon in this year's May, a short, sharp thunder-storm broke over the fields; a wild, fierce wind followed it, bringing the noisy clatter of hail upon the roof where I was sheltered. It passed in a few moments, and even as the noise ceased, the song of a skylark, high up in the storm-cleansed air, fell like a voice from heaven—a song of unmeasured, illimitable joy. "Here, here, in this pure radiance, in these wild notes, is the meaning of it all," that air-born voice was saying. And we may leave it there, and go on with our human work and thought and dream, aware of that something more which, though we cannot comprehend, we may respond to and rejoice in, and sometimes love.

W. J. J.

THE HISTORY OF ROSSLYN HILL CHAPEL.

ON Wednesday next, June 5, our friends at Hampstead celebrate the Jubilee of the building of their present chapel. Dr. Sadler in a short history read before his congregation thirty years ago states that there was probably a small Presbyterian meeting house on the site of the present schoolroom at Hampstead in the reign of Charles the Second. "The first minister," says Dr. Sadler, "whom we can distinctly trace is Mr. Thomas Woodcock." Dr. Sadler had seen a MS. sermon of his dated July 21, 1695, Hampstead. He had probably been educated at Leyden and had married the cousin of Milton's second wife, on whose early death the famous sonnet was written. The second minister was Mr. Zechariah Merrell, who had a long pastorate, dying at Hampstead in 1732. Dr. Sadler goes on to describe the succeeding ministers so far as the very scanty records allow.

The best known name before that of Dr. Sadler himself was that of Mr. Rochemont Barbauld, who was minister at Hampstead from 1787 to 1802, when he removed to Newington Green. Dr. Sadler himself began his long and honoured ministry in 1846. He died in 1891, having been minister of the congregation for nearly forty-five years.

Dr. Sadler's paper, together with a personal appreciation of him by Mr. Squire, and some historical notes by Mr. Henry Sharpe, has been published by the Hampstead congregation, and copies can be obtained from the secretary, Mr. E. F. Grundy, at 1s. each.

Under Dr. Sadler the congregation increased and flourished. The old chapel, now the schoolroom, became far too small, and on June 5, 1862, the present chapel was built. Dr. Martineau preached the sermon at the opening, and a dinner followed by speeches took place in a marquee erected in the chapel grounds. The report in the Hampstead paper of the time states that "the weather was most unpropitious, but that the handsome edifice was entirely filled by a very influential and, we should say, highly intellectual congregation. The Rev. James Martineau preached from John xvii. 20, 21, a most eloquent and impressive sermon. Among those who were present we observed the Revs. Dr. Sadler, T. Madge, J. Martineau, J. J. Taylor, R. B. Aspland, J. P. Ham, H. Jerson, R. Spears, T. L. Marshall, R. C. Jones (Bristol), H. Solly (Lancaster), Dr. Davison, Dr. Carpenter, Sir John and Lady Bowring, Messrs. R. Martineau, E. M. Field, J. Chamberlain, E. Enfield, J.

Nettlefold, J. S. Lister, Russell Scott, W. A. Case, H. Sharpe, and many others." The chairman at the dinner was Mr. R. Martineau. Speeches were made by Mr. E. W. Field, Dr. Martineau, Dr. Sadler, Mr. Aspland, Mr. Madge, Dr. Carpenter, and others. A good deal was said as to the unhappy doctrinal differences between Unitarians at that time. The references to this were of course kindly and in good taste, and a strong feeling of hope and confidence for the future was expressed, but the general tone reminds us of a time of acute differences on the subject of New Testament miracles and the nature of Christ which no longer exist among us.

Dr. Martineau, admired as he was by all for his power of thought and his religious appeal, was regarded with suspicion by many as the leader of a party which was breaking down the authority of the Bible. Dr. Martineau, who spoke of himself as having been for a short time a member of the Hampstead congregation during the interval when he had descended from the pulpit and assumed the attitude of an ordinary layman, said that "his conception of what Christian worship ought to be was more nearly realised at Hampstead under Dr. Sadler than in any other place which it had been his happiness to attend." All the speeches were full of affectionate respect for Dr. Sadler. As the chairman said, "the chapel might properly be regarded as a testimonial of the congregation to Dr. Sadler. The building of it was his doing. If they had not been animated by his exertions, by his strongly expressed wish and the way in which he had put before them the necessity of such a step, it would never have been built."

The memory of Dr. Sadler will be deep in the hearts of many old members of the congregation who will come together at the forthcoming jubilee. Many more recent members will remember with equal affection his successor, Dr. Brooke Herford, under whom the congregation continued to increase. Whether the present minister and the members of the chapel would desire the congregation to be described, in the words of the old reporter, as very influential and highly intellectual, may be a matter of doubt, but there is much reason for thankfulness in the continued good attendance on the Sunday morning, and above all in the quiet, sincere spirit of worship which pervades the congregation, and which has been handed down as the most important thing from the time of the ministry of Dr. Sadler.

It is eminently fitting that at the forthcoming jubilee the sermon should be preached by Dr. Estlin Carpenter. His father, Dr. Carpenter, was for many years the valued honorary organist of the congregation, and he himself, as a boy, was a regular worshipper within its walls. Dr. Drummond, who is to be the chief speaker at the evening meeting, was an intimate friend of Dr. Sadler, and was closely connected with the life and work of the congregation for many years. At this jubilee celebration the best wishes of all who have known the Rosslyn Hill congregation in the past will go out to them for continued prosperity and usefulness in the days to come.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

"THE PROVINCE OF THE STATE."

SIR,—In the excellent notice of my "Province of the State" which appears in your last number over the signature "Frank Granger," and for which I feel much indebted to the writer, it happens, unfortunately, that the chief passage selected for quotation contains what (I hope) is the very worst misprint that escaped my vigilance in correcting the proofs. In line 26 of the second column of the review, for "some adults" please read "sane adults." I should not like it to be supposed that either Bentham or myself regarded the capacity to look after their own interests, if effectually protected against violence and fraud, as the peculiar privilege of a select minority. Readers of the book will soon discover that much of it is directed against the tendency of some (not sane) modern legislation to impose on ordinary people the control which would be suitable for the exceptionally feeble-minded.

ROLAND K. WILSON.

Richmond, May 25, 1912.

DISCUSSIONS AT THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

SIR,—The answers to my letter are very welcome and interesting to me, but they require little comment or reply. I leave the matter of substantiating the statements I made, and pass on for the present to point out the strange mistake contained in Mr. Wicksteed's letter. The great mercantile class would, under the circumstances he names, be able to employ the very pick of the brain and hand workers as wage or salaried employees, and these employees would not only carry out all the work required, but would throw in their good-will as well, as indeed is the general rule to-day.

For instance, Mr. Chiozza Money gives evidence, which is supported by the authorities quoted by the Fabian Tracts and others, to the effect that to-day about nine-tenths of the land of Britain is owned by less than 200,000 people, and that more than three-fifths of the industrial capital of our nation is also owned by a comparatively small and diminishing class under joint-stock company conditions. Now these landlords and these shareholders are not primarily, as they once were, useful producers of the wealth they appropriate. Indeed, the management of our railways, canals, shipping, mines, and general production and distribution grows to be continually less the function of the landlord or the capitalist, and more and more the function of a distinctly new industrial class. This industrial host has to find some means of living, and land, or the increasing capital demanded to found a successful business, is less and less possible to them. That is why they have been, and are, and will be always ready to sell the only marketable commodity they have, which is their brain or hand labour power. They sell this power to create or distribute the necessities of life to those who now hold the means of life. They sell it for wages or salaries under a system of veiled competition with one another and with a fairly constant mass of unemployed workers. And they sell their labour on the primary understanding that as soon as it ceases to be privately profitable to the person or company employing them, they accept dismissal from employment for no fault of their own. The only difference to the farmer, the builder, or the market gardener under the conditions Mr. Wicksteed states would be this; they would no longer be their own employers, but would become managers, foremen and ordinary workers, and they would work as subordinates to men and companies against whose productive and distributive powers they stood not the slightest chance of independent successful competition. The very reason why the ordinary small holding schemes are so open to question as a real remedy is the reason not so much of management as of capital.

Where is the ordinary "back to the land" pioneer to look for the necessary £10 to £15 per acre simply for stock purposes? How is he to meet the competition of huge agricultural interests already developing, and already absorbing that market to which he looks for disposing his surplus products? The French peasantry have in almost numberless cases only escaped the grip of the landlord to fall into the maw of the moneylender, and to find, in consequence, a life of ever narrowing strain upon body and soul.

Mr. Wicksteed says that the conscious recognition of their own lack of trained ability to engage personally in industrial or agricultural pursuits keeps the mercantile class from entertaining the schemes of more or less extensive land ownership by the nation. But does it? The Liberal Party is largely the party of the merchant class, and land-taxation and land nationalisation schemes are to-day a very large section of that party's scheme for social reform. The merchants know land nationalisation will not ruin them, and that is why such a large proportion of them do entertain the scheme.

Mr. Wicksteed does not really face the issues. We can build up a new baronage ruling the people by the pressure of a benevolent industrial feudalism, and millions of working men can for a time be won over to fight for the creation and maintenance of such a modern feudal system. Or we can work for an entirely new social order, opposed to the absurdities alike of Syndicalism and of anarchy, and based upon an ever-extending collective ownership of the primary necessities of earthly existence, which shall be produced for social use instead of for private profit. Or we can throw the whole subject up as very perilous to our own worldly success and doubtfully useful in our already very burdened and perplexing ministry.—Yours, &c.,

WILLIAM J. PIGGOTT.

50, Sydenham-road, Croydon, May 26.

UNITED SUMMER SCHOOL.

SIR,—In connection with the Inter-denominational summer school, advertised in your columns last week, I understand that at least one of the social service unions responsible for its inception is collecting a small fund for the purpose of defraying the expenses of a few of the members of its churches, to whom the experience would be very valuable, though they are unable personally to afford it. I hope that among your readers some may be found willing to do the same for a few of our own earnest workers in similar circumstances. I shall be glad to receive, and to account for, any money sent to me for this purpose,—Yours truly,

CATHERINE GITTINS,
Hon. Sec. N.C.U.S.S.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

MR. A. C. FIFIELD :—The Cup of Care : James E. Pickering. 1s. net. The Strummings of a Lyre : F. Bonham Burr. 1s. net. MESSRS. LONGMAN, GREEN & Co. :—Essays in Radical Empiricism : William James. 4s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Contemporary Review, The Cornhill Magazine, Nineteenth Century.
Random Notes and Reflections : Joseph Harris. Published by the Author.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

OBEDIENCE.

I.

It is many years now since a book was published that was, I suppose, meant for children really. But I think that anyone might read it still, and get good from the lessons it taught. It was a story about a little girl who was called "Sunshine," a merry child in a happy, sheltered home. But what mostly one remembers of the book is, not the tale it told, but that around each page there ran a scroll of leaves and flowers with the words :—

"TO BE OBEDIENT IS A CHILD'S FIRST DUTY."

I sometimes think that this is a truth too often forgotten. I don't mean only by children; grown-ups have to be obedient too. And if we consider this matter of obedience at all carefully, we shall soon find that it is at the root of all real right-doing, and therefore of all true happiness, such as we want in our own lives and in the lives of those we love. For this reason, among others—only this is the chief reason—Christ himself was "subject unto" his parents. And it is also said of him that he was "obedient unto death." Now he is our great example. We should therefore try to get the habit of obedience. What you do once, you will do more easily next time. Try this when you are inclined to refuse some simple request. Do it once, and next time it will nearly do itself, even if it is only that you shut the door quietly, without a bang, or get father's slippers for him.

Some people think otherwise about this matter of Obedience. They feel it to be rather a grand thing to do what they want to do themselves. They rebel against rules, and take pride in breaking them. They want to be a law unto themselves. Now, this is all wrong, and very silly, too. Ruskin, in one of his beautiful books, gives a very good illustration of what I mean. He describes a great watch-dog, who has, of course, been trained from his puppyhood to obey his master; and you are to imagine this strong, magnificent fellow, chained to his kennel. At first sight, one can scarcely imagine any condition more helpless, more enslaved than this. But the dog had been trained to it. He obeys. There he lies patient and very dignified, his nose on his paws, but his ears pricked, on the alert for any, the very slightest sound, that would tell him (not us, for we have not his wonderful hearing!) that a stranger is somewhere about. Then he gives warning with his deep "Wow! Wow!"

This watchfulness, to be sure, is a matter of instinct. Deep down in their wonderful natures, which we humans still understand so badly, there lies this beautiful, mysterious quality of Faithfulness in a dog's heart. But even this would be worth very little if the dog did not obey as well as love. Suppose that dog spent his strength in rebelling against his chain, struggling to get free, snarling and growling in useless impatience against his master's wishes, how could he hear the sound of approaching footsteps or other danger? It is here that the habit of obedience comes in. The dog submits to the chain. Let us suppose him to be released from it; and I am sure we all hope that this is how he spends most of his time! He will lie there still, or gravely pace about his master's home, obedient to what he has been taught to do. Who would care to have him if he were wild and untaught? Who would trouble to care for or feed him? But to return to the chained dog. Along comes a buzzing fly, and settles on that sensitive nose that rests so patiently on Watch's paws. He raises one to brush Mr. Fly away, but back the little torment comes, again and yet again! We all know that it is almost impossible to catch a fly on the wing. What is poor Watch to do? He has not even hands, as we have, nor liberty to change his place.

And now, think of these two creatures. The fly is perhaps of all living creatures the most free. It cannot be caught. It cannot be controlled. Think of it, buzzing, useless, only an annoyance to everybody. (Indeed, it is now believed to be very harmful, and in America a war has been started against flies, because they are said to spread disease.) And now think of the dear, noble dog, patient, and willing to obey. Which is best worthy of our love? Which would you rather be?

It chanced lately that I met two children, both boys, of about the same age, five or thereabouts, living in the same kind of homes; but oh! the difference between them! One was a restless, rebellious, poor little fellow, who, when told to do the simplest thing, even to shake hands with a visitor, simply said, "I won't!" It was no use to try to make friends with him, unless you were ready to do everything and give him everything that he wanted. He made us all uncomfortable, and finally his mother carried him away to his nursery by force, crying and resisting at every step; and I leave you to imagine whether he enjoyed this! But what was to be done?

The other little lad has been taught Obedience. What mother says is to be done, is done, and there is no more about it. And he makes no trouble of it, either. The result is that little Tom can go anywhere, and is always welcome and beloved. Everyone is glad to see his smiling, happy little face. He gives pleasure, and he has it, too, for we all want to have him with us, and to give him what we know he likes, all the more because he doesn't ask for things. "Mother doesn't want me to!" he says; and that is enough.

Yes, enough to make his mother happy, and very often to make Tom not only happy, but safe as well. (This is what I meant by saying there were "other reasons" for obedience, besides the thought that Christ teaches us to submit to those placed over us.) For it generally happens that mothers know, better than children, what is wise and right to do! Tom knows this, and that is why he can be trusted by himself in the garden when the fruit is unripe. Mother has told him not to touch it yet, and though the strawberries really look red, and the gooseberries are very tempting, and the plums quite soft, if you pinch them a bit, Tom never tastes any of them till he gets leave to do so. They do taste good then!

My other little friend—for I am fond of him, too!—is different. The garden gate must be locked against him, for once or twice when he got in he made himself quite ill by eating all sorts of hard, unripe fruit. Then he ought to have had a powder, and, dear me, what a fuss! What a fuss! In the end he had his own way there, too; but he had a lot of pain as well, and I think all this has opened his eyes a bit, so that he is beginning to see that it is not a good thing, for yourself or others, to insist on having your own way. Perhaps by such hard lessons he will learn to be obedient. I am sure he will find it much easier and pleasanter than to be always fighting with others.

K. F. P.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS.

A LARGE number of delegates and friends from all parts of the country visited London in order to be present at the Anniversary Meetings at Essex Hall in Whit-week. The gatherings have taken place under the most favourable conditions as far as weather was concerned, although we have not passed through such a remarkable heat wave as that which visited us at the same time last year, and the meetings have been well attended. For reasons previously explained, there has been no Essex Hall Lecture, but the time has been well filled, and the subjects dealt with by the various speakers at the public meeting evoked as much interest as any question of abstract philosophy could have done owing to the prominence which is at present being given to all questions relating to international arbitration, our relations with America, and social conditions among the working classes.

The proceedings opened on Tuesday, May 28, with the Anniversary Meetings of the Sunday School Association. A conference held in the morning on "The Difficulties of the School Teacher" was well attended, and a large number of people assembled in the afternoon to hear Dr. Tudor Jones deliver an address on "The Use of the Bible in Education." This was followed by the business meeting, presided over by the retiring president, the Rev. J. J. Wright.

At 7.30 a religious service was held at Essex Hall, conducted by Dr. Crothers (of Cambridge, Mass.), who preached a striking sermon dealing with certain aspects of modern pessimism, and the answer of religion to the philosophy of despair, to a crowded and appreciative congregation. We hope to print this sermon in full next week. The singing was led by a choir of 50 voices from the churches at Highgate, Islington, Kentish Town, Kilburn, Newington Green, and Wandsworth, supplemented by members of the Choral Society of the Women's Social Club.

On Wednesday, May 29, a Conference of ministers was held at Essex Hall, at 10 p.m., on "Some Pressing Questions to which Answers are sought," and at 1 o'clock, Mr. Charles Hawksley, President of the British and Foreign Association, received a large number of guests at the Holborn Restaurant, where they were entertained to luncheon. In the afternoon a most successful meeting was held by the British League of Unitarian Women, when the speakers included Dr. Crothers, who was in his usual happy vein; Countess von Wilezeck, the German delegate; and Miss Amy Withall. Mrs. H. D. Roberts took the chair in the absence of Lady Bowring, through the illness of Sir William Bowring. In the evening there was a Public Meeting, at which addresses were given under the general title of "Religion and International Relationships," by Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P. (on behalf of Sir Vezey Strong, who was unable to be present), Dr. S. M. Crothers, and Mr. J. A. Hobson, who spoke on "Europe and England," "America and England," and "Ideals of the Working Classes" respectively. The hall was crowded, numbers of people being turned away from the doors. On Thursday the Annual Meeting of the Association was held, the President, Mr. Charles Hawksley, being in the chair.

The Central Postal Mission held its Annual Meeting on Thursday afternoon, Miss Tagart presiding, when a brilliant address on the "Present Tendency of Religious Thought in Italy," was given by Dr. Angelo Crespi. In the evening a Conversazione was held at the Portman Rooms, the numerous guests being received by Mr. Charles Hawksley. Friday was the date assigned to the National Unitarian Temperance Association, which held its nineteenth Annual Meeting at 7 p.m., previous to which there was a Conference, when Dr. Lionel Taylor read a paper on "Alcohol and Modern Life." The chair was taken at the public meeting in the evening by Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., Some of these meetings are reported in the present number of THE INQUIRER, and a further account of the week's proceedings will appear next week.

The Luncheon.

At the luncheon given at the Holborn Restaurant, on Wednesday, May 29, the toast of "The King" was proposed by the host, Mr. Charles Hawksley, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, who also proposed the toast of "Our Guests from Other Lands," with which he coupled a few words of cordial greeting to the guests present. This was responded to briefly by Dr. S. M. Crothers (Cambridge, Mass.), Sir Krishna Gupta, K.C.S.I., Professor H. T. Barnes, F.R.S. (Canada), and the Rev. Theodore Bacon (Salem, U.S.A.). "Our Societies and Colleges" was proposed by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, responded to by Mr. Hugh H. Rathbone, Dr. S. H. Mellone, and Mr. Istvan Györfi, the Hungarian student at Manchester College. The remaining toasts, "Our New Ministers" and "The President," were proposed and responded to respectively by Dr. Estlin Carpenter, and the Rev. B. W. Robson; and Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., and Mr. Charles Hawksley. The speeches of the guests from other lands were received with great cordiality, Dr. Crothers, who presented the greetings of the American Unitarian Association in felicitous terms, coming in for the warm welcome which always awaits him wherever he goes, whether in his own country or our own.

Sir Krishna Gupta spoke with gratitude of the close relationship which had always existed between the Brahmo Samaj and Unitarians in England. He was glad to be present with another fellow-countryman as a representative of the East, and he recalled with pleasure the fact that when Keshub Chunder Sen visited this country, although he was warmly received by all denominations, from none did he receive a more cordial welcome than from the body to which those present belonged.

Professor Barnes said that although their religious faith was not growing in Canada at present, it had played a prominent part in the work of civilisation in that country, and it was making other denominations more tolerant. He felt, however, that they had a great future in Canada, and while the members of that great independent nation were on the most friendly terms with the United States, they never forgot that they were British and that they wished to remain so, and therefore he wanted to urge those present to go over and visit Canada, and send their sons there, and help to strengthen the ties between that country and Great Britain. Canada was going ahead by leaps and bounds; indeed, it was difficult to convey to them any idea of its marvellous development and resources. It was a great happiness to him to be there, and to be able to carry back to his country the memory of that gathering and of the cordial greetings he had received.

The Rev. E. W. Bacon (U.S.A.), in alluding to what the last speaker had said, emphasised the fact which he was sure they all felt that, although they belonged to different nations, yet they were one people no matter how many races they were divided into. Religious people to-day were largely classified according to their attitude to the great social questions of the present time. There were those who felt that the best thing was to keep quiet about these things and have no change. Then there were those, on the other hand, who, feeling that the evils were so great that they must cry aloud and spare not, were regarded as extremists and revolutionaries. Then there were those for whom a friend of his had coined a name which he thought rather happy—not socialists, but socialisers, who felt that, while the churches had no business to see the evils all round them and be silent about them, it was the function of the Church to be a power-house of the Spirit, giving strength and inspiration to those who, although holding different opinions, were working for a common end—the coming of the Kingdom of God.

Mr. Hugh Rathbone, President of the National Conference, said that it had come to him of late that they were not interesting their congregations, especially the younger members of those congregations, sufficiently in their world-wide brotherhood. He remembered as a younger man feeling that so much of the work they were doing was being done on a bigger scale by the various multiplicity of public agencies that it was possibly a mistake for the different churches to set up their own societies for the same purpose. He felt, however, that if those younger members who felt as he had once felt had attended the National Conference at Birmingham, it would have opened their eyes to the importance of the work they were doing, and for that reason he wished that the different churches would select some of the younger people to attend the National Conference as delegates instead of those who were naturally always asked to go. In addition to this, he felt that it would be wise if some deliberate introduction, after suitable preparation, were given to the younger members of the congregations when they joined the church and took up their full membership.

Dr. Mellone, after warmly praising the work of the colleges which feed the group of churches he represented, said that what they wanted was men. They must look to the ministers and congregations, and to the fathers and mothers who had the opportunity of pointing out to their sons the honour and importance of the ministry, to influence the young men to study at their colleges and help to supply the pulpits which all their institutions and societies were not able to fill.

Public Meeting.

The chair was taken at the public meeting in the evening by the President, Mr. Chas. Hawksley, who in opening the proceedings, said the Committee had arranged that the subject to be considered was our international relationships in the light of reason, experience, and religion. The first paper was to have been read by Sir T. Vezey Strong, who during his mayoralty performed conspicuous service in promoting the great cause of peace and goodwill among the nations of the world, but he was unfortunately prevented from being present. They regretted his absence all the more because he did not belong to the religious community represented by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which made no distinction of church or creed, but bade God-speed to all lovers of freedom and workers for righteousness.

EUROPE AND ENGLAND.

Mr. Chancellor, M.P., undertook to read the paper, in which Sir Vezey Strong said the subject seemed to take them back to the ancient command that we should love our neighbours as ourselves. If we could but introduce the love of our neighbour into our international affairs, it was obvious we should solve all the difficulties which perplexed diplomatists and sorely harassed the great mass of the peoples. What were our relations with our neighbours? With France we were happily on terms of the greatest friendship and mutual goodwill. All who loved children must have been glad to read of the visit of the London school children to their young neighbours in Paris, and of the love and enthusiasm with which they were welcomed in that great and beautiful city. Children could teach us all the lessons we needed so greatly to learn of love and happy friendship with our neighbours in France and Germany, and every other country. What progress had been made in that direction? During the year of his mayoralty he had many opportunities of observing that progress. It was a profound satisfaction to be able to look back on such gatherings as the great and historic Guildhall meeting in support of the principle of arbitration between nations in place of the barbarous and utterly uncivilised method of war. On that occasion the two nations concerned were Great Britain and the United States, but he could not think that such a meeting would be without effect upon our relations with our Continental neighbours, and although for the moment the full effect of that meeting had been postponed, yet he was convinced that it helped to quicken the pace, and that within a short period the nations would have once for all abandoned the resort to warfare in the settlement of international disputes. Then there was the great meeting held at the Mansion House in May last to inaugurate the Anglo-German Friendship Society, and that Society was doing useful and steady work in the establishment and maintenance of friendly relations with our kinsmen of the German Empire. Earlier in the year a visit of far-reaching importance was paid to our country by the world-famous theologian, Dr. Harnack. The visit was in connection with the formation of a British Council as part of the scheme of "Associated Councils" of the Churches of the British and German Empires for fostering friendly relations between the two peoples, and the King himself set the seal of his approval upon that movement by granting an audience to our German visitors.

Surely the statesmen of England could find some means of combining with Germany rather than competing with her in preparing engines of destruction. Their hope for the increased spread of friendly and brotherly feelings between Great Britain and all our Continental neighbours was founded on the fact that the people were coming to understand one another. For the purpose of encouraging this friendly interchange of ideas between the peoples of the various countries of the world there had recently been founded the Society for World-Friendship, of which he was the president, and from all parts of Europe he was constantly receiving messages of brotherly sympathy and evidences that everywhere there were bands of comrades ready and waiting to help towards the progress and happiness of mankind. If England and Germany could only find some means for reducing the enormous waste of the people's money upon Dreadnoughts, and turn that money into useful and productive channels, England and Europe would be happy and contented, and its peoples would go forward hand in hand in works of commerce, of education, and of all the peaceful arts for the fraternisation of all the nations of the world.

AMERICA AND ENGLAND.

Dr. S. M. Crothers spoke on the relationship existing between England and America, and said there had been given to him the least exciting topic of the evening. He could not stir their minds with the horrible vision of what would happen to him if they did not love their neighbours, nor could he stir them with the thought that only by loving Americans at once would they reduce their fleet. Already there was a relationship of intimate friendship and of love, but for all that the relationship might be improved. John Bull and Brother Jonathan were rather hard-headed, independent persons, and they did not fall upon each other's necks for their own protection. All he was going to plead for was for an intellectual rather than an emotional understanding. Lately walking along a beautiful valley in Italy, he met a sturdy middle-aged man, who told him he was an Australian by birth, and that he had tramped through the British Isles and through Europe, and it was his first visit to the Old World. He (the speaker) replied how very pleasant it must have been to get to England, where he could understand everybody. The Australian looked at him, and said: "We are in Italy, and I'll be perfectly frank with you. I understand the people I meet in Italy a great deal better than I understand the people I meet in England. My father was an Englishman, I am an Australian, and it is an intellectual effort for me to understand the English point of view," and he summed up the matter in a single sentence when he added, "the trouble with the English in relation to us is that they take too much for granted." That might be said both in regard to the American and in regard to the Englishman, so far as actual relations which made for great effective co-operation was concerned, chiefly because they had so many things in common, and because they had to a certain extent a common history and a common literature. What he wanted to plead for was a better intellectual understanding, and also for the fact that in order to keep in touch with each other they had to take the intellectual side a little more seriously.

What did an American know about contemporary England? What did the average Englishman know about contemporary America? Both were so profoundly ignorant that they did not know how ignorant they were. Multitudes of Americans came to England every year—what did they see and what did they know? They saw what they came to see, and they knew what they put themselves in the way of knowing. He ventured to assert that given an equal number of Americans and Englishmen, the Americans would pass a better examination in English history up to the year 1776 than the Englishmen. Every American schoolboy could get up and spout the speeches of Chatham; he did not know whether English schoolboys could do the same. Every American was interested in the persons and knew all about the country of "The Last of the Barons," and that was what he came to England to see, and anything that approached that he saw; the thing that did not approach it was not worth seeing. The American was an old-fashioned Tory, he belonged to the school of Sir Walter Scott, and he wanted everything to be that way. That was what he associated with England, and that was what he came to see. That love of Old England was diffused all through the American community. That was a factor that had to be taken into consideration in regard to a great deal of the haphazard knowledge that came from travel and from reading newspapers. It accounted partly for the sentimentalism which largely turned towards the ancient history of the old country, and the lack of knowledge of contemporary England. Precisely the same thing was true of the ordinary Britishers' idea of America; they knew a great many things about the United States—but most of them were wrong. For example, many of them thought in a vague sort of way of the United States of America as a British colony or a British dependency, like Canada, which at one time had seceded and then remained very much the same. Most of the present territory of the United States never was under British rule. To understand America one had to know something of the complexity of American history. The present inhabitants of the United States represented in their very recent antecedents every nation in Europe. The fact was that Americans were no more Anglo-Saxons than Englishmen were Anglo-Saxons.

It was not on any sentimental ground that the American Republic and the British Empire were drawing closer together, and they ought to understand not only each other's history, but they ought to understand what was going on at the present time so that they could interpret intelligently the course of events. The Americans and the English did not take the same trouble as the Germans to cultivate an intellectual understanding. At the present time the Germans maintained a professor in Harvard University to be a centre of Germanic culture and an interpreter of contemporary and past Germanic learning. They also had an exchange professorship between the University of Harvard and the University of Berlin, and those professors became, as it were, the intellectual ambassadors of America and Germany. He thought that was a much more scientific way of dealing with the matter than the establishment of a Rhodes scholarship. He would like to see the United States and England studying each other in the same frank, clear, precise way, because the more they really knew of each other the better they would like each other. That was the sort of understanding for which he pleaded, not for the understanding that would prevent in the future the possibility of war between two kindred nations. He thought that was an impossibility under any circumstances. It was difficult to conceive of any folly that would lead to that. But he did think it worth while to cultivate intelligently peace from a higher standpoint. Jesus said, not "Blessed are the peace lovers," but "Blessed are the peace makers." And to make peace that was worth anything required not merely good feeling, but watchfulness, courtesy, tolerance, and above all more intimate knowledge of all that was best in the other nation.

IDEALS OF THE WORKING CLASSES.

Mr. John A. Hobson said it was hardly possible to speak of the ideals of the working classes without mentioning the term "unrest," and he should probably be expected to throw some light on the present industrial unrest. If he was to relate the term to the subject matter of the discussion he ought to show how far the movement, or set of movements, that was underneath the industrial unrest was international, and how far it was ideal. Those who were followers of the history of the Labour movement in this and other countries would recognise at once that the term industrialism was not a new one, and that the leaders of the movement, socialistic, co-operative or communistic, had always professed that their problem was a definitely international one, and that there was a point of union between the workers of all countries. That union at present had not gone very far, so far as direct and conscious co-operation of the workers in the different countries was concerned. If they were to look at the present time for a clear and powerful bond of union between the workers of all countries they would not find it on the productive side, but rather on the side of consumption. The problem of industrial unrest was a world problem very largely on that account, and it was the increased price of many of the necessities of life common to the working classes of all countries that was bringing them into closer organised sympathy with each other. If they examined the changes that were taking place in the structure of modern industry they would see reasons why the cause of labour was becoming more definitely international. Fifty years ago England stood alone as the representative of modern manufacturing industries, and the other great nations were lagging far behind; but since that time one after another, Germany, Switzerland, Holland, America, France and a number of other countries had advanced along the same road, and so had gradually standardised the industrial activities of the various civilised nations of the world and put them upon a similar industrial level. This movement had drawn from among the working classes in all countries an identity of interest and activity, and was breaking down the old agricultural communities. The same movement was going on not only in the Old World but in the New. What then were the aims and ideals of Labour? Had it any clear ideals? There were certain aims and aspirations which were tolerably conscious in all countries, and which formed the spiritual bond of the working classes. It was pretty obvious that the first aims of the working classes were directed not to what we called spiritual ends at all, but they had grasped very clearly the Aristotelian maxim that you must first get a livelihood and then practise virtue, and it was that apprehension that gave to the Labour movement the appearance on the one hand of materialism, and on the other hand of class selfishness. It was necessary, however, that the spiritual ideals should be maintained, and he ventured to assert that the underlying motives and ideals of the Labour movement were the clear achievement of the large spiritual ideals contained in the words justice, reason, order and amity. Those ideals necessarily sought first of all achievement in the external arrangements, and in doing so there was no doubt an exaggeration of the amount of injustice, and disorder, and discord, and hatred which were to be found in the industrial world. That there was greed, malice, envy, uncharitableness accompanying many of the activities of the Labour world it was impossible to deny, but the main trend of the movement he was convinced was the achievement of what Society as a whole would ultimately come to recognise as the cause of peace and the cause of righteousness. It was based upon a belief that Society depended upon carrying into effect a larger and larger portion of co-operation, and in diminishing the part which discord and competition played in the arrangements of the business world. To dissolve discord was truly a great ambition. The working classes of the present time were doing their best to bridge over that discord by the various movements which brought the members of industry into closer and more direct relations with one another.

The great barrier between capital and labour was still standing strong, but that barrier must fall with a more intelligent interpretation of the rights and needs of labour. If every man and woman could get a clear recognition of the part which work played in fulfilling and realising the need of each one of us, we should find there was no real antagonism between capital and labour, and that it was to the interest of every man and woman to do his proper share in the general labour of the world, confident in the fact that the forces of co-operation by which society is kept together would distribute the product of that labour for the benefit of all. It was, therefore, natural that the thoughtful members of the working classes should be found upon the side of right and generosity and humanity. Some people might think he was giving a very rosy picture, and perhaps a too intellectual interpretation of the seething movements of turmoil and discontent which were visible in the labour world. That might be so. There was clearly a hesitancy on the part of the working classes because they did not know how far it was possible to achieve equity and democracy upon the lines which they had followed hitherto; they did not understand the attitude of the State toward them; they did not know whether it was possible along the present lines for the working people, who formed the vast majority of the population of all countries, to get themselves so adequately represented in the councils of the State that they should control in the intersets of the whole people the powers of the community.

The worker learnt from the ordinary pursuits of his daily work that it was not possible to get without giving, that production and consumption were vitally and essentially associated not merely as theories and ideas, but as practical concrete moralities in every act of life. The moment such a man began to think he came to the conclusion that it was wrong to be a consumer without being a producer, and then he joined with his fellows and demanded that society as a whole should learn to conform to this root principle. It was for that reason that the present ideals of the organised labour movement were a demand for a revision of the rights of property, in order that property might justify its meaning and its name by securing to every man that which belonged to him, that every man, in the words of Felix Holt, "should have a man's share of what goes on in life," whether of property, of leisure, education, comfort, advancement or power. They would never get that improved efficiency in the working classes until they had so altered the modes of distribution of the existing wealth that every man and woman could feel that he or she had a fair chance of obtaining a proper reward for their activities in order that they might be stimulated to the best endeavours of which they were capable. It was becoming more and more apparent that the working classes of this country could not obtain that desirable distribution of wealth which was essential to their elevation unless at the same time the working classes of other countries were moving in the same direction. The problems of labour were becoming more and more international, and it was less and less possible within the artificial limits of a political State to solve those problems. If they were soluble at all, it would only be upon the basis of a larger State than was contained within the limits of any one country, because the vital interests of the workers, economic and spiritual, did not lie within the barriers of a single political State. The world was their State, and an economic World-State was being formed at a faster rate than many people understood or desired. But the movement was inevitable; the large forces of the world were directing it, and it was for that reason that the ideals of the working classes in this country, in Germany, in America, and elsewhere must of necessity become more and more international.

Mr. Wicksteed proposed a vote of thanks to the readers of the various papers. The motion was seconded by Mr. Maddison, and was carried with acclamation.

The proceedings then terminated.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

THE anniversary meetings of the Sunday School Association were held on Tuesday, May 28, at Essex Hall. The proceedings opened at 10.15 with a Conference on "The Difficulties of the Sunday School Teacher," the President, the Rev. J. J. Wright, being in the chair. In welcoming the delegates from the various district Sunday School unions, and other visitors and friends, Mr. Wright said it was fitting that their meetings during Whit week should begin with the Sunday School gatherings, for the staple measure by which most of their legislation, and certainly their church progress, must be measured was the child. In the course of his experience as a President visiting schools in different parts of the country, he had discovered that it was a good thing from time to time to put aside papers and lectures and have a heart to heart conference instead. He thought if they met together oftener in this way, not for the purpose of debate, but in order to talk about the various difficulties with which they were all confronted, it would be a good thing. Some of these difficulties were universal ones, arising from ordinary human nature. There were also local difficulties, inherent or obtaining in one particular locality, which were possibly never heard of elsewhere. They were, however, in any case dealing with a big problem, affecting some 35,000 young people. There were over 10,000 above the age of 16: that fact in itself suggested some of their difficulties. If they looked at the Sunday School in general throughout the United Kingdom, they found they were dealing with children and young people numbering over 7,500,000, while in the Sunday Schools of the world there were, it was stated by a good authority, some 25,700,000, and the numbers were said to be increasing by nearly a million a year.

Among those who took part in the discussion which followed were Mr. Thos. Wicksteed, Mr. Ion Pritchard, the Revs. Lucking Tavener, Gordon Cooper, T. P. Spedding, W. J. Piggott, T. Paxton, F. K. Freeston, F. Hall Dr. Tudor Jones, Mr. Howard Young, and the President, who answered many of the questions that were put forward. Some interesting and useful facts were elicited in regard to the methods which are adopted in various schools for keeping up the attendances, dealing with unruly members, and encouraging the scholars to join the church on reaching a suitable age. The great difficulty in many cases seemed to be how to attach the young people permanently to the church, when school days were over; though this difficulty seemed to be dealt with much more effectually in the North than elsewhere. The general consensus of opinion seemed to be that if the right spirit was awakened in the teachers, and if they took more interest in the children individually, sometimes asking them to their homes, and in other ways getting into close personal contact with them, their loyalty and affection would be won and their love for the school and the church stimulated. Mr. Spedding gave an interesting account of the methods by which the interest of the scholars and the esprit de corps is maintained at Rochdale. Mr. Gordon Cooper thought the Boys' Own Brigade was a means of creating a new interest for the lads, and attaching them to the church. Mr. Piggott expressed his belief in the Archibald system, and said that they must be prepared to revise their methods in the light of the new educational ideas which were being adopted everywhere. Mr. Freeston urged that the elder scholars should be retained in the school, and not drafted off to a class elsewhere, as a former speaker had suggested, and that more encouragement should be given to the growing tendency to give a definite welcome, whether of a ceremonial nature or not, to the young people when the transition was made from the school to the church. The President explained the way in which the invitation to join the church is given, by the scholars who have just joined, to their companions who are just leaving the school at Chowbent, a method which had resulted this season in the accession of 16 new members. Other questions were raised in regard to the duties of the superintendent and the desirability or otherwise of suspending or expelling a refractory scholar, and the Conference was brought to a close long before the possible subjects of discussion were exhausted, in order that the delegates and friends present might adjourn to the Holborn Restaurant for lunch.

AFTERNOON MEETING.

In the afternoon delegates and friends gathered again in Essex Hall, when the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, Ph.D., gave an eloquent address on "The Use of the Bible in Education." Dr. Jones said he felt that they would never save the coming generation without going back to the Bible and basing their teaching upon it. A great deal of attention had been recently paid to the subject of education, as those who read the educational supplements of The Times knew, and indirectly the articles which had appeared had a bearing on the Sunday School, because in order to get efficiency in the Sunday School they must adopt methods similar to those which make for success in the day-school. It was discovered by masters of both public and private schools that there was a great deal of waste and inefficiency owing to the fact that they did not know how to properly instruct the young mind. The problem of education in the Sunday Schools was a momentous one, and there were three attitudes taken up in regard to it which he would like to dwell upon. The first was that Biblical teaching could be given without any differentiation between essentials and accidentals. Then there was the attitude of those—an increasing number in their own body—who were doing away with definite Biblical teaching altogether. The third position was one which was just coming into vogue in their own time, and this emphasised the essentials, taking into account the psychology and needs of the child's soul.

The first position was a failure because everything they taught was mixed up in such a way that there was no scale of values, and if we carried this system into our every-day life the whole business of he world would get into confusion. The failure of orthodoxy was largely due to this frequent habit of putting second things first and first things second, and he, like many others, had been obliged to spend a considerable period of time, when he grew up, in clearing away from his mind a great deal which he had learnt in his boyhood which did not answer to his essential needs as a man. The attitude of practically ignoring the Bible, and maintaining that only a knowledge of certain rules of conduct or a code of ethics is required, had also failed. The rules or code had their value in regard to knowledge and morals, but they lacked driving power, and religion was more than knowledge and morals. If they did not recognise this they were not reaching the deepest thing within the soul of the child, of the man or woman, and they were causing a further leakage from the church life. He ventured to say that had they been able to touch the souls of their young people and make religious experience a reality, they would have kept almost all their scholars in the church. What they wanted was that dynamic force which would train men and women so that they thought nothing of themselves, but only of the causes which they were pledged to support; and the Bible could supply this if properly taught. They had to find in it the two broad currents running through it which were often mixed in the same chapter, the current of the intellect and the current of the soul. That was the problem of philosophy to-day, and it was the problem of the future, how far intellect can affect life, and what is its relationship with the deeper aspects of our being. Their work as a body had chiefly been in separating essentials and accidentals in the Bible, and in distinguishing between those two currents; but that was not enough, and although they could not give that work up, there was something more that they must do, if they were not to lose ground in spite of all their organisations. They must emphasise the possibility and need of a religious experience, but they must have an authority at their back, and he still agreed with Luther that the Bible was that authority. Its science might be radically wrong, its psychology false in many respects, but the spirit of it and its value as a revealer of history, principles, and personalities remained, and that was the important thing.

All the material that they needed in order to get down to the deepest part of the child's nature was to be found in the Bible. It contained, indeed, leaving accidentals out of the question, all the essentials depicted for us by the men of science and philosophy to-day. If they could wipe out all the metaphysics of the last century they would suffer no loss while they had the Bible. The whole of Kant was found in the 19th Psalm. This, then, was their authority, upon which they could base their teaching of God, and that they must make a vital reality to the child if he was not to be like a block of wood floating down a stream when he went into the world, and was subjected to all the temptations of life. The inward experience of God was a thing of joy, quickening the mind and changing the subjective will until it became the soul's life, destroying self and putting something better and higher in its place. They did not want to worry or meddle with the young soul, but they did want the child to be something more than a subjective being, to be guided and governed by something which had valued outside its own mind, something which had worked for the progress of the world, some universal truth and ideal which had shaped the lives of individuals and nations. In the Bible they got the experience of the community. It might be said that this could be obtained elsewhere, and that was true, and if they could create a book which would have the same history as the Bible it would serve the same purpose; but they had not got such a book, at all events in the Western world. The Bible dealt with the life of mankind before the time of Jesus and after, and from it they learnt what were the universal principles which could lift humanity from a lower to a higher level. It was the adoption of those principles that would teach the child that he could become a participator in all that was greater and nobler than himself, and give him a fixed idea of God.

In the Bible they found two aspects of the greatest results of human history in the field of ethics and the individual life. Here were the factors which made for the progress of mankind, not just what he thought or what they thought. Here were recorded the lives of great personalities with a note of authority which could not be found elsewhere. These were supermen, not men of the herd, and they were uplifted by spiritual experience, without which it was doubtful whether mere knowledge was worth getting. They should be continually presented to the children, not so much in order that they might know about them, but in order that they might imitate them. Professor McDougall had shown what an important part unconscious imitation played in the education of the people, and how they are influenced by the types of character constantly held up before them in their public men, and the same thing was true of the young mind. The Bible taught that religious experience could be repeated. They must adopt a method that would touch the deepest thing in the child's soul, and start the growth of a new kind of life. That was what Christianity did. Christianity was something on the other side of intellect and morals, something that expressed a deeper power striking its root into a deeper soil of our being. If they could use that power in their Sunday Schools they were safe for the future. They had to bring to the child's mind a material which had some relation to what was already there, and that was why it was so necessary to have personal knowledge of his needs, interests, and tastes, and to realise that, as Dr. Drummond had said, every child is born with a potentiality for religion. In conclusion Dr. Jones urged that the life and death and spiritual resurrection of the Founder of our Faith should be continually presented to the child, who is infinitely attracted by them. Jesus possessed something which was beyond the world, and which made him what he was and made his disciples what they were. If they could get that into the lives of the young people, and the children, it would not matter where they were going; they would be going with God and the life universal, and their faith would translate itself into acts of service for the world, for the longing to respond to the call of the spirit was in them which Dr. Everett Hale had so finely expressed:

"And I? Is there some desert or some pathless sea

Where thou, good God of angels, wilt send me?

Some rock for me to rend,
Some stone for me to break,
Some handful of His corn to take
And scatter far afield,
Till in its time shall yield
Its hundredfold
Of grains of gold,

To feed the hungry children of my God?"

BUSINESS MEETING.

The business meeting was held at 4.45, the President, the Rev. J. J. Wright, being in the chair. Mr. W. Blake Odgers, jun., hon. treasurer, in presenting the financial report, said that although he had to record an increasing balance due to the treasurer, the seriousness of the position has been relieved by the receipt of a legacy of £100 from the executor of the late Miss Wallace, of Bath. Every year, however, the Association was exceeding its income, and although it was a curious fact that they were saved annually from a very awkward position by a legacy, he would be much happier if they had sufficient funds in hand to pay for their ordinary expenses. Mr. Ion Pritchard said in reference to the report, which was taken as read, that in comparing the average attendances of 22 years ago with those of to-day, he found that there was a much higher average at the present time. The increase in their adult scholars was noticeable. About 20 years ago there were 6,000 adult scholars connected with them; now there were 10,000. There were two pieces of work in which they were particularly interested, namely the Teachers' Summer Session, to be held at Manchester College, Oxford, on June 28 to July 6, and their publications. He hoped the Summer School would be well attended.

The following extracts are taken from the report for 1912:—

The total numbers of scholars and teachers in all the Protestant Schools in the British Isles has been given as 7,544,171 and 720,314 respectively, about ten scholars to one teacher—nearly the same proportion as in our own Schools. These numbers in themselves can furnish little evidence of efficiency, whereas the average attendance, if correctly reported, would be of value in this respect. Twenty-five schools do not furnish average attendance figures, so that in order to get at a real proportion for comparison, a reduction has to be made in the total roll numbers. Comparing, after corrections made, the averages furnished in 1890 and 1910, the following figures may be taken as approximately reliable:—1890: 245 schools; scholars on Roll, 30,667; average attendance, 19,939. 1910: 268 schools; scholars on roll, 33,152; average attendance, 23,171. This comparison shows a small increase in regularity of attendance.

At the President's own suggestion a series of teachers' conferences have been arranged for at Liverpool, Halifax, Mansford-street (London), Bristol, Norwich, and Birmingham, several of which have been held. These conferences take the form of questions on Sunday School difficulties asked by the teachers and replied to by Mr. Wright, and should prove exceedingly helpful. Much consideration and time have been given by the Committee to a demand being made for an improvement in the Sunday School teaching—a demand that is shared by other religious denominations. Before taking definite steps, it was felt that the approval and support of the District Unions should be obtained, and for this purpose a letter was sent to them bringing forward the Committee's plan so far as this could be defined, and asking for its consideration. As a step forward the Association proposes to appoint a number of suitable representatives who on its behalf shall make friendly visits to all our Schools throughout the land, bringing to them encouragement, information, and ideals, and receiving from the schools a first-hand knowledge of their aims, needs and wishes, the personal contact benefiting both the schools and the Association.

The Committee announce that the Trustees have very willingly consented to open Manchester College to the students attending the Summer Session, and that Principal Carpenter has promised all possible assistance. The programme of proceedings now nearly completed should prove not only very attractive but a very useful one, and the Committee hope that many of our Schools will endeavour to take advantage of the opportunity offered by sending one of their teachers to Oxford. Opening Service and Address by J. J. Wright (President 1911-12); Religion in the Time of Jesus, three lectures by Principal Carpenter; New Testament Lesson-Values, T. P. Spedding (President-elect); Life-Story of Jesus, Ion Pritchard; Mediaeval Saints, Modern Saints, Frank K. Freeston; Citizenship: The Teachers' Responsibility, Miss Grace Mitchell; Infant Class Teaching, Miss D. Tarrant, M.A.; Lesson Demonstration, F. J. Gould; Lessons for Younger Classes, J. Arthur Pearson; Nature Lessons, illustrated, J. Tyssul Davis, B.A. On Sunday Dr. Edwin Odgers will conduct the morning service, and in the afternoon it is hoped that the Charles-street Mission Sunday School will be held at the College. Teachers' conferences will be held. Subjects:—How I Prepare my Lesson, The Story Hour, opened by Lawrence Clare. A question Conference on Teachers' Difficulties.

The President, in moving the adoption of the report, expressed his appreciation of the honour which they had done him a year ago in asking him to be their President. He had always thought he knew a good deal of the work of this Association, but he never realised until he became their President the full extent of that work, and the devotion and energy with which it was maintained by those responsible for it. After paying a warm tribute to Mr. Ion Pritchard and Mr. Blake Odgers for their untiring services, Mr. Wright referred to various passages in the report, and called attention again to the forthcoming Summer School at Oxford, which would be the eighth of its kind. They had had an average of 100 students, and although the same students had sometimes come several times, they must have had no fewer than 500 teachers in their school, and to give 500 students, especially the younger students, 9 days at Oxford made a great difference to them, and was bound to affect their Sunday-school teaching and atmosphere. He drew attention to the publications of the Association, especially to the series of books suitable for children in the infant classes, for children just above that, and for others from eight to ten years of age which are being prepared. Two have already been published, namely, "Favourite Stories," and "Stories for the Little Ones," the latter prepared by Miss Grace Spears and Miss Dorothy Tarrant, and he cordially recommended both of them. In regard to the proposal to appoint representatives, as the report stated, to visit the schools throughout the country, to find out the aims, needs, and wishes of each school, and give to them encouragement, information, and ideals, he was able to say that they would not have to go to the treasurer for the funds necessary to carry out that scheme. Five friends who wished to remain anonymous had given £20 apiece for this purpose, so the £100 they required for this work was already in hand. In conclusion Mr. Wright said that Sunday-school work was never more needed than at the present time, and their Sunday-schools, on the whole, had never done better work than they were doing at the present time. They must rise to their great opportunities, financially, educationally, in method and personal service, and then they need have no fear of the future of the churches they loved, or of that greater world of citizenship on earth and in heaven for which they all existed, worked, and prayed.

The Rev. W. H. Holmshaw (Manchester District Sunday School Association), in seconding the adoption of the report, said he was very glad that the Association had decided to take up the work of visiting the schools, and he was quite sure the help thus given to the workers in those schools would be of the highest possible value. Sometimes he felt that most of their difficulties lay with the teachers, who did not make as much use of the material provided for their instruction as they might do. He congratulated the Committee particularly on their publications, and expressed his great appreciation of the valuable information, stimulus and ideas to be obtained from such books as Mr. Fox's "Practical Teaching of Jesus of Nazareth," and more especially from Dr. Drummond's "Paul, His Life and Teaching." The resolution was carried.

Mrs. Roberts, of Liverpool, moved a resolution of thanks to the President, and the officers and committee, for the past year, and proposed the respective appointments for the coming year, including the Rev. T. P. Spedding as President. In doing so she paid a grateful tribute to the Rev. J. J. Wright for his services during the past year. In the remote province from which she came they had never had a President who had impressed himself upon their minds as Mr. Wright had done. He had given them encouragement and ideas, and the finest thing the Liverpool Association had done was to ask him to come to them and hold a conference of teachers. The meeting was an ideal one, and they were most grateful to him for putting before them in an inspiring and helpful way the fact that the idealism embodied in youth was an asset that the Sunday-school teacher could not afford to neglect. The resolution was seconded by the Rev. J. E. Stronge (Kidderminster) and passed. A few words from the Rev. T. P. Spedding in thanking the Association for electing him as their President followed, and the Rev. Thomas Paxton (Birmingham) moved that the best thanks of the meeting should be given to the Rev. Dr. Jones for his admirable address and to all who had contributed to the usefulness and success of the meeting. This was seconded by the Rev. Lucking Tavener (Aberdeen) and passed unanimously.

The following is a list of the ministers attending the meetings at Essex Hall during Whit week:—Revs. Alfred Amey, Thomas Anderson, T. D. Bacon (Salem, U.S.A.), J. C. Ballantyne, A. H. Biggs, W. Copeland Bowie, T. F. M. Brockway, W. T. Bushrod, Dr. J. E. Carpenter, J. W. Cock, Gordon Cooper, Dr. G. C. Cressey, G. Critchley, Dr. S. M. Crothers (Cambridge, U.S.A.), Edgar Daplyn, J. Tyssul Davis, R. K. Davis, Rudolf Davis, V. D. Davis, A. H. Dolphin, H. Enfield Dowson, Dr. James Drummond, R. B. Drummond, T. E. M. Edwards, John Ellis, D. Delta Evans, D. Jenkin Evans, S. Baart de la Faille (Dutch Church), R. P. Farley, Alex. Farquharson, Dr. F. W. G. Foat, F. K. Freeston, Arthur Golland, Henry Gow, Alfred Hall, Fred. Hall, William C. Hall, F. Hankinson, Charles Hargrove, James Harwood, H. W. Hawkes, H. C. Hawkins, J. B. Higham, Jesse Hipperson, A. C. Holden, E. R. Hodges, W. Holmshaw, Fred. A. Homer, F. H. Jones, R. J. Jones, Dr. W. Tudor Jones, H. W. King, W. H. Lambelle, W. R. Clark-Lewis, Bertram Lister, E. W. Lummis, J. J. Martin, Herbert McLachlan, Dr. S. H. Mellone, J. H. M. Nolan, J. Edwin Odgers, G. Hare Patterson, Thomas Paxton, J. Arthur Pearson, A. G. Peaston, E. H. Pickering, W. J. Piggott, C. E. Pike, W. W. C. Pope, Priestley Prime, Miss H. Phillips, Revs. H. D. Roberts, D. W. Robson, Charles Roper, W. H. Rose, Mortimer Rowe, E. Stanley Russell, E. T. Russell, A. H. Shelley, A. Leslie Smith, H. Bodell Smith, W. R. Smyth, H. Shaen Solly, T. P. Spedding, G. B. Stallworthy, William Stephens, J. E. Stronge, Frederick Summers, Alfred Sutcliffe, W. G. Tarrant, H. R. Tavener, Lucking Tavener, H. S. Tayler, J. L. Tayler, Edgar Thackray, J. M. Lloyd Thomas, G. W. Thompson, J. Toye, W. J. B. Tranter, Charles Travers, W. Lyddon Tucker, G. H. Vance, F. H. Vaughan, E. A. Voysey, George Ward, W. Moritz Weston, J. M. Whiteman, P. H. Wicksteed, W. E. Williams, Joseph Wilson, Joseph Wood, J. J. Wright.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Belfast.—Special services were held at All Souls' Church on Sunday, May 26, when the preacher was the Rev. S. Evans Bowen, of Crumlin. At the evening service, when there was a special offertory for choir expenses, the music included "In Native Worth," from "The Creation," sung by Mr. T. Corlett; "Father in Heaven" (Handel), rendered by Miss Winnie Woods; "The Strain Upraise" (Sullivan), and "Send out Thy Light" (Gounod), by the choir; "It is Enough," from "Elijah," by Mr. E. V. Core, and "The Holy City" (Adams), by Miss M'Kendry. Mr. Drew Birch, organist, had general charge of the praise portion of the service, which was very successfully given, and the evening congregation was a specially large one.

Boys' Own Brigade: 1st Company (London).—The annual inspection of the Boys' Own Brigade was held on Thursday, May 23, at Stamford-street Chapel, when a large audience of friends and supporters gathered to witness the usual display of the work done by the company in its winter session. Mr. A. A. Tayler occupied the chair, and Mr. Percival W. Adams of the South London Battalion, Boys' Brigade, acted as inspecting officer. After the ceremonies of "General Salute," "Inspection," and "March Past," and the singing of the B.O.B. hymn, "Like a Silver Bugle," the boys gave displays of marching, drill, physical exercises, and gymnastics. There was also an interesting demonstration of ambulance work, showing the use of Scout poles, &c., in improvising stretchers, a company of 20 boys being converted within two minutes into five fully equipped "stretcher squads." A further display was given of the methods for the rescue of drowning persons, and for their subsequent resuscitation and with a genial warm-hearted speech from the chairman and some words of criticism and of exhortation from the inspecting officer, the meeting closed with the united singing of "Lend a Hand."

Clifton: Oakfield-road Church.—A number of friends and well-wishers assembled in the library after evening service on 26th ult., to wish God speed to Mr. H. Lewis Wensley who is removing to Exeter. The treasurer, on behalf of subscribers, presented Mr. Wensley with a gold watch, suitably inscribed. Mr. Wensley feelingly responded and referred to his long and happy relations with the choir and church.

Dover.—Mr. Ginever, the minister of the Adrian-street Unitarian Church, has just been elected by the Dover Co-operative Society as its President. The Society is a large and growing one, numbering more than 4,500 members.

Horsham.—The Whitsunday Anniversary at the Worthing-road Chapel attracted a goodly number of visitors who came from Billingshurst, Brighton, Brockham, Croydon, Ditchling, Hayward's Heath, Oxford, London, Slaughtam, and Woking. The preacher of the day, Dr. Tudor Jones, spoke of the interest attaching to the ancient homes of faith. They could not stroll round the graveyard, or look at the memorial windows, or the tablets on the walls without feeling that something great had happened there in the past, something worthy to be maintained in the present. He appealed especially to the young people (of whom there were a good number present) to uphold the traditions of the past, and steadfastly rally to the standard of real religious life and the service of God. Lunch and tea were provided in the school-room, and the collections amounted to over £7. At a recent meeting, held after evening service, the secretary gave an account of her experience at the Birmingham Conference, the Church of the Messiah, Bournville, Ullet-road, Liverpool, and the Antient Chapel of Toxteth Park. A bookcase, believed to have originally belonged to the Rev. Thomas Sadler, has recently been placed in the school-room in memory of Mr. and Mrs. John Steele, who were so long connected with the Horsham, Billingshurst, and Meadow congregations.

Manchester: Cross-street Chapel.—We understand that the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas,

B.A., of Dean-row and Styal, has been cordially and unanimously invited to become the minister of Cross-street Chapel, and the Lower Mosley-street schools. He has accepted the invitation, and will enter on his new ministry in September or October.

Monton: The Late Miss Lydia S. Leigh.—Monton Church has suffered a severe loss through the death of Miss Lydia S. Leigh, of Brooklands, Swinton, only daughter of the late Mr. Henry Leigh, of Moorfield, Swinton. Miss Leigh, who was in her sixtieth year, passed peacefully away on Tuesday afternoon, May 21. She had been in indifferent health for some time, and bore a most trying illness with the utmost patience and fortitude. Her character and influence were beautiful and gracious. Her own family and personal friends best know what a gentle, kindly, and yet firm nature hers was; how constant in its affections, how devoted in its duties. Her influence was felt far beyond the circle of her family and friends. She used to the full all opportunities for doing good, and responded readily to appeals that touched her heart and were approved by her judgment. Her cultured mind and broad sympathies enabled her to select really deserving causes, to which she gave generous support. Her private generosity, tactfully and judiciously exercised, was not less marked. Next to her family affections and interests came her love for Monton Church, with which she identified herself throughout her life. She attended worship regularly, until prevented from doing so by illness, and to the last retained her interest in the work of the church, and her joy in its memories and associations. For many years she was a teacher of the young women's class in the Sunday school, and her good influence is still remembered with gratitude by her former scholars. We can ill spare such women from the earth. They do more for the world by their quiet, unassuming faithfulness and by their steadfast devotion to pure ideals than the world realises. Miss Leigh was interred at Monton Church, after cremation, on Saturday, 25th inst., the service being conducted in the church and at the grave side by the Rev. N. Anderton.

Newbury: 215th Anniversary.—On Sunday last, the 26th inst., Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., visited Newbury and took the morning service, and preached to a fairly large congregation on "The Freedom of Faith." There were many friends present from other churches who listened attentively to the survey of Church history since the days of Jesus and the Apostles, showing the growth of authority, and its futile attempt to bind the intellect and life to the dogmas and doctrine of the past. "The Good Samaritan," a service of song, was rendered in the evening, the reading being given by the Rev. R. Newell, the music by the choir, solos, &c., by Mrs. Richards, Mrs. Bolton, Miss Tressa Wright, and others. This also attracted a good congregation, and was much appreciated.

Padiham.—The Rev. J. E. Jenkin has tendered his resignation of the pastorate of Nazareth Unitarian Chapel. His resignation having been submitted to the Chapel Committee, a deputation was appointed to ascertain the possibility of his reconsidering his decision. As the decision was declared final, a special meeting of the congregation was convened, and held at the close of the evening service on Sunday, May 26, when the following resolutions were passed:—(1) That in consequence of our Minister, the Rev. J. E. Jenkins, having accepted the ministry of the Unitarian Church, Birkenhead, it is with deep and sincere regret that we accept his resignation as minister of Nazareth Unitarian Chapel, Padiham. (2) That we, the congregation of Nazareth Unitarian Chapel, Padiham, desire to place on record our high appreciation of the services rendered by the Rev. J. E. Jenkins, as minister from 1903 to 1912, also, that we most heartily wish him God speed in his new sphere of labour.

Scottish Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual meeting of the Scottish Unitarian Sunday School Union was held in Dundee on Saturday, May 25. The chair was taken by Mr. A. Maclaren, Glasgow, who mentioned in his opening remarks that not only were delegates present from all the schools affiliated to the Union, but that representatives were also present from Stenhousemuir and Perth. A Sunday school was started at the former place during the past year and is meeting with a considerable measure of success; it is anticipated that this school will almost immediately become connected with the Union. As regards Perth, a Sunday school is at present being held in connection with the services which are being conducted by the Rev. E. T. Russell, B.A. It is not yet known whether this will be a permanent undertaking or not. The annual reports were of a highly encouraging character. Without taking into account the new school at Stenhousemuir, an increase has to be recorded both in the numbers of scholars and teachers attending the schools of the Union; and it is particularly gratifying to note the very substantial increase in the number of scholars over sixteen years of age, especially when it is noted that the orthodox Sunday schools of Scotland have to admit of a decrease in the number of their elder scholars. Miss C. S. Brown, Edinburgh, was elected to succeed Mr. Maclaren as President of the Union, the latter being cordially thanked for the services he has rendered during his term of office. The other offices were filled as follows:—Vice-Presidents, Messrs. J. K. Melville and W. F. McRobb; secretary, Dr. J. K. Wood; treasurer, Mr. E. L. Williamson; auditor, Mr. A. Allan. Several matters connected with the future work of the Union were discussed and a most successful meeting was brought to a close by the passing of votes of thanks to the Chairman and to the Dundee teachers for their hospitality.

Sheffield and District Unitarian and Free Christian Sunday School Union.—At the United Service on Whit Sunday afternoon, held in Upper Chapel, Sheffield, there were contingents of scholars and teachers from Attercliffe, Upper, Uppertorpe, and Rotherham Sunday schools. The other schools in the Union were not able to be represented on account of the distance. The service was conducted by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, of Sheffield, the sermon being preached by the Rev. Chas. Peach, of Manchester, who took for his subject "Citizenship and Freedom." Collections were taken in aid of the funds of the Union.

Wareham.—The chapel was re-opened on Whitsunday evening after renovation, which has very pleasantly brightened the appearance of the interior and added to its comfort. The painting of the front has still to be completed, but defects in the plaster of the portico have been made good and the roof made sound again. The service was conducted by the Rev. V. D. Davis, of Bournemouth, secretary of the Southern Unitarian Association.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

TO "GO IN PARDNERS."

Miss Ella C. Sykes described in the Cornhill for May some of her experiences "At a Woman's Hostel in Canada." "In Canada, as elsewhere," she says, "there are, of course, dangers when a woman has to get work through advertisements, and whenever possible I applied first to the Young Women's Christian Association, which acts as an employment bureau as well as a hostel. Usually, however, I had to fend for myself and judge of a situation by the letter in response to my notice, in which I always put that I wished to assist the mistress of ranch or farm. The following was one of my answers: 'Dear Madam [it ran], I seen your "ad" in the Province. I have 100 and 20 acres of land of my hone, it is all payed for I lost my wife 4 years ago I ham 36 years of age I have horses and cattle and a lot of chicken would you cair to go in Pardners with me as I want to settle down again. Pleas let me know by return mail.' I wondered how many 'ads' he would answer before he found any woman willing to 'go in Pardners' with him. These examples, and my own experiences, brought me to the conclusion that very few on the wrong side of forty ought to try their luck across the Atlantic, because they are, as it were, in the English groove, and will find it very hard, if not impossible, to adapt themselves to an entirely new environment. I consider also that the occupation of home-help has not been presented in its true light."

THE SHOOTING OF RARE BIRDS.

At a time when we are all rejoicing in the return of innumerable bird-visitants to our shores, we must sympathise with the appeal which Mr. Joseph Collinson, of the Animals' Friend Society, has made on behalf of the rare birds which are continually sacrificed to the selfish and cruel spirit of the gunner and collector. "Beautiful rare birds, such as the bittern, spoonbill, hoopoe, waxwing, and oriel, are," he says, "the usual victims, but now must be added the names of several species of which there is no record of their having visited this country before. It may not be generally known that during the last few months there has been an unusual migration over the British Isles, and that a number of birds have been observed for the first time. In many instances the discovery has been made by means of a shot gun, and among other specimens which have fallen in this way may be mentioned the Siberian nut-cracker (several of which were killed in south-eastern counties); two examples of the collared flycatcher; a pair of Caspian plovers; and a slender-billed curlew. Is it not ridiculous that so many rare bird visitors to our shores, some of which might remain to breed if they were not molested, may still be shot down with impunity in almost every part of the open country by anyone with a gun?"

WHISTLER'S TOMB.

We learn from The Times that there has recently been erected in Chiswick Churchyard, the cost being defrayed out of the Whistler estate, a tomb bearing an inscription to the memory of Whistler and his wife, whose graves are there side by side. The tomb is of bronze, resting upon a die and step of green granite, and the character of the design is that of the Italian Renaissance. The upper part is ornamented with a frieze and bay leaves. At each of the four corners, standing upon the die there is a beautifully carved figure of a classic mourner bearing an offering of fruit or flowers. On the front at either side of the centre panel there is an ornamentation of bay leaves between two Ionic pilasters. The inscription on the centre panel is as follows:—

Sacred to the Memory
of
James McNeill Whistler
MDCCCXXXIV—MCMIII.
and of Beatrice his wife
MDCCCLVII—MDCCCXCVI.
"The place where I also at last hope to be hidden,
For in no other would I be."
Mr. Edward Godwin is the sculptor.

JOHN TREVOR,

Photographic Artist.

Studio: 82, High St., Hampstead, N.W.

Mr. TREVOR does all kinds of photographic work at moderate charges. He makes a speciality of photographing people in their own homes. This gives greater ease and naturalness to the sitter and produces more characteristic portraits. Appointments should be made for interviews and sittings. Price list and specimens on application.

UNIVERSITY HALL,

Gordon Square, W.C.

(Between Russell Square and Euston Square.)

Services at 11.15 and 7.

PREACHERS (both Services):

- June 2.—Rev. H. D. ROBERTS (of Hope Street Church, Liverpool).
" 9.—Rev. Dr. S. H. MELLONE (Principal of the Home Missionary College, Manchester).
Subject in the evening: "Shakespeare on Industrial Morality."
" 16.—Rev. PRIESTLEY EVANS (of Bury).
" 23.—Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A. (of Leeds).
" 30.—Rev. RUDOLPH DAVIS, B.A. (of Gloucester).
July 7.—Rev. Dr. ESTLIN CARPENTER (Principal of Manchester College, Oxford).

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by
Christian Scientists.

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical
Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought,
BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 133, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Crantook," 59, Warrior-square. First-class
BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS;
most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P.
POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCs.—
Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-
Residence or Apartments in Country
Cottage. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z, IN-QUIRER OFFICE, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY,
LAYSARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying
Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

TO LET, Furnished, near Bournemouth, Lady's superior, well-kept house.
Very pleasantly situated in select road on good elevation. Close to station, near church, shops, picturesque golf links. Piano, croquet, gas-cooker, plate, linen. Perfect sanitation.
Fare, tram or train to Bournemouth, 2d.
Small, careful party, 2½ guineas. Bargain.
Trustworthy servant left.—Address C. P.,
INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE
& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming Irish Linen Summer Costume Fabric,
"Flaxzella." Washable. Wide range of fascinatating designs. Beautiful shades, durable, looks smart for years.—Write, HUTTON'S,
5, Larne, Ireland.

REMNAINT BARGAIN!—Genuine
White Art Irish Linen. Big pieces suitable for making Teacloths, Traycloths,
D'oyleys, &c., 2s. 6d. per bundle. Postage 4d.
Irish Linen Catalogue FREE.—Write,
HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned.
Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form.
Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.
—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY."

Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda.
Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 1½d.—1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to EDITOR, "Dove-stone," Denton-road, Gorton, Manchester.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office,
3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester
(Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday,
June 1, 1912.

* Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

Library of the
PACIFIC UNITARIAN SCHOOL
FOR THE MINISTRY
Berkeley, California

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3650.
NEW SERIES, No. 754.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 8, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.]

WORKS BY THE LATE WILLIAM JAMES

Professor of Philosophy at Harvard University.

ESSAYS IN RADICAL EMPIRICISM.

8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

CONTENTS: Does "Consciousness" Exist?—A World of Pure Experience—The Thing and its Relations—How Two Minds Can Know One Thing—The Place of Affectional Facts in a World of Pure Experience—The Experience of Activity—The Essence of Humanism—La Notion de Conscience—Is Radical Empiricism Solipsistic?—Mr. Pitkin's Refutation of Radical Empiricism—Humanism and Truth Once More—Absolutism and Empiricism.

THE VARIETIES OF RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE.

8vo, 12s. net.

A PLURALISTIC UNIVERSE.

8vo, 5s. 6d. net.

THE WILL TO BELIEVE, and other Essays.

Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

SOME PROBLEMS OF PHILOSOPHY.

8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

MEMORIES AND STUDIES: A Selection of Essays and Addresses.

8vo, 6s. 6d. net.

PRAGMATISM:

A New Name for Some Old Ways of Thinking.

8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

THE MEANING OF TRUTH: A Sequel to "Pragmatism."

8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

TALKS TO TEACHERS

on Psychology, and to Students on Some of Life's Ideals.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

WILLIAM JAMES. By EMILE
BOUTROUX, Membre de l'Institut.
Authorised Translation by ARCHIBALD and BARBARA HENDERSON. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"As a concise study of the personality and work of the famous American psychologist, M. Beutroux's book will be welcomed by a large circle in England."—Christian World.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.,
39, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

New Work by the Author of "The Christ Myth."

WITNESSES TO THE HISTORICITY OF JESUS.

By Professor ARTHUR DREWS,
Ph.D., Author of "The Christ Myth."
328 pp.; cloth, 6s. net, by post,
6s. 5d.

This new work by the author of "The Christ Myth" has been translated by Joseph McCabe. The question whether there ever was such an historical personage as the Jesus of the Gospels is occupying an increasing share of attention. The negative position was regarded as a freak of scepticism a hundred years ago, but is now gaining serious attention. Professor Drews is quite a storm-centre in Germany, and in this work he makes a comprehensive and very effective reply to his critics. His treatise wisely takes the form of a thorough and complete examination of all the supposed evidence for the historicity of Christ, whether in the New Testament or in pagan or Jewish writers. The book is written with great spirit as well as remarkable command of the subject, and drastically exposes the weaknesses of the leading liberal theologians.

ANOTHER WONDERFUL 6d. ISSUE.

(By post, 8d.)

THE KINGDOM OF MAN.

By Sir RAY LANKESTER. New edition, unabridged, 128 large pp.,
56 striking Illustrations, and portrait of Author.

PENALTIES UPON OPINION; or, Some Records of the Laws of Heresy and Blasphemy.

By HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER.
128 pp., cr. 8vo; cloth, 1s. net, by post 1s. 3d.; in paper cover, 6d.
net, by post 8d.

Contains a stirring account of the various prosecutions for heresy from the year 1378 onwards.

"Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner has here with much assiduity compiled a list of legal prosecutions relating to 'offences against religion'; thus exposing and throwing into perspective the whole course of the penalties imposed upon heresy, for the suppression of free opinion and the principles of religious liberty. She carries her inquiry from early mediæval times up to the present. For ready reference to enactments otherwise practically inaccessible her work serves an extremely useful end. It is written with much force, and under stress of indignation against mis-carriage of justice."—Athenæum.

FREE ON RECEIPT OF POSTCARD.

Copy of "LITERARY GUIDE" (16 large pages), with complete Catalogue, &c.

London: WATTS & CO.,
Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, E.C.

IMPORTANT NEW WORK.

Eucken & Bergson

Their Significance for Christian Thought.

By E. HERMANN.

Crown 8vo, Cloth boards, 2s. 6d. net.

"This is a worthy product of the latest movement in religious thought. Mrs. Hermann's presentation of Christianity, in regard to fundamental matters, is stimulating and full of insight."—Athenæum.

"A study marked by ability."—Times.

JAMES CLARKE & Co., 13 & 14, FLEET ST., LONDON.

NEW BOOKS NOW READY

Crown 8vo, 140 pp., with Portrait.

1s. 6d. net, postage 8d.

COMMUNINGS WITH THE FATHER. Collects and Prayers.

By JAMES C. STREET.

Introduction by CHRISTOPHER J. STREET, M.A.

There are many for whom these pages will glow with precious memories. They will recall with thankfulness the spiritual leader, the great preacher, the faithful minister, whose influence on their lives is sacred and imperishable. Among others, who knew him not, there must still be many to whom the devotional outpourings of a simple heart and faith will come with quickening power.

Fcap. 8vo, 130 pp., with Portrait. 1s. net, postage 2d.

MAN'S CHIEF END, and other Sermons.

By R. B. DRUMMOND, B.A., T.C.D.

This small volume contains a selection of sermons made by Mr. Drummond from a ministry of upwards of fifty years in the city of Edinburgh.

Fcap. 8vo, 128 pp. 1s. net, postage 2d.

HOW A MODERN ATHEIST FOUND GOD.

By G. A. FERGUSON.

It describes the way in which a positive Atheist, step by step, and by reason alone, was compelled to abandon that position for a glorious, unshakable faith in the infinite truth, love, and goodness of God.

Crown 8vo, 272 pp. 2s. 6d. net. Postage 3d.

THE CHURCH OF TO-MORROW.

By JOSEPH H. CROOKER, D.D.

CONTENTS:—I. The Method of the Church: Diversity of Form with Unity of Spirit. II. Its Task: Feeding the Roots of Life. III. Its Thought of God: The Tap-Root of Religion. IV. Its Worship: The Fruitfulness of Prayer. V. Its Pulpit: The Voice of the Moral Ideal.
VI. Its Pews: The Congregation at Work.

Crown 8vo, 164 pp. Photogravure Portrait. 2s. 6d. net.
Postage 4d.

THOUGHTS FOR DAILY LIVING.

From the Spoken and Written Words of

ROBERT COLLYER, Litt.D.

Dr. Collyer shows how the problem, common to us all, of making life fair may be solved, how burdens may be borne and sorrows in some measure lightened. For the inevitable failures he is always ready with the tonic of hope and love to brace us to fresh endeavours.

The Lindsey Press, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

TO WORKERS AMONG BOYS

At the ANNUAL COUNCIL MEETING of the BOYS' OWN BRIGADE, to be held at ESSEX
HALL, on MONDAY, JUNE 17, at 7.45 p.m.,
Mr. J. HOWARD WHITEHOUSE, M.P. (Secretary of the National League for Workers among Boys), will give an ADDRESS. All interested will be heartily welcomed.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, June 9.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. J. A. PEARSON.
 Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.
 Child's Hill, All Souls', Weech-road, Finchley-road, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. E. DAPLYN.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D. Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11 and 7, Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN, M.A.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Mr. S. FIELD; 6.30, Rev. JOHN ELLIS.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, M.A.; 7, Rev. W. H. ROSE.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15, Rev. Dr. CROthers; 6.30, Rev. H. GOW, B.A.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. T. DAVENPORT BACON, of Salem, U.S.A.
 Ilford, High-road, 11 and 7, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Rev. Dr. TUDOR JONES.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11 and 6.30, Rev. F. HANKINSON.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 and 7, Rev. C. ROPER, B.A.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. GORDON COOPER.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. W. ROBSON, B.D.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. F. W. G. FOAT, Litt.D., M.A.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLOR.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Rev. JOHN ELLIS; 6.30, Mr. STANLEY P. PENWARDEN.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C., 11.15 and 7, Rev. Dr. S. H. MELLONE.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Mr. FRED MADDISON.
 Wimbledon, 27b, Merton-road, 7, Mr. WM. LEE, B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11, Rev. JOSEPH WILSON.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. FRED BROCKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30. Supply.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. WOOD.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. W. AUSTIN, M.A.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. BODELL SMITH.
 BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45, Scholars' Service; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.

BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. V. D. DAVIS.
 BRIDFORD, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, M.A.
 BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.
 BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. GEORGE WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CAMBRIDGE, Assembly Hall, Downing-street, 11.30, Rev. E. W. LUMMIS, M.A.
 CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. S. HURN.
 (DEAN ROW, 10.45 and STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A.)
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11, Rev. H. E. DOWSON; 6.30, Rev. E. H. PICKERING.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS.
 HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, School Services, Rev. E. G. EVANS, M.A., of Dukinfield.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. JAMES DRUMMOND, LL.D., Litt.D.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. CHARLES CRADDOCK.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. D. ROBERTS.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 and 6.30, Rev. STANLEY A. MELLOR, Ph.D.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. DOUGLAS WALMSLEY, B.A., of Windermere.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, Rusholme, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WHITAKER.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. ALEXANDER FARQUHARSON.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. ALFRED HALL, M.A.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Prof. G. DAVES HICKS.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVERS.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. JAMES HARWOOD, B.A.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. NICOL CROSS, M.A.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. B. STALLWORTHY.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hong-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

BIRTHS.

CLARE.—On June 2, at 38, Cranbrook-avenue, Newland, Hull, to Rev. and Mrs. Lawrence Clare, a daughter.
 SHORT.—On June 3, at 22, Gloucester-avenue, Blackpool, to the Rev. J. Horace and Mrs. Short, a daughter.

DEATHS.

EVANS.—On June 3, at Chorley-road, Swinton, Elizabeth, wife of John Evans, in her 78th year. Also, on June 4, the above John Evans, in his 83rd year. Both interred on Thursday, June 6, at the Unitarian Chapel, Swinton.
 JECKS.—On May 30, at 33, Richmond-terrace, Clifton, Bristol, after a long and painful illness, borne with the utmost patience, Charles Jecks, in his 86th year.
 TYNDALL.—On June 2, at 203, Hagley-road, Edgbaston, Edward Lant Tyndall, aged 71 years.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

FRUIT GROWING.—Vacancy occurs for a Pupil on a Fruit Farm and Market Garden. — RYLAND, Radford Nurseries, Leamington.

TYPEWRITING.

SERMONS, ARTICLES, and MS. of every description accurately typed. Is. per thousand words. Price List on application.—Miss KENNEDY, 21, Cheverton-road, Hornsey-lane, N.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	2	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	387	CORRESPONDENCE :—		The Jubilee Celebration at Rosslyn Hill Chapel	395
THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT :—		The History of Rosslyn Hill Chapel	391	The British League of Unitarian Women	396
This Generation	388	FOR THE CHILDREN	391	The Present Tendencies of Religious Thought in Italy	397
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS :—		MEMORIAL NOTICE :—		Announcements	399
Pat the Boy	390	Mr. Edward Lant Tyndall	392	NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	399
Some Sark Methodists	390	MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES :—
		British and Foreign Unitarian Association	392

 All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Jubilee of the present building of the Rosslyn Hill Chapel provided the occasion for a most interesting series of gatherings on Wednesday last. A large number of past and present members of the congregation assembled at the impressive service when the sermon was preached by Principal Estlin Carpenter, and remained for the evening meeting, at which Dr. Drummond was the chief speaker. Many friends also were present to add their congratulations on the attainment of another stage in a long and honourable history of patient, persistent, unadvertised effort, often carried on in the midst of misunderstanding or even misrepresentation. The worshipful spirit which pervades the Sunday services, the extraordinarily large proportion of the congregation who are engaged in useful public work, the universal respect in which the present minister is held, and the affection with which he is regarded by those who know him best, are noticeable features in the life of a church whose vigour and prosperity owe nothing to the baser arts of advertisement which sometimes creep into methods of church management. We could wish that the records of old-standing foundations like the Rosslyn Hill Chapel, which have toiled and suffered in the cause of religious freedom, could be gathered together in permanent form as a noteworthy chapter in the history of the emancipation of the spirit.

* * *

By kind invitation of the Hampstead Congregation, the London Ministers of the Liberal Christian Fellowship took part in the interesting celebration. Opportunity was taken to read to them at a special afternoon gathering of their own, a paper prepared by the Rev. Jas. Harwood on the history of "The body of Presbyterian ministers in and about London and Westminster," of which they are successors in unbroken line. This body has had the privilege, which has never, we believe, been allowed to lapse, of directly approaching the Sovereign on certain occasions. It appears, then, that some of the Liberal Christian Clergy, so far from being modern revolutionary upstarts, have a pedigree stretching back to a hoary antiquity, noted for its loyalty to the Constitution and the Throne.

* * *

MR. THOMAS HARDY was presented on his seventy-second birthday with the gold medal of the Royal Society of Literature by Mr. Henry Newbolt and Mr. W. B. Yeats, who were staying with him at Dorchester for the occasion. In his reply, Mr. Hardy spoke of the indifference to literary form and the lack of an appreciation of what is real literature, which characterises the majority of people to-day in spite of the fact that millions have lately been learning to read. "There is, as a result, an appalling increase every day in slipshod writing that would not have been tolerated for one moment a hundred years ago." The newspapers, with their hurried reports, and the influx of American journals, fearfully and wonderfully worded, have had much to do with this state of things, and therefore "every kind of award, prize, or grant which urges omnivorous readers and incipient writers towards appreciating the splendours of English undefiled, and the desire of producing such for themselves, is of immense value."

* * *

"I KNOW that it is said in Fleet-street that poetry is dead," Mr. Hardy continued. "But this only means that it is dead in Fleet-street. Poetry itself cannot die, as George Sand once eloquently wrote in her novel called 'André.' I cannot do better than wind up these rambling remarks with some of her words on this question :—' Poesy cannot die. Should she find for refuge but the brain of a single man she would yet have centuries of life, for she would leap out of it like the lava from Vesuvius and mark out a way for herself among the most prosaic realities. Despite her overturned temples and the false gods adored among their ruins, she is immortal as the perfume of the flowers and the splendour of the skies.'

* * *

THE public meeting in Caxton Hall, over which Mr. John Burns presided, on Tuesday afternoon last, was remarkable in several respects. Called together for the formation of an association which should have as its aims the prevention of infantile mortality and the promotion of the welfare of children under school age, it had the support of leading men of both the older political parties, of eminent physicians like Sir Lauder Brunton and Sir Thomas Barlow, and able administrators like Alderman Broadbent, of Huddersfield. Mr. Burns, in his opening address, stated that the rate of infant mortality which in 1904 was 145 per 1,000, had been reduced in six years to 106 per 1,000, i.e., 30 per cent., and hoped—though this was perhaps but his superabundant optimism—that in three more years the maximum rate might be reduced to 100 per 1,000, and the average to 75. The important feature of the conference was the unanimous feeling of both platform and audience, first, that infantile mortality is largely preventible and therefore ought to be prevented; and, second, that this particular problem, and the same may be said of every other social problem, cannot be isolated and treated piecemeal. It can only be overcome by the co-operation of a great number of agencies which are working upon or working against various causes of a many-sided evil.

* * *

It was fitting that Manchester, which has suffered more from tuberculosis than any other city in the kingdom, should be the meeting place of the fourth annual conference for the Prevention of Consumption and other forms of Tuberculosis. Dr. E. W. Hope, Liverpool's able and distinguished medical officer of health, presided over about 600 delegates, representing the principal municipal authorities in the United Kingdom. "The great decline which had taken place in the death-rate from tuberculous disease, was," he said, as reported by a medical correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, "coincident with great sanitary undertakings, especially the municipal schemes for the supply of pure water to large cities. But the most important reform was the improvement of housing conditions, for without sufficient pure air in the homes of the people consumption would not be eradicated." Other factors making towards a solution of the problem would be the provision of a pure milk supply, the improvement of school hygiene, and the education of the general public on the question.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT

THIS GENERATION.*

By SAMUEL M. CROTHERS, D.D.

Jesus said: "Whereunto shall I liken this generation? It is like children sitting in the market places, and calling unto their fellows, we have piped unto you and ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented."—MATT. xi. 15-17.

THIS generation—that always means in living speech not the generation which has already done its work and formulated its thought, not the generation that already is known in the world, but the generation that at this particular moment is coming upon the scene. The greatest difficulty which the religious teacher has in speaking to this generation is to make the great eternal message of religion strictly contemporaneous—from generation to generation the voice of the fathers to the children. So from age to age a gospel is proclaimed, a church maintained, a civilisation wrought and accomplished. But the great difficulty lies in this fact, that the generation which comes upon the scene invariably distrusts the generation that is just passing away, for we are always just emerging from the dark ages, and we are comparing the new light with that darkness in the past.

We understand and appreciate the wisdom of a remote past much more than we understand and appreciate the wisdom of our own immediate past. So we have history continually repeating itself, one generation rebelling against the thought of the generation that immediately preceded it. In the sixteenth century men cast utter contempt upon all the scholasticism and philosophy of the ages that preceded them. When they would invent a synonym for "fool" they simply took the most esteemed school men of the old order and coined the new word "dunce." In the next generation Thomas Fuller tells us that the sixteenth century was looked upon as altogether overrated; its enthusiasm was no longer shared by the enlightened seventeenth century, and, he says, "the price of martyrs' ashes has fallen in our days in Smithfield Market." A little while later Alexander Pope wrote:

"We think our fathers fools, so wise we grow;
Our wiser sons perhaps will think us so,"— and he need not have said "perhaps." It was in the order of nature. A generation after everyone discovered that Alexander Pope was a much over-rated poet. The whole literature of the nineteenth century is filled with terms of contempt for the eighteenth century, which was looked upon as an age of artificiality. Now that the twentieth century is upon us we realise that history repeats itself, and the nineteenth century stands as the culprit at the bar. Clever persons have invented a new term of reproach. The word "mid-Victorian" expresses all that men of light and leading ought to turn from. The enthusiasm, the hope, the thought of the nineteenth century are brought to judgment, and to us of the liberal faith who remember what we owe to that great period in human history it is somewhat disconcerting to realise that a new generation has come to consciousness of itself, and that much that was most characteristic of what we have considered a great age of progress is being judged by new standards. We are told that the standard of the nineteenth century liberalism, both political and religious, was hopelessly commonplace, that it was a time of material progress and of superficial thought and feeling, a time of blind optimism. Men believed that through true forces already discovered the great culmination of history had come.

I am not here to defend a past generation, nor am I here to criticise a coming generation. I believe that on the whole we are coming, and the new generation is coming, to a deeper and truer attitude towards life in regard to many questions. But, on the other hand, there is one drawback and one difficulty which to-day in addressing the new generation often seems to paralyse teachers who believe in freedom and at the same time believe in religion. There is a characteristic of fashionable thought and fashionable literature and philosophy of our day which is deeply affecting the new generation, a type of scepticism differing from that of the generation which is just passing away. We have had scepticism in regard to religion and to philosophy, scepticism in regard to the Bible, scepticism in regard to this dogma or that, we have investigations which often seem to bring results that are amazing to simple people; but after all, when we look at the men of the past generation, those who did the work and those who were recognised as the leaders, we find in them all one characteristic, and that was faith in themselves. Whether they were dogmatists, traditionalists, radicals, men of that generation which wrought so valiantly believed in human effort. If we are strong enough, if we are free enough, if we are good enough, in other words, if we put enough of ourselves into our work, they thought, we shall see the result which we hope for, and out of that self-reliant age there came mighty works which have made the past generation memorable. Now if you will read the novel, the essay, listen to the play, or to the conversation of young men in the universities you will find a different attitude, not towards one subject alone, but towards life in general. This is the fashionable attitude. We are here in an unintelligible world, a world of mighty forces moving we know not whither; we ourselves are moving from without, we are subject to passion and to impulse, we are capable of enthusiasm, even of religious enthusiasm, but in our day we have for the first time learnt the lesson of disillusion. We have learnt it does not very much matter what we do. The great material forces that are around us are too great for us; they have wrought our present civilisation and they are rapidly unmaking it. We see around us great empires, we see how their history came thus far; we are watching now with trained eye the disillusion of it all. The world itself does not answer to our ideals of righteousness, of justice, and of happiness.

We talk of the great army of the unemployed, men standing in chronic idleness because they will not take the kind of work which comes to them. They are all the time grumbling because they cannot find anything else. There is also an increasing class in every civilised community whom I would call the spiritually unemployed. The spiritually unemployed are generally after a time the spiritually unemployable. They criticise every good work, they show the futility of this or that, but they seem somehow incapable of throwing themselves wholeheartedly and gladly into the hard, necessary constructive work of the world. They think of themselves as superior to the dull plodding every-day people who are using all their powers to do something for the great task of humanity. Now every preacher of religion and every church is confronted primarily with this problem of the spiritually unemployed. We all of us know that in every city in the civilised world there is enough moral and spiritual power to remedy the evils that are around, to do the work that needs to be done, and do it nobly. The question for us is how to convince this generation, or, in other words, how to convince every young man and young woman who are now facing life to give up the attitude of moral indifference, to transform the attitude of criticism and of despair into a glad constructive work for God and Man.

Now, I think, the first thing for us as believers in religious effort is to change our own attitude. Cease to apologise for religion, cease to apologise for God, to apologise for effort, and make men see themselves as they are. Let us face this cynical, disillusioned man who tells us that all the effort of the world up till now has failed, and that he does not see how anything that he can do will make it otherwise. Ask him this simple question: What do you mean by saying that the well-meant effort of mankind after ideal perfection has failed? And he will give you his idea of perfection, and then contrast with that ideal the existing world. "This is my conception," he says, "of what the world would be if the hypothesis of God were proved in action, this is the kind of religion that we should have if the church and the individual had availed. Show me my conception of God and I will work. Show me my ideal of a church and I will join it. Show me my conception of ideal society and I will change my present despair to hope and appreciation." That is the attitude of the man whom someone has described as a Sadducee asking his way to Utopia. He will never find it. What shall we say to him? I think we must say when that attitude appears in our generation just what Jesus said of the same attitude in his generation. What he said was, "I think that attitude is very childish." Then he told them a story. It seems to me, he said, that people who talk and act that way are like children whom you may see any day playing in the market-place; there is childish expectation quickly giving way to childish petulance and recrimination. One child says, "Let us play that this is a feast, let us play that this is a wedding, and I will set the tune and I will pipe; now do you dance to my piping," or "Let us play that it is a funeral; I will wail; now do you all beat your breasts to my wailing." First the child formulates his childish will, and then, when the others do not follow, he will have nothing more to do with him; it is all failure, it is all loss.

* Preached at Essex Church, Kensington, on Tuesday evening, May 28th, 1912, in connection with the Anniversary Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

Now as I read the clever pessimistic books of our own time, they seem to give the last sad word of the expiring human intellect in regard to life, and I say to myself, "how childish, how lacking in manly faith and breadth and reason, how lacking in everything which comes from the experience of a strong soul." And I believe that we best meet the peculiar weakness of our own age and generation when we recognise it not as within us, but as beneath us, and as inexperience. Have you never read the wail about the bankruptcy of faith? What does that mean? The man pictures an age of beautiful childlike faith. That is his conception of religion; and when he has idealised that faith in childish style, he proceeds to contrast it with the actual course of human history, showing how in the course of human events one generation after another has come, and that particular form of faith has vanished before advancing science and before the growing intelligence of mankind. Alas! alas! God and immortality and the beautiful life are vanished now for ever! For us in these last days there remains nothing but to sit by the embers of a dead religion! Then he goes on to tell of the human intellect itself, and you may read of the bankruptcy of science. Modern science came with great expectations. It was to solve our problems and to soothe our souls. Door after door has been opened, fact after fact, law after law discovered, and still the human heart is forlorn, and the questions are not answered. He turns to the eager practical philanthropist and reformer in the same sad way. You started out, did you not, to bring in brotherhood and liberty and peace? One measure after another you passed for the amelioration of human ills, you gave yourself with enthusiasm to these works, and now see what has come of it. Because of your philanthropy, because of your enthusiasm there has come discontent, class hatred, all sorts of evils. Paralysis of business has come because of your efforts, or in spite of faith; but what is clear is that your efforts have failed. Long ago and through centuries the Christian Church has preached peace on earth—what is the use of it? See where we are to-day! So in the modern market-place the spoiled children of civilisation and the spoiled children of Christian idealism lament and repine and quarrel with the world they need.

Is it not necessary for us to strike everywhere and always a manlier note? And is not that what we, who believe in the progress and the general tendency of modern civilisation, of religion and of science, should utter—the note, not of apology, but of acceptance of our ideals, and also of the conditions under which those ideals are to be realised? The true man of science makes no apology for science when one comes to him and tells him that these expectations that we have had in regard to the things which science was to establish have not been fulfilled, and that therefore science is bankrupt. The man of science simply says, "My friend, did it ever occur to you that you do not know what science means? It does not mean the confirmation of some pre-conceived idea which you may have or which I may have; it is impersonal. It is no respecter of persons. It succeeds, and it only succeeds in proportion as it reveals the truth which already exists, and that truth did not wait for us to approve. Science is but the acceptance of the things by reason discovered. I do not know beforehand the facts; I follow on, I see, I accept, I apply." Now is not that attitude possible for us in religion, and is it not the only strong and appealing attitude as the generations come and go? Religion is not a theory about the world. It is not a theory about God, it is not a kind of spiritual whim that we wish to affirm, it is not what we would expect. It is the reaction of our souls towards all the powers in the universe as they are revealed unto ourselves. What is truth? What are the facts of history? What are the possibilities of experience? What is the destiny before us? A man of religion once free stands with an absolute humility before the spiritual universe and the moral universe, just as the man of science stands with absolute humility before the material world. Then in that attitude of manly persevering patient effort he believes that to-day, as in all the days, answering unto man's endeavour, truth and right are still revealed answering unto our endeavour. We expect no other answer than that; we expect nothing to come to us unearned.

We do expect a great revelation through increasing effort. We dare not praise any more than the old Puritan did a fugitive and cloistered virtue. We do not ask before we have done the task to receive the reward. We do not ask before we have studied to learn the lesson; but we do ask, as every manly man must ask, "the wages of going on."

Here we stand—let the pessimist and the cynic say what he will—we men and women throughout the wide world, after all these ages of effort of strife, of spiritual effort, after all that has been done for us by saints and prophets and heroes; here we stand as we are. You need not tell us, we know too well our weakness, our selfishness, our crudeness; we know full well how far from perfection humanity is to-day; but we know also how far we are from chaos and black night, how far we have gone from the brutal instincts of primitive man. Humanity has gone far enough for us to trace its direction, to measure in some ways its slow progress, and to look forward to a distant goal. The way we know, how hard, how long; the wayfarers we know, those in the past who have stumbled and fallen, those who are stumbling and falling still. But religion is going on towards that far light, it is going towards that ideal, it is arming itself with courage, inspiring the weak with hope, and quickening the soul with love. It is towards this generation that all those forces must go out to-day as the same forces have gone out in the past. The question is not whether this world corresponds to our pre-conceived notions of what it ought to do, it is whether this world is a world in which our effort is continually put forth in a manly way. It is clear, if nothing else is clear, that all we have is the result of effort, and that no dream that ever entered into prophet's or poet's soul can be fulfilled except through increasing effort. Our religion is not a palliative, it is not an apology; it is a challenge, a challenge to the world's need to reach souls that must answer it. The question is not whether this world conforms to our idea of it, or whether we are to conform to the world; it is deeper and more difficult than that. Do not accept the axiom as your motto "be not conformed to this world," but "be ye transformed," facing the world as it actually is. Be transformed until you feel yourself to be a creative power, until you feel yourself strong enough to grapple with the world and change it. No easy task that! No task to be finished in one generation! It is the eternal task of the soul of man. Be transformed by the renewing of your minds that ye may know, not now, but at last, what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God.

Cannot the man of religion face this new world, strange, bewildering, threatening, full of new unsolved problems, in that spirit? I do not know to-day the solution of those problems, I do not know the meaning of it all; but I do know this, that I am here, not to be passive, not to be blown about by every wind, not to yield to every danger; I am here as God's child, God's agent, a creative force, a divine will moving towards higher ends. I am here to transform this world not in accordance with my will but in accordance with a divine ideal revealed to me progressively by my endeavour. Each day must bring new problems, new difficulties, new doubts; but to each day there comes a new mind. I will learn the lesson of to-day so as to meet to-morrow's danger more wisely; I may, through my defeat to-day take on new courage and patience for to-morrow's battle. Day by day is revealed to me the deeper meaning of human life, and not now, but some time there shall be revealed the blessed mystery of it all. Some time when we have earned it, when we are ready for it, when our souls shall become more transparent, when we have learned through a thousand failures and blunders, then shall come the revealing; not now, but then, shall we know what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

PAT THE BOY.

IN Ireland it is the custom to speak of unmarried folk, of whatever age, as "boys" or "girls," according, of course, to circumstances. Thus, I remember hearing it said of a certain family: "The last of the girls there was over eighty, and she always . . ." &c.

Pat Kinsella never married, and therefore, even when he was old and past his work, he was still "a boy." But, in addition, he never did grow old; the real Pat, that is. He remained a boy at heart, through a long life of farm labour. He was a small, wiry creature, with a look in his wrinkled old face half whimsical, half wistful; as if somehow he felt that Fate had possibly a knock-down blow in store for him, but also that he was gaily determined to ignore her threatening aspect as long as he well could. Some school of modern thought bids us "deny" all manner of evils, because by doing so we cause them to disappear. All unconsciously, Pat put this principle into practice. And thus it never grieved him that his clothes were too miserably thin to keep out cold and wet, or that his "dinner" as often as not consisted of a hunch of dry bread, nothing else. He never complained of these things, or of the pains that "had him so bet up" that he was glad to humour his stiff leg by letting himself limp comfortably, if he thought no one was looking at him. Within sight of the Big House, however, Pat would make gallant efforts at an even pace. No master wants a lame worker; at least, generally speaking they don't. But Himself was different; I mean Pat's employer. To be sure, being human, he was sometimes irritated by Pat, who, one must admit, was given to cracking jokes at the most critical phases of seeding or harvest.

"It's not so much that Pat doesn't work himself, I'm used to that," the master would say, "but he delays the others; the idle man thwarts the worker."

And still, when it happened that Pat didn't appear, one lovely June day, with the meadows just ripe for cutting, the master strode off himself to the little cabin where Pat lived with a married brother, and ordered him sternly to "come back out of that, and none of your nonsense! We can't do without you, man alive!"

So Pat came back. There were hay-ropes to be made, and he was a past-master at this pleasant work, and you can sit at it. Pat's deft old hands seemed fairly to twinkle as they twisted together the meadow grass and buttercups, and purple clover-blossoms, into firm ropes for securing the hay-cocks from wind. He would make dozens of them, and not a pin, at least, not a particle in length or weight, to choose among them. Marcella Toole "fed" the hay to him, from a loose, fragrant heap left for the purpose. They two sat together in a corner of the hay-field under a big tree. Marcella was rather idle too, but pleasant to behold, and of ready speech. I think Pat liked to look at her as they worked thus in partnership. She might have been his daughter, but then, as I have said, Pat remained a boy at heart. He may have had dreams of the might-have-been, like the rest of us. And Pat had imagination. No one relished more than he did the "lind" of a book from the shelf devoted to that purpose at the Big House. Pat had had no "schooling," but his sister-in-law used to read aloud often till the wee sma' hours. A favourite was "Rory O'More."

As time went on, in spite of the master, Pat couldn't come to work any more. So he put in the days as well as he could, doing odd jobs about the cabin for the woman of the house—a bit of thatching, or weeding, or collecting firing.

"The best feather in her wing he is, the same Pat! lame and all as he is!" the neighbours would say, for they all had a kindly corner in their hearts for him. Still, Pat found the days long and lonesome. The holidays—they come pretty often in rural Ireland—were the worst. All the rest would have gone off—Pat would be looking were the potatoes up. "You're better off at home," said the master to Pat on one of these occasions, "and not to be going off and taking drink. . . ."

"Sure, how could I?" quoth Pat, regretfully. And if the master slipped some money into his hand then, it was, he said, to buy tobacco; and anyway, thus he solaced his conscience, "Pat is not likely to get into bad habits now!"

He hadn't the chance. Not long after, word went round the quiet, lonely road, that Pat was "lyin'"; in bed, that was; then, that the doctor had said, you couldn't depend on him a minute; then, that the priest had been with Pat; that he was "working his passage hard"; and wouldn't he be better off to be dead, and looking up at a board?

But Pat lay in bed, and smiled up at the master when he came to see his old friend, and to ask him if he "wanted anything?" with an uneasy sense of saying superfluous things.

"Och, the sorra ha'porth!" quoth Pat; and after a moment added, in a voice so weak that the master had to stoop to catch it, "that Rory was a pure nut!" with a twinkle in his tired eyes.

The master was puzzled. Was Pat raving? Then he remembered the book; remembered, too, that "nuts" in Irish legend are symbolic of many things. Irish dialect of to-day is full of such quaint survivals. "Hurry and get well, or we'll have the hay saved without you!"

"And grand weather its meeting, glory be to God!" whispered Pat; "but I'll never twist another rope in the Big Meadow!"

A lump rose in the master's throat. His life would go on; it was not a very gay one, and Pat had often enlivened it; it would lose flavour without him.

He looked back from the door, to say, "Good-bye, Pat!"

"Good-bye, your Honour; and I wish you 'safe home,' like meself!"

"To the heavenly mansions!" thought the master, as Pat dropped the beads he was telling to smile again, a boy at heart to the end.

SOME SARK METHODISTS.

METHODISM in the Channel Isles is not a new subject, but as the years pass the characters connected with the life of the chapel naturally change and call for comment and interest. At one period in the history of the Methodist chapel in Sark there were many (some still living) members whose personality was distinctly outstanding, and it is of these I would write, and of their simple life with its few interests beyond the great things that happen to all humanity—the joy and agony of motherhood, the fairy world of childhood, the romance of courtship, the heights and depths of marriage, the strenuousness of work, the battle with Nature, the creeping of age, the sleeping well after "life's fitful fever."

At the time about which I would write there was, first of all, connected with the Sark chapel the very original evangelist who was in charge. He came from another place, and had worked for a time in London under a well-known social reformer, who had much appreciated the character he had had to deal with. But finding that extreme reformers did not love their neighbours more than ordinary people did, for our evangelist did not allow enough for mere human nature, he returned to the islands and fell in with the proposal that he should undertake Sark. His personal appearance proclaimed him at once as unusual in character. He was tall and well knit, and he walked with a swing and a freedom of action which meant energy. His face was thin, with the least touch of asceticism, having an excellent forehead, a hawk-like nose, a mobile mouth, and large, dreamy blue eyes. His hands were quite notably fine. This personality played its full part in his preaching, in which he was a serious artist, if one may put it so. His genius had taught him, unconsciously to himself, the use of gesture with hands that spoke a graphic language of their own; and with entire restraint, yet with impassioned action and dramatic voice, he spoke the message he had to give the Sark people. This message was stern as well as tender; and it struck at the root of sins which are, perhaps, peculiarly difficult for an island race to combat; it was a wild, free, adventurous people he dealt with, people like the winter seas that so often exile Sark even from Guernsey; and yet people whose natures harbour all kinds of lovely things, such as an almost perfect neighbourliness, a deep love for children, and a sure help in time of great need.

So the evangelist delivered his message—fearless, kind, scathing, healing; and he was rewarded by the honour and affection of the community and the clinging love of the children. He was a regular visitor in all the little homesteads, besides taking up a crusade which meant the building of a reading and recreation room for the fishermen.

It is not possible to draw pictures of all the interesting people in his congregation. But one or two can be sketched in few lines. One we may call "The Old Saint." He was very, very aged and bowed, and his soft hair fell in silvery waves almost to his shoulders; his chiselled features, though, worn and almost transparent, were exquisite in modelling and gently patient in expression. He was a very beautiful character; and one wondered how he had managed to get such a duchess-like, languishing wife, with, however, quite a keen blue eye. She was tall and upright, and very much the mistress, and she gloried in the almost religious recitation of her many maladies.

Then there was a delightful family of tall, good-looking people. The father was a fisherman, fair, yellow-bearded, blue-eyed; a clean, wholesome looking man, who was a first-rate sailor and a most amusing person to take one round the island in his boat. He had a gift for acting, and never failed to give the correct intonation and the correct gestures of the people he mentioned in his reminiscences; but, like the evangelist, he was quite unconscious of his gift. It was delightful to hear the gentle sparring that went on between his wife and himself; it was like the play between two children, in reality devoted to each other, but pretending to play at quarrelling. Their three handsome sons were true, fair, blue-eyed Normans, inheriting the special height and long build of their mother, whose Madonna-like face was indicative of a most sensitive nature, inherited specially by the eldest son, deep and tender-hearted. The two others were, perhaps, more daring in mental attitude; but all three were noted fine fellows in boats and useful members of the community.

The organist was a true type of most womanly womanhood, the well-built, pleasant looking wife of a very successful fisherman. To see her at home in her neat blouse with little lace collar, going skilfully about her work, cooking or needle-craft, was to refresh one's eyes, and her house was the perfection of neatness and comfort. Small wonder if her rooms were always let, winter and summer. Her mother, who lived with her, was over seventy, and there was not a streak of grey in her raven black hair. Her blue eyes, set in the winter apple texture of a small, piquant face, were homes of innocent mischief; and her charming mixture of patois and English talk was a perennial source of delight to the visitors she waited upon.

The organist played exceedingly well in her self-contained and dignified simplicity, and the hearty singing of her choir did her much credit, for they sang the fine French hymns with their mostly sad tunes with expression, as well as with correctness.

Then there was the man with a history of tragedy and loss in his home, of sudden, illuminating conversion, of a devoted friendship to the evangelist. He was a devout student of the Bible, and his English speech evidenced this, in its easy and constant use of graphic metaphor and simile.

Farming was represented by a shy and reliable young man and his refined wife, who lived in an old-world thatched cottage where fuchsias grew higher than the roof.

The building in which these people gather for their worship is whitewashed, bare, and afflicted with a gallery. But it throbs with memories of the past, when it knew the men of early Methodism, the immediate followers of John Wesley, men persecuted and on fire with zeal. It knew the days when, instead of the gallery, two chambrettes formed the home of the ministers or "locals" who went over from Guernsey to hold services, and who had rough times crossing in the cutter and rough times in the island in those times when Methodists were a by-word and fair game.

One's own relations tell of the days when the chapel had old, unvarnished pews, with stands for candles, which were snuffed and often put out, to the great delight of children! And one hears, too, of a choir of old men and women, elevated on a rickety platform beside the pulpit; and as they crooned and quavered out the grotesque old tunes, they swayed backwards and forwards in religious ecstasy.

But the Sark people, past and present, are a fine example of a primitive and yet persisting race in their characteristics, faults as well as virtues. In them is the fierce love and hatred of a sea-girt people; in them is the depth and tenacity learnt from constant struggle with Nature; and I will close this article with one last portrait which sums up the island spirit well, for he lives still, and is well known. His fine head and broad forehead speak of his intelligence; his deep-set eyes and reserved expression hint of a hidden wealth of feeling; his mode of thought is religiously philosophic, lightened by quaint humour. He is a picturesque figure with his long white beard, more like a character from the Old Testament than anything else in his ways of looking at life and the whole bearing of his personality.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE HISTORY OF ROSSLYN HILL CHAPEL.

SIR,—In the account of the history of the Rossllyn Hill Chapel in THE INQUIRER of June 1 is a slight error which may be worth correcting.

The Rev. Thos. Woodcock, the first minister of whom we have any knowledge, was the first cousin (not the husband of the cousin) of Catherine Woodcock, Milton's "late espoused saint." This Thomas Woodcock was the son of the Rev. Thos. Woodcock, who was ejected in 1662 from the living of St. Andrew Undershaft. He was a learned man of good family and means, was Fellow of Jesus College, and Proctor of the University of Cambridge.*

There are also some small inaccuracies in the spelling of the names of those present fifty years ago.—Yours, &c.,

E. L. LISTER.

Hampstead, N.W., June 4, 1912.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS:—The Revolutionary Function of the Modern Church: John Haynes Holmes. 6s. net.

MESSRS. G. ROUTLEDGE & SONS, LTD.:—The Flower of English Poetry: Robinson Smith. 2s. 6d. net.

MESSRS. VON VEIT & Co. (Leipzig):—Der Wahrheitsgehalt der Religion: Rudolf Eucken. 9 mk.

MESSRS. WATTS & Co.:—The Witnesses to the Historicity of Jesus: Arthur Drews, Ph.D. 6s. net.

MESSRS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE:—Pharisaism: R. Travers Herford, B.A. 5s. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Vineyard.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

OBEDIENCE.

II.

As a rule, when we hear the word obedience, we think of children and of children only, and we just have in our minds that they should always "do bid," as the nursery language sometimes expresses it. And this is quite right, but it does not go far enough. I mean it is quite right that children in a nursery should do what they are told, for that saves a lot of trouble, not only for others, but for themselves. Before I explain further what I want to say, I will tell a little story that is true, and that explains what I mean here. There were once two children living in a neighbourhood where measles broke out. One was a wilful, spoiled little girl, who absolutely refused to stay in bed, or to take the medicine that the doctor ordered. She would walk about, and behave just as she chose, and the consequence was that she grew so ill that she had to stay in bed much longer than she need have done if she had been obedient. The other child was a boy who had been pretty strictly taught that what mother said was to be done had to be done. Therefore when he got ill, he made no trouble about anything, and he suffered very little, and was well and out playing quite happily while the naughty little girl who insisted on her own way was very miserable and weak and cross, a trial to herself and everybody else.

Now here it seemed as if to be obedient brought its own reward. So it very often does, particularly for children. But there are times when to obey orders does not seem to do this, and still, it is quite clear that the right thing was to obey. There are two stories in English history that show what I want to say, both true, of course. I feel pretty sure that we all know them, yet none of us can remember them too often, so I will refer to them here quite briefly. The first is that magnificent deed in the Crimean War known as the "Charge of the Light Brigade." In this, six hundred British soldiers dashed upon the whole Russian army, "got possession of their artillery for a little while, and cut their way back through a body of five thousand horse, leaving more than two-thirds of their number on the field." And it was all a mistake! They attempted what was impossible in obedience to an order that was quite wrong! They knew it, too; "Someone had blundered." Yet they went, and "When shall their glory fade?

* See Calamy's Nonconformists' Memorial.

O the wild charge they made!"

But enough! I will not dwell on this, or say anything of the terrible loss, the anguish, the grief of not only the friends of these brave men, but of the whole nation. It is impossible to read those wonderful lines of Tennyson's, some of which I have quoted, without a surging feeling of pity for the lives lost, of admiration for the deed done. For these men died doing their duty; and no nobler death can be. And they acted in simple obedience. That is the point I want to make; and that obedience was possible through the force of habit. Soldiers are taught to obey, and this often enables them to do great things.

The "Charge of the Light Brigade," soul-stirring though it is, was just War, and there is a strong feeling growing among civilised people that war is very awful and very wrong. So I am glad that the second story I have in my mind, though it, too, is about soldiers, has nothing whatever to do with fighting. But it, too, shows the value of habits of obedience.

A ship was sinking, far from land; a troopship, bringing a number of soldiers on their way. There were not enough small boats on board to save all the poor people, so the soldiers were drawn up on deck, as if on parade; and there they stood silent and uncomplaining, while the women and children were being passed down into the boats and rowed away. There they stood, with the ship sinking under them into a sea that was infested by sharks; going to certain death without an idea of anything but obedience to the word of command that had been spoken. All honour to them! and may God bless the memory of what they did to those who come after them! It was, to my mind, far more wonderful and heroic than even the great Charge of the Light Brigade, for that was a wild and stirring act undertaken in mad excitement. But these last had time to realise what they were doing, and they had none of the relief that comes of bodily exertion. They could do nothing; but "They also serve who only stand, and wait."

If such a trial of our obedience came our way, should we be ready? The soldiers were, and that was because they were used to instantly obey orders, without argument, without delay. And any of us would do well to imitate them in that habit. For habit is second nature, and it helps us often to do easily things that without it would seem almost impossible.

K. F. P.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MR. EDWARD LANT TYNDALL.

It is with great regret that we record the death of Mr. Edward Lant Tyndall on Saturday, June 2, in his seventy-second year. Mr. Tyndall was a prominent figure in the life of Birmingham. He was born and lived all his life in the city, where he was an active worker in many philanthropic causes, more particularly with those of temperance and international arbitration. He served also on the committees of the Homœopathic Hospital, the Ear and Throat Hospital, the Police Institute Mission, the Boatmen's Mission, and other humanitarian and religious efforts. A man of fine integrity, of great generosity, of kindly disposition, he served his generation with unflagging zeal, and never stinted time or trouble in the social movements he espoused. He was an active and influential member of the Old Meeting Church, with which his family have been connected for several generations. At one time, attracted by the ministry of George Dawson, he joined the Church of the Saviour, but returned to the Old Meeting Church on the settlement of the Rev. Joseph Wood. Soon after he accepted the office of warden, and until his illness a few years ago was an earnest worker in the various institutions of the church. He was a direct descendant of Tyndall, the martyr, while on his mother's side he was a cousin of Mary Carpenter and of Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter, the Principal of Manchester College, Oxford. Many of the students of the College will remember with gratitude his warm and friendly hospitality, and the eager interest he took in their career. He had a wide circle of friends both in England and in Ireland, and not only by them but by the people of the city generally he was greatly honoured. The cremation took place at the Birmingham crematorium on Tuesday, June 4.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual business meeting of the members of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was held at Essex Hall on Thursday morning in Whit-week, under the presidency of Mr. Charles Hawksley. There was a large attendance of members.

The Secretary (Rev. W. Copeland Bowie) presented the eighty-seventh annual report, stating that he had helped to prepare twenty-one of them, and he believed the present one would show that the Committee have been doing a useful work. It might very fairly be said that the cause of progress and goodness would have suffered if the work recorded in the report had been left undone. (A short abstract of the report is held over, and will appear in our next issue.)

The Treasurer (Mr. Howard Chatfield Clarke) submitted the financial reports and balance-sheet, which he described as "on the whole, favourable." There was an income in round figures of £7,000, and an expenditure of a little more. The subscription list, however, included some £500 or £600 which had been received on account of the previous year, and this fact made a considerable variation as between the real and apparent income for the year. A pleasanter feature was that the congregational collections were better by £150. This was a really marked improvement, and only once (seven years ago) had the collections exceeded the present figure, and then only by £2. The Van Mission was £150 to the good as compared with the previous year, and they would congratulate the Missionary Agent in collecting £800 for that work. Home and foreign grants were about £80 less, but on books they had spent £130 more. They had tried to cut their coat according to their cloth, but expenditure had still exceeded income by £180. The investments yielded income enough for the whole working expenses of the Association. Subscribers therefore had the satisfaction of knowing that their money went directly to the missionary work of the Association, and they needed to remind themselves that that work was only limited by the amount of the subscriptions.

PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

The President, who moved the adoption of the reports, drew attention to various features of the year's work, especially the Van Mission and the "curate scheme." Something had been said about minimum stipends for ministers. Their feeling distinctly was that many of the ministers were worthy of more than they received, and that an effort should be made to increase their income, so that they might be able to perform their duties without the harassment of financial anxiety. Happily, Mr. Dowson had been able to announce that he had received a certain support which would form the nucleus of what he hoped his successor in the presidency of the National Conference (Mr. Hugh Rathbone) would be able to make into a successful and completed fund. He appealed for support for that fund because the Association and the Conference were quite at one on that subject, even as he might say they were in regard to most other questions. They congratulated the Rev. W. G. Tarrant on the success of his mission to South Africa, and wished well to the Rev. G. C. Sharpe, who had gone to Johannesburg to take charge of the church in that place. Reference was next made to the recent developments of Unitarian work in Italy and Canada, to the journey of the Rev. and Mrs. Wooding to the Antipodes, and to their return in the course of the next month, and the meeting immediately endorsed the suggestion that a message of sincere sympathy should be sent to Mr. John Harrison in his illness.

The Rev. V. D. Davis, B.A., in seconding the resolution, urged that the hands of this Missionary Association of our churches should be strengthened. It had always stood in that line of faith and endeavour of which Dr. Crothers spoke in the Association Sermon. They were a pretty big handful of people, thinking all sorts of things, but they were all alike convinced that it was good work and God's work that the Association was doing. They were grateful to the Committees of the Association for the brave, steadfast, and true-hearted way in which they were doing its work, and to its executive officers, especially their Secretary, whom they hoped might give many more than his twenty-one years, for his was the right spirit for this missionary work.

Mr. J. Wigley deprecated a reference in the report to the Manchester Circuit scheme, which he regarded as being a little unnecessarily discouraging. He would not say that the report was encouraging, but he thought, on the other hand, that the expression of discouragement would not make for the object they had at heart. He prayed for a more lenient judgment than the report suggested.

The President assured Mr. Wigley that what he had said would receive the best consideration of the Committee, and they would welcome the complete success of the Circuit scheme, which he hoped they would be able to chronicle in the next report.

The resolution was then passed.

RE-ELECTION OF PRESIDENT.

The Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., proposed that the best thanks of the members of the Association be accorded to the President, Mr. Charles Hawksley, for his services during the past year, and that he be re-elected President for a second year. Mr. Hargrove, who was Mr. Hawksley's predecessor in the presidency, described himself as a man of words, and his successor essentially a man of works—works which would stand throughout the country as a memorial of him when our time is long past. Mr. Hawksley had held the office a year, and had been at the call of every society and church which had invited him. He gave time, energy and money, and for his liberality in every way the Association owed him the warmest thanks. Unitarians need be proud of their men eminent in business, and their President was one possessing those qualities of industry and uprightness which they so greatly valued.

The Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A. (Aberdare), seconded the resolution, and in the course of his remarks deprecated the differential treatment to the disadvantage of the Welsh ministers which was proposed in the National Conference scheme dealing with ministers' stipends.

The resolution was passed with enthusiasm, and the President, in a few words, feelingly acknowledged the compliment.

The third resolution, entrusted for proposition to the Revs. Lucking Tavener and W. L. Tucker, conveyed the thanks of the Association to its officers, the Committee, and the Council for their services during the past year, and proposed the following appointments for the ensuing year:—Treasurer, Mr. Howard Chatfield Clarke; Chairman of Committee, Mr. Percy Preston; Executive Committee, Mrs. Bartram, Mr. G. W. Brown, Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., Miss Clephan, Mr. A. S. Cooper, Mr. John Harrison, the Rev. James Harwood, Miss Brooke Herford, Mr. R. P. Jones, Mr. H. B. Lawford, Mr. F. W. Monks, Mr. R. M. Montgomery, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, Mr. C. F. Pearson, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Mr. A. H. Punnett, the Rev. Charles Roper, the Rev. C. J. Street, Miss Tagart, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, Mr. A. A. Tayler, Mr. Harold Wade, and Mrs. Wooding; Trustees, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., Mr. Howard Chatfield Clarke; Auditors, Mr. Herbert Gimson, Mr. E. Furnival Jones; Council: The list given in the report, with the following additions:—The Rev. Dr. G. C. Cressey (London), Miss Ethel Lake (Sutton).

MESSAGES FROM PROFESSOR EUCKEN, BISHOP FERENCZ, AND OTHERS.

At this point the Secretary announced that a telegram had been received from Dr. Eucken, recalling the hospitality shown to him last year, when he delivered the Essex Hall Lecture, and from Professor H. Geffcken of Cologne, Dr. Tony André of Florence, the Rev. N. Jozan of Budapesth, and Dr. Rochat of Geneva.

The following letter was read from Bishop Ferencz, of Kolozsvár:—"I cannot let the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association pass without sending my hearty greetings and good wishes. May your new gathering bring new inspiration from the members to the leaders, and may all of them gain new hope and refreshed energy to carry on their grand mission among peoples of all lands and climes. I am glad to inform you that we are also on the progressive line and our work is not without fruits. You are aware that our religion was legalised for Hungary proper only in 1848. It is also well known that after this event took place not half a year passed before the constitution of Hungary was suspended by the Emperor-King and remained so for almost twenty years. The law of liberty began to bear fruits only after the last-mentioned date, and I am happy to say that during this short period of less than fifty years we were able to start eight congregations and build four churches. Just a fortnight ago we consecrated a beautiful church in Hodmezovasarhely. Your Association nobly took part in this work by giving aid to it. The celebration was effective and beautiful in every respect. Many of our leading men from different parts of the country came together. We had the pleasure of welcoming from England two young Unitarians, Mr. J. B. Willans and Mr. R. Coppock, of Kerry (Montgomeryshire). Mr. Willans made an address in the name of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. All the churches of the town were represented by their ministers, the Jewish Rabbi included. Let me mention as a good sign of the time that a young Roman Catholic priest and a theological student left their Order, became Unitarians, and are now making study in our theological college with the intention of becoming ministers. They promise to be quite first-class men, and I am glad to have them just now, since we have several vacant pulpits. Renewing my hearty greetings, I remain, yours very truly,

(Signed) JOSEPH FERENCZ,
Bishop of the Hungarian Unitarian Churches.

THE SECRETARY AND HIS COLLEAGUES.

Mr. Percy Preston (Chairman of Committee) interposed with a resolution acknowledging the services of the Secretary of the Association (Rev. W. Copeland Bowie), the Missionary Agent (Rev. T. P. Spedding), and the Missionary Minister of the McQuaker Trustees (Rev. E. T. Russell, B.A.). This was very cordially received, and was acknowledged by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, who said such a token of regard and confidence was very deeply appreciated.

Resolutions were also passed as follows:—

"That the Association extends its sympathy to the men and women who in all lands are striving to unite pure religion and perfect liberty; welcomes the representatives of kindred religious organisations; and sends a special message of fraternal greeting to the American Unitarian Association, to the Bishop of the Unitarian churches in Hungary, to the Brahmo Samaj of India, and to the Committee who are organising the International Congress of Religious Liberals to be held in Paris, July, 1913."

"That the Association congratulates the District Societies on the efforts they are making to uphold and make more widely known the principles and faith of Unitarian Christianity, and welcomes the delegates who are present."

"That the grateful thanks of the members of the Association be given to the Local Treasurers for their efforts in obtaining subscriptions, and to the congregations for the collections made on behalf of the missionary work of the Association."

"That the Association extends a very cordial welcome to the following ministers who have entered upon their duties in our religious community since the last annual meeting:—The Revs. T. Anderson (Mexborough), T. F. M. Brockway (Woolwich), H. Chellew (Pendleton), N. J. H. Jones (Ashton), H. W. King (Hastings), J. H. M. Nolan (Coalville and Loughborough), W. J. Piggott (Burnley), D. W. Robson (Peckham), H. R. Tavener (Hunslet), G. W. Thompson (Portsmouth), W. M. Weston (Croydon)."

"That the cordial thanks of the members of the Association be given to the Rev. Dr. S. M. Crothers, the preacher of the Anniversary Sermon; to the congregation at Essex Church, Kensington, for the use of the chapel; and to many friends in London for their hospitality."

THE CONFERENCE.

At the close of the meeting a Conference was held on the work of the Association, papers being read or addresses given as follows:—Home Missions, Mr. Ronald P. Jones (Chairman of the Home Missions Committee); "Colonial and Foreign Work" (a report submitted by Mr. G. W. Brown, Chairman of the Colonial and Foreign Missions Committee, which was read by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant); Report of the Publications Department of the Association, the Rev. Charles Roper (Chairman of the Publications Committee); the McQuaker Fund, the Rev. E. T. Russell (Missionary Minister of the McQuaker Trustees); and the Van Mission, the Rev. T. P. Spedding (Missionary agent). Little time remained for the discussion, in which Mr. G. Brown (of Johannesburg), the Rev. N. E. Dowson, the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, and others took part.

Mr. V. Govindan spoke of the work of the Brahma Samaj in India, and referred with much appreciation to the labours in his native land many years ago of the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams.

COLONIAL AND FOREIGN WORK.

The following is the substance of Mr. G. W. Brown's report:—

Amongst the many important and interesting events which have happened during the past twelve months of the work of the Colonial and Foreign Committee of the Association, there are four which seem especially to stand out, namely, the founding of the Unitarian Church at Timaru; the visit of Mr. and Mrs. Wooding to New Zealand; the journeyings of Dr. and Mrs. Wendte in Europe and Palestine; and the settlement of the Rev. G. C. Sharpe at Johannesburg. Timaru is a town of about twenty thousand inhabitants between Christchurch and Dunedin, on the east coast of the middle island of New Zealand, and when we first heard that the Rev. J. H. G. Chapple, formerly a Presbyterian minister, was thinking of attempting to start a Unitarian congregation there, although we decided to send a small donation towards his expenses, we certainly were the reverse of sanguine as to the outcome of his efforts in what we should consider here such a small town. The result has been a great and encouraging surprise, and a remarkable proof of the preparedness of the ground for the seed which it is our business and privilege to scatter.

It has been a most fortunate event for us, as well as for the Australian and New Zealand churches, that Mr. and Mrs. Wooding have so generously joined to the original object of their journey to the Antipodes visits of some length to practically all the centres where our faith is represented—to the older congregations of Melbourne, Sydney, and Adelaide, as well as to Brisbane, where the Rev. Douglas Price, lately an Anglican minister there, has successfully inaugurated a Free Christian community; to Auckland, the wonderfully successful and virile pioneer New Zealand church, whose members, under their energetic minister, the Rev. R. J. Hall, are not content to confine their work to their own congregation, but have already initiated a Van Mission in a district where the distances and difficulties of travel are vastly greater than in our part of the world; to Wellington, the capital, where their presence drew together a most influential gathering in the church founded after Mr. Hargrove's visit by our indefatigable friend, Dr. Tudor Jones. They also visited Timaru, and Hobart, the chief town of Tasmania. Those who were fortunate enough to hear Dr. Wendte's address at the meeting of welcome to him and Mrs. Wendte can best appreciate the time and thought which he gave to what should really be our work, on the Continent of Europe and Palestine and can realise the urgency of the call for sympathy and aid from those emancipated souls in various countries who are struggling to spread liberal religion, where the recoil from the dogmas and ceremonies of the prevailing faiths has turned so many thoughtful minds to agnosticism and scepticism. Surely we cannot refuse to follow up his work and give aid where he so strongly advises it, especially as he hopes to be able to add assistance from American Unitarians.

Mr. Tarrant's journey and labours in Johannesburg belong perhaps more to the work of the previous year's committee, but his welcome home took place in our early months, and all the reports since received show how thoroughly he did his work in an atmosphere far from encouraging, excepting in the devoted kindness and confidence of the small nucleus of friends who first welcomed him. The committee were fortunate in securing the Rev. G. Coverdale Sharpe, late of Longsight, as permanent minister, and during the six months since he took up his work he has been gradually overcoming difficulties which were sure to arise in a new sphere, and he hopes before long to surmount what he feels to be the greatest drawback to the forming of a strong congregation, that of being without their own place of worship and house of meeting; and we feel confident that his ability and energy, backed by such loyal supporters, will attain the end desired.

In Canada the friends at Vancouver City and Victoria are making headway, the latter under the Rev. Sidney E. Lindridge and the former under the Rev. Matthew R. Scott, whose discourses are greatly appreciated. In Jamiaca, after full inquiry, we are also joining with our American friends in an interesting experiment by sending the Rev. E. Ethelred Brown to work amongst his fellow coloured people. We have continued our aid to the Unitarian body in the Khasi Hills in India, with the advice and assistance of Mr. Nilmani Chakrabarti, for which we are extremely grateful. In other parts of India our friends of the Brahma Samaj are doing practically our work to the best of their powers. In Germany, France, and Russia liberal thought is awakened and spreading, but in Dr. Wendte's opinion those countries, with the exception of a small district of the first-named, do not at present need monetary aid. Needless to say, the leaders of these movements have our deepest sympathy and heartiest good wishes. Our friends in Holland, Hungary, Denmark, and Norway are working earnestly as ever, but nothing has happened during the past twelve months calling for special note. In Italy Mr. G. Conte, formerly a Methodist minister who was stationed many years in America, is giving up his life and slender means to the formation of centres of liberal religion in all the important cities. In Bulgaria we have a correspondent, Mr. N. Toplisky, whom Dr. Wendte thinks well worthy of monetary assistance. In Palestine Dr. Wendte had interviews with various heads of religious bodies, in which he was greatly aided by Dr. Kieferndorf, another correspondent of the Association. In Japan one of the students at Manchester College, Mr. Uchigasaki, is winning golden opinions. From Turkey, Brazil, and other widely separated countries have come, and are constantly coming, earnest requests for literature and various forms of assistance. In our own country our mission in the past would seem chiefly to have been to leaven the beliefs of other churches, and the future is not likely to show a greatly different result. The foreign and colonial work has, however, to deal with many countries where either all real faith is nearly extinct in a large number of the most thoughtful minds, or where a liberal form of Christianity has often never yet been preached or even heard of. Education and knowledge are increasing everywhere, and each year the call to help the eager strugglers in other lands for a rational faith becomes more insistent. So while on the one hand it cannot be denied that the Colonial and Foreign department of the Association has shown more striking and cheering instances of success than any other branch of its work, it does, on the other hand, seem to those so much interested in it a lamentable thing that the available funds are so pitifully small compared with the very large amounts raised by other denominations for foreign missions.

The report ends with an earnest appeal for increased help in the carrying on of this important work.

THE VAN MISSION.

The Rev. T. P. Spedding, in making his statement as to the work of the Van Mission, said that where the population is much below ten thousand the probabilities are the new spirit of the age has but slightly manifested itself. The Mission started with the idea that just as lectures and theatre services had been organised for certain classes, so an open-air mission might with advantage be carried to another portion of the community. The work of six summers has shown that there was room for such an agency. Nearly 3,000 meetings have been held, while hundreds of pounds' worth of pamphlets and tracts have been distributed. It looks, however, as though another mission is wanted in the less informed places, and that regular work throughout a whole season should be carried on in certain localities. In many of the country districts a week's mission is not long enough, and, however unwillingly, some of these places have had to be passed over. It is in the larger centres of population where social and political forces are at work that most good is done. Incidentally, this consideration disposes of an objection which has been raised by some of our own friends as well as by those to whom our appearance is an offence. It is imagined by some and alleged by others that the effect of the presence of the Mission is to unsettle people's minds. The answer, of course, is that the minds of many, and especially the minds of young men, are already unsettled, and the churches all round are considering how best to deal with this portentous fact. The Van Mission can only come into the midst of such conditions with good and helpful results. It finds people unsettled and drifting away, and it affords them fresh anchorage. It gives them a new apprehension of the realities of religion, a new faith in the sacredness of our own time and in their responsibilities and opportunities. On the other hand, the Mission would rejoice to unsettle some beliefs and doctrines that are levelled in opposition against it, and it rejoices in what power it has to disturb such notions as these. The seventh season of the mission starts well. In the North, in the Midlands, and in London there have been meetings full of splendid encouragement since the middle of the month. The voluntary character of the work is maintained, and new workers are joining us. Last year the Mission paid its way, and when 100 ministers, as their contribution, are giving time and labour in the field, it confidently appeals to a wider circle of supporters to provide the funds. The London Lay Preachers' Union will this year be responsible for a fortnight's meetings, and this assistance is heartily welcomed. Churches and societies are co-operating, and it is proved that when this co-operative effort is wisely directed it has beneficial results in the work of the local churches. There has been an extension of the work to New Zealand, and in the literature that the appearance of the Mission has occasioned there may be mentioned a second edition of the "Fifty Points" of the Rev. Alfred Hall, and the little book of the Rev. H. Bodell Smith on "Open-air Theology." The time has come when it is hoped some of those who have been acquainted with the work of the Mission may be brought into more active association with its permanent efforts. Opportunities will be afforded this season for those who sympathise to join us, so that where work is carried on it may be with the closer and more effective association of the headquarters of the Mission. The Mission is grateful for the help of ministers, laymen, and contributors, and in anticipation, for the help that it believes will be forthcoming in the present year.

THE JUBILEE CELEBRATION AT ROSSLYN HILL CHAPEL.

ON Wednesday, June 5, the members and friends of the congregation at Rosslyn Hill celebrated the fiftieth anniversary since the building and opening of the present chapel. A service conducted by the Rev. H. Gow was held at 6.30, the preacher being Dr. Estlin Carpenter, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford. The church was beautifully decorated with roses and lilies, and among those present were many former members of the congregation and others bearing the names of men and women who belonged to it in earlier years. An opportunity for friendly intercourse was given after the service, when refreshments were served in the schoolroom, and there was a general re-union of old acquaintances who had many interesting memories to recall. The chapel was once again filled for the public meeting, which began at 8.30. Among those present were several members of other denominations, including Dr. Newton Marshall, Dr. Claud Taylor, and Dr. R. F. Horton.

The chair was taken by Mr. Walter Baily, chairman of the congregation, who said he was glad to see so many people present who had not met each other for a very long time. Letters expressing regret for absence and good wishes for the future of the church were read from the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, the Rev. Philip Wicksteed, the Rev. E. S. Howse (formerly an assistant minister at Rosslyn Hill), the Rev. A. Leslie Smith (also a former assistant minister), Mr. Le Pla, the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth, the Rev. Priestley Prime, and the Rev. J. Brown. Mr. Baily gave a brief outline of the history of the chapel from the time when Dr. Sadler, then a young man of 24, who must have possessed a singularly attractive personality, began his ministry in 1846. In 1850 it was necessary to increase the size of the chapel (the present schoolroom); in 1856 they widened it, making it twice its former size, and finally they bought land and erected the present building, which was opened just 50 years ago—a great effort for a struggling congregation as they then were. Three years afterwards they wanted more room, and they put up the gallery, and at a later date they built the side aisle and chancel. All this was done during Dr. Sadler's ministry of 45 years. He was succeeded by Dr. Brooke Herford, with his strong and most genial personality, who kept up the congregation in full vigour. Mr. Baily said he had been trying to find out how far there was a continuity between the congregation of 50 years ago and that of the present time, and he had been able to make quite a long list of names belonging to the earlier period which still appear on the membership list, many of them borne, of course, by descendants of former members.

Mr. Henry Sharpe gave an interesting account of the origin of the congregation, the facts relating to which he had recently unearthed in some old Middlesex records. Mr. Squire, who has been a member of the chapel for over 50 years, gave some further historical details. Those who read the article on "The History of Rosslyn Hill Chapel" in the last issue of THE INQUIRER will remember that reference is there made to a paper read by Dr. Sadler before his congregation thirty years ago, which is now published, together with a personal appreciation by Mr. Squire, and historical notes by Mr. Sharpe, and can be obtained from the secretary, Mr. E. F. Grundy.

Dr. Blake Odgers, K.C., speaking as a member of the congregation with quite a brief record in comparison with Mr. Squire, said they were very glad to welcome those ministers who formerly acted as curates to Dr. Sadler. They had in their midst, however, an older friend who had often occupied that pulpit, namely Dr. Drummond, an old and dear friend of Dr. Sadler's and of most of those present, whom they were now about to hear.

Dr. Drummond said he appeared before them in a twofold aspect, as representing the older members of the congregation, and as having had the privilege of preaching in their pulpit. Though he had known all the three ministers of the chapel his membership of the congregation fell almost entirely within the ministry of Dr. Sadler, who was worthy to be exalted among the saints, and whose memory was to him as green and fresh as though he had only spoken to him the day before. As one who had an intimate friendship with him he might be allowed to speak of Dr. Sadler with reverence and love. He would indeed be remembered by those who had known him with undying affection, for his character was singularly sweet and pure, and kind and loving. His power of sympathy sank deep into the heart, although his expressions were never noisy, and he did not thrust himself upon those who needed that sympathy. It came from a deep spiritual life, "too full for sound and foam."

They must couple with his name, Dr. Drummond added, that of the gracious and gentle lady whose life was linked with his, and whose character expressed itself in the same devotion and love towards God and man. Dr. Sadler's discourses were always directed towards the deepening and strengthening of character. They were based on devotion, they expressed the fulness of his heart, and poured balm upon many a troubled spirit and upon those who might otherwise have been led away and vanquished by temptation. He was not a great orator, and had none of the tricks of the rhetorician, but he was a great preacher because he so entirely forgot himself and was so deeply inspired by love. Those things at which he aimed he perceived represented the common aims of all the churches, and therefore he was fond of speaking of "our common Christianity." He felt that under all theological and intellectual differences there was the same fervour of aspiration, the same anxiety to bless and benefit mankind. If we realised this we should cease to insist on the differences prevailing among men which to all deep souls seems so superficial. Religion was love to God and man, the religion of the Sermon on the Mount and the Lord's Prayer, and of the life and spirit of Jesus Christ. "To these times," said Dr. Drummond in conclusion, "the spirit of that religion has been handed down; and the best wish I can offer to this congregation is that when another fifty years have passed, those eternal truths will still be foremost, drawing the churches nearer to each other in the great unity of the spirit to that central Light in which we shall see God."

The Rev. E. I. Fripp, who spoke as one of the ministers who had formerly acted as curate to Dr. Sadler, gave some personal reminiscences, some of an amusing character, of his earlier days in Hampstead, and added his testimony to the tributes paid to the "dear Doctor."

The Rev. H. Gow, the present minister of Rosslyn Hill Chapel, who was accorded a most hearty reception when he rose to speak, welcomed all present especially the ministers and members of other denominations. In two things they were more fortunate, he said, than those who had gathered there fifty years ago at the opening of the chapel, for the weather was more propitious than it was on the first occasion, and they had in their midst certain friends who did not belong to their denomination. This he thought was not the case at the opening of the chapel, or the fact would have been recorded. They ought to rejoice most heartily because when the record of the present meeting came to be read fifty years hence, their descendants would not have to notice that omission. Mr. Gow expressed the great pleasure with which they welcomed their friends, including Dr. Horton. Their presence there did not mean that they were coming over to their side, or that those who greeted them were going over to the other side. They each retained their own clear convictions, and that made for brotherhood, for it was not a general vagueness of belief, but strong, sincere, religious convictions, working out in all kinds of ramifications, which best prepared men to associate with those whose forms and ideas were different from their own. They had invited these ministers with the warmest appreciation of the work they were doing, and with a sense that they wanted to be friends with them to the utmost of their power. And he hoped that they in their turn recognised the essentially Christian character of Dr. Sadler's work and that they were glad to be there. Speaking in conclusion of Dr. Brooke Herford, Mr. Gow made a touching allusion to those last days in which, helpless as he was, and obliged to set aside the work he loved, which is a hard thing for the most brave and trusting man to do, he retained his beautiful serenity and happy confidence. His influence was at that time among the most powerful that he could recall, and much as he had been able to do in his strength he did quite as much in his weakness.

Miss Brooke Herford said it was a great pleasure to her, as a member of her father's family, to be allowed to take part in the welcome to Dr. Horton and other ministers, strangers and friends, who were joining in their celebrations that night. It was so much in the spirit of what she was brought up to believe, that you can work together with people of all sorts of beliefs for the good of others. She was proud of belonging to a community in Hampstead which had tried to carry out that idea.

Dr. Horton, who was received with much applause, said that he supposed he owed the distinction of being called upon to speak instead of Dr. Newton Marshall and others representing different denominations who were present to the pre-eminence of age. He wished, however, in all that he said to be understood as speaking exclusively for himself, and he confessed that he had gladly seized upon the opportunity of addressing them, because he had been literally longing for a chance of saying to the people of that congregation how much he owed to them. He recalled nothing connected with Rosslyn Hill, in all the years he had been in Hampstead, that had not elicited from him a deep respect and warm affection. He remembered Dr. Sadler, a gracious scholarly influence, whom he would have felt it an honour to know if the opportunity had arisen. He remembered even more vividly Dr. Brooke Herford's coming there from America, and while Miss Herford had been speaking his personality flashed upon him anew. He was a man of evangelical zeal, if he was not a man of evangelical doctrine. To come into contact with him and to have some knowledge of his exquisite Christian readiness to recognise the difficulty in which orthodox people are often placed who want to express their sympathy with those who are not called orthodox, was something to be thankful for. As he had very few opportunities of speaking to that congregation, he wanted to add a tribute of great respect and affection to their present minister, Mr. Gow. For the past twelve years he had always known that if there was a cause that would benefit the people, either in regard to religion or philanthropy, no one would support it more ardently than Mr. Gow. Dr. Horton went on to enumerate some of the instances which had given him actual experience not only of the energy and goodwill of their minister, but of the practical kindness and generosity of the congregation in helping forward any good works for which their help was invited, irrespective of differences of opinion or creed. About half way down the time in which he had been at Hampstead, he continued, he happened to read one of Dr. Drummond's books which made a profound impression upon him. He was brought up, if they would pardon him for saying so, with a prejudice against the name Unitarian, but when he read that book it seemed as if a veil fell from his eyes, and he saw that what he supposed was a great gulf was a gap actually bridged by the spirit and the teaching of its author. From that moment he had been enabled to overcome his prejudices and look at the whole question with clearer eyes. He now felt that, although it was true that he differed from those present, it was not true that they were divided. It was true that they expressed their creed in a different way, but it was not true that their creed was different. Some were Unitarian Christians, others were Trinitarian Christians, but the emphasis was on the word Christian; and when they saw each other's point of view clearly and sympathetically, they did not find it difficult to feel cordially and affectionately towards one another. Although they took different points of view as to the central doctrine of Christianity, they were not Christians if they allowed their point of view to keep them apart, because the very essence of Christianity was that something had entered into their lives that drew men together in the service of God and man.

The Rev. F. K. Freeston warmly endorsed Dr. Horton's words, and spoke of the part which Hampstead now plays in the life of London, and of the changes which have transformed it since the time when he regarded it as "a sort of South of England Knutsford." A vote of thanks to Dr. Carpenter was moved by Dr. Herbert Smith, and the warmest tributes of affection and confidence were paid to Mr. Gow by Mr. Paterson, treasurer of the congregation, and by Mr. E. Wallis, the former speaking of the great simplicity, earnestness, and severity of conscience which specially characterise him. Mr. Gow responded, expressing his gratitude for the cordial and harmonious co-operation of all the officers of the church in whatever work he was trying to do. Mr. Charles Hawksley, in a reminiscent speech, wished prosperity to the congregation, and a few words from Mr. Grundy, followed by the singing of the hymn "One Holy Church of God appears," brought a very successful meeting to a close.

THE BRITISH LEAGUE OF UNITARIAN WOMEN.

ANNUAL MEETING.

NUMEROUS delegates and friends mustered in Essex Hall for the annual meeting of the British League of Unitarian and Other Liberal Christian Women, which was held on Wednesday afternoon, May 29. In the regrettable absence of Lady Bowring, the President, through the illness of Sir William Bowring, Mrs. H. D. Roberts occupied the chair. The minutes of the last meeting were read by Miss V. Preston, joint hon. secretary, and Miss Brooke Herford, organising secretary, read the Report. We have given details of the work of the League on previous occasions, and it only remains to add that it is increasing its sphere of influence in all directions. Seventeen new branches have been added during the past year, the total number in March of this year being 78 as against 58 in 1911. The plan of grouping a number of local branches together in a District League has been carried out with much success in Yorkshire, at Leeds and Sheffield, and it is hoped that a similar grouping of Lancashire societies may also be brought about. The International Committee has directed its energies towards the task of opening up communications with representative women of the liberal religious movement in different parts of the world with a view to their inclusion in the International Union. The League, the American National Alliance, and the Hungarian Unitarian League, were already associated in the Union, and last autumn the committee sent a representative to Cologne to interview the Local Committee of the "Verein für Religiöse Erziehung," a women's society which is the outcome of the recent struggle for religious freedom in Germany. The overtures of the League were cordially received, and the Verein decided to join the Union, the Cologne Committee acting as the German International Sub-Committee. During the winter like efforts have been made with regard to Denmark, Norway, Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, France and Italy. In Denmark a small society of women has joined the Union, and nine women of the Italian society, the Association of Free Believers, have formed a society for the same purpose. The "Section des Dames de l'Union Suisse de Christianisme Libéral" of Geneva is now considering the suggestion, and it is hoped that before long Switzerland will be added to the international roll, on which there are now six countries. This is a small but practical step in the direction of building up good-will and a better understanding between the nations, of which we hear so much to-day. The Report draws attention to the Lecture List which has been instituted for use in the London district. Only a modest fee is charged for the lectures, and eight of these have already been given to various branches.

The treasurer's report was presented by Mrs. S. Martineau, who stated that the League had maintained its satisfactory financial position during the year, and that the Special Fund had been augmented by another gift of £20 from the generous donor who had from the beginning supported their extension work so liberally. Special gifts had also been received for fellowship work and for that of the International Union. They wanted more members, not so much for their subscriptions as for the strength they would personally bring to the cause. Mrs. Martineau said she believed there lay just ahead of them a great uplifting, a stirring and kindling of the higher thoughts of God and man which lie, dully smouldering at times, in the heart of mankind. Should it not be theirs to do more than follow with the crowd? Could they not do as their fathers had done, holding the torch aloft, and moving on, shoulder to shoulder, with one steadfast high intent?

Mrs. Roberts, in moving the adoption of the reports, warmly endorsed what Mrs. Martineau had said, and spoke with appreciation of the work of the officers. That splendid meeting, she said, was a sign of the progress of the League, and they must all feel glad that they had such an energetic and business-like committee in London, and a treasurer who was able to combine mathematics, enthusiasm, and idealism. She hoped that everybody would do their best to follow the appeal she had made to them. Miss Laura Passavant (Leeds), in supporting, said that the League formed a living united band which year by year was producing increasing results in the activity of the churches, and although she had always been one to support the active co-operation of men and women, she realised that there were certain things which women could do better by themselves, and that there were many who felt that their best work could be done in a society like theirs.

Dr. Crothers said that the women in Old England seemed to him to be inspired with the same spirit as the women in New England. He had been trying to think of something which the members of the American Alliance were doing which the League was not doing, but he did not succeed. As a matter of fact they were doing the same things, with much profit to the churches. The greatest changes which had taken place within recent years in their churches had come through the reinforcement of their organisations through the Alliance. This had also helped and relieved the American Association, and enabled it to make its methods more systematic. He thought the League had a great opportunity at the present time in Canada. Their work naturally allied itself with the colonies, and although they in America had shown by the changing of the name of their National Conference to the General Conference, their wish to do away with the barriers of nationality, and most of their ministers in Canada came from south of the line, the growth and development of nationalism in Canada gave them, as Englishwomen, a greater opportunity there. He believed that if a proper effort were made they would have in that rapidly developing country one of the greatest centres of free religion in the world. Dr. Crothers gave an interesting account of the civilising missionary work which is being done by the women of the American Alliance in backward regions of America, such as North Carolina, where the intellectual life has not been developed, and of the work that is also being carried on under the name of international relations, adding that they did not need to go outside their own borders in order to take up that, as all the countries of Europe had rushed in and contributed to the vast growth of the United States. It was interesting, he said in conclusion, to see the effect which the development of all sorts of women's clubs was having, not only on themselves but on the men of his country. The total effect of the educational and social work of the past 15 or 20 years had made the American woman more intellectual in regard to social affairs than her husband, and the time had come when the men were beginning to rebel, and demand the same privileges in regard to mental development. They had now got a religious movement called the Business Men's Movement, and it was clear that the men were beginning to bestir themselves and to re-assert their rights.

The adoption of the report was carried. Miss Amy Withall moved the election of the officers and committee for the ensuing year, which was seconded by Mrs. Arnold Lupton, supported by Mrs. Herbert Smith, and carried. A cordial welcome was then given to the delegates—56 from the provinces and two from abroad—by Mrs. Roberts, to which Fraulein von Wilczek (German delegate) and Mrs. Stronge (Kidderminster) responded. The former specially interested the meeting by explaining the difference between the work which lies before women working on behalf of liberal religion in Germany and that which is being accomplished by their sisters in England. In Germany their chief efforts are directed towards emancipating themselves from the fetters imposed by the Government, which does not permit parents who wish to have their children taught the freer faith any voice in the matter, and insists on the teachers giving religious teaching in the schools whether they desire to do so or not. The work of those who are anxious for more liberty lies in the direction of increasing their numbers and encouraging each other to gain breadth and clearness of thought, so that they may ultimately put pressure on the Government and obtain greater freedom in religion.

After the meeting a reception and tea were given to the delegates and other friends in the Committee Room of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

THE PRESENT TENDENCIES OF RELIGIOUS THOUGHT IN ITALY.

AN ADDRESS BY DR. ANGELO CRESPI.

DR. CRESPI delivered an extremely able and illuminating address, at the annual meeting of the Central Postal Mission on Thursday, May 30.* He began by giving a rapid survey of the past and present spiritual evolution in Italy. We were only beginning dimly to understand, he said, the services rendered to civilisation by the mediæval Church and the benefits bestowed by her upon the whole world. Italy, was, however, paying a dear price for her past imperial glories owing to the fact that the spiritual universality of the Christian intuition of life, which was the universality of love and reason, was early pervaded by the spirit of legal, worldly and imperial universality. As the result of this the Church was bound to stand in the way of the process of nation-making and popular self-government in the whole of Europe, and when and where she could no longer subdue the kingly power she became friendly to it and endeavoured to use it for the control and repression of new ideas. Her worldly catholicity caused her to be repressive, distrustful, and exclusive where the catholicity of love would have led her to be stimulating, propulsive, and comprehensive. When both Papacy and Empire emerged exhausted from centuries of mutual struggle, and the rediscovery of Plato shook the pseudo-Aristotelianism of the scholastic philosophy and the dogmatism of the Church, Italy turned with yearning to the pre-Christian view of life and exalted purely political ethics, completely severing politics from morals and religion. In no country as in Italy was the separation between politics and ethics on the one hand, and between

* A report of the meeting at which this address was given is unavoidably held over until next week.

Dr. Crothers.

A Portrait Interview with Dr. CROTHERS appears in this week's CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH (June 5).

"Pessimism Challenged."

The Sermon preached by Dr. CROTHERS in Essex Church on May 28 will be published as a pamphlet supplement to the next issue of the CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH (June 12).

A Supplement is issued with the CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH every week, containing notable sermons and other utterances by preachers and leaders at home and abroad. The Supplement is supplied separately at 1d., post free 1½d.; or together with the CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH of the same date at 1½d., post free 2d. They can be ordered of newsagents, or direct from the publishers, 133, Salisbury-square, Fleet-street, London, E.C.

A Sermon by the Rev. R. J. Campbell, M.A., appears in every issue of the CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH.

THE - -
CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH.

EVERY WEDNESDAY. Price One Penny.
133, Salisbury Square, Fleet Street, E.C.

science and theology on the other, so boldly proclaimed and carried out, and in no other country did the effort towards political unity and liberty, and that towards freedom of thought and scientific investigation, meet with such stubborn and bitter opposition on the part of the Church. This has worked out in the hard positivism and materialistic conceptions of life which have caused the remotest hint of spiritual idealism, or even the word God, to be held in detestation by so many. The result is that might has come to be deemed right, and both in internal national affairs, as syndicalism shows, or in external affairs, as in the war of conquest that is now going on, there is an exhibition of the worship of force.

Dr. Crespi proceeded to give an analysis of the Modernist movement and his reason for thinking that it has had its day. In Italy the Modernist movement had at first a social and political aspect, and was aimed at the reform of the social system through a reorganisation of the industrial classes on the model of the medieval guilds. But this came too late and failed to detach the masses from socialism. Philosophical Modernism, as interpreted by Loisy, Father Tyrrell, Eucken and Baron von Hügel, acted as a point of union for those who from within the Church tradition longed to meet the modern spirit and find God in it, and those who, from a purely scientific or humanistic standpoint of whose unsatisfactoriness they were daily growing more conscious, were moving towards a decisively spiritual Weltanschauung. It aimed at showing that the critical, scientific, and philosophical spirit, and the mystical and devotional spirit do not necessarily conflict with each other, but are both required for the complete energising of every healthy and richly endowed soul. It aimed at showing that friction and tension, which are characteristics of life, are not of necessity enmity and contradiction, and that the standard of spiritual excellence and the method of religious evolution must not be one-sided in their development. Modernism was the consciousness that philosophy, history, and authority required radical reconstruction, but the chief difficulty was that this reconstruction had to be done with the consent of the authority itself. The Modernists thought they had the key to the situation in the fact that the prevailing stream of modern philosophy, especially as shown by William James and Bergson, is tinged with anti-intellectualism and distrust of reason, but if, as we are told, reality is a gold coin of which no discursive thought or rationally clear conception shall ever finish giving us the change, and if to think, to define, is to fix and stop what is a flow and a becoming, we are led directly to the subversion of the old dogmatic philosophy and of the whole constitution of the Church. The Church, however, is not really a philosophy, but a history, and the problem of Modernism was at once that of overthrowing the old historical foundation and of finding a new, nay, the true one. For the first task it had at hand the whole work of Biblical study, and of comparative religion; for the second task, in the preparing of the ground for the existence of the Church as a spiritual society, it found a weapon in the new trend of philosophy. This led to the discrediting of the old absolutist notion of authority in religion, and the discovery of a new foundation for it, in the past as well as in the present, in the validity and reality of religious experience and life.

But in addition to being a philosophy and a history the Church is an authority, and the Modernists groped towards a new conception of authority not wholly dissimilar from that ruling in politics, in science, in art, where conservatism and innovation do not mutually exclude, but help each other, just as in every living organism heredity and variation are inextricably interwoven. These men were not merely hoping and struggling for their own particular church or religion, but for the Soul of Religion itself, and what was at stake was not certain interpretations of texts, dogmas, or the actual foundation of the Catholic Church, but the whole conception of reality—was reality spiritual or was it not? The Italian Modernists saw again Mazzini's vision of spiritual and social reconstruction, and not less clearly did they see that the religious re-awakening of Italy would be an epoch-making event in the world's history, resulting in a European Federation and a reunited Christendom with Rome still as its centre.

In discussing the reasons why this movement came so suddenly to a stop, Signor Crespi pointed out that there were, naturally, only one or two exceptional minds which were capable of grasping and harmonising this synthesis of the scientific, the mystical, and the philosophical spirit, and that the one thing which kept so many different minds together was the fact that they were fighting a common opponent, an authority equally adverse to freedom of thought and investigation in various fields. As soon as this authority began to expel from the Church those who differed from her doctrines or to threaten them with expulsion, each of these fell back into their own special categories and followed their prevailing tendencies, no longer urged to find an organic link between different aspects and terms of the religious problem. The resistance by the authority brought to light the fact that the movement, which is a quite different thing from this or that leading personality in it, had not a common soul, a common intuition of life as against that of the Church. Once more the wisdom, however perverted and enfeebled, imbedded in traditions and institutions triumphed over a movement rich in brilliant minds fed on the most modern methods and the results of modern learning. This led the stronger minds to reconsider the whole philosophical position, and to see clearly that it involved two mutually exclusive theories; on the one hand, pragmatism and Bergsonian intuitionism were really leading to the most complete scepticism, not only in religion but in ethics, science and philosophy; on the other hand, those who followed to its logical conclusion the tradition of Kantian and post-Kantian idealism were driven to the conclusion that as reality is made by thought, the only reality for us is the reality which the human spirit, moved by its logic, is daily making in the eternal process of history. This is the conclusion reached by Benedetto Croce, whose philosophy, Dr. Crespi believes, goes much deeper and is far more profound than Bergson's, though it may not entirely satisfy us. Thus naturalism and idealism conspire to keep religion at a low ebb, to proclaim it as either an unscientific superstition, or a mythical representation of that sovereignty of the spirit which is only adequately thought out in philosophy, a myth good and eternally necessary for the masses and non-philosophers.

Philosophy, Dr. Crespi continued, did not create religious fervour and warmth, but in so far as ideas spread from the few to the many, and philosophical criticism clears the ground and prepares the atmosphere in which religious intuition and life may bloom and breathe, it must be taken into account. One reason, among many others, why the Protestant Church had failed to affect the spiritual situation in Italy was because not only did its philosophy throw no light on present difficulties, but it was even more defective than any other already in the field. But the growing dissatisfaction with all these philosophies was the one factor making for hopefulness. Tracing the process of thought from Descartes to the present day, the speaker showed that the mechanistic and intuitional ideas have alike failed, and that there is ground for a higher mysticism, which is based on thought but is conscious that even the highest conception of truth is not wholly true, and that it only approaches a Reality higher and other than Truth. Here religion is on a safe foundation, and is fully justified in using philosophy, art, and ethics as the highest symbols of that which we feel more than we know. Here, then, Mazzini's dream and the Modernist movement are seen to have more prophetic worth in them than we may have thought, and the Modernist crisis itself was not in vain, if it has made our problems clearer. Nothing stands in the way of thinking that this initial, intuitive apprehension of the Absolute may be greater in some minds than in others, that it may be at its highest in religious genius, that in Jesus it may have been at the highest point reached up to the present time, and that institutional Christianity, provided it never loses consciousness of being a means and not an end, a vehicle and not the substance of life, may not only continue to exist and grow, but may once more, and more than ever, become the matrix and the beacon of a new world culture.

In conclusion, Dr. Crespi said he did not entertain any doubt that in their efforts for the spiritual resurrection of Italy the best English minds and hearts, lovers of freedom and faith in all their forms, would be with them not less than in the days of battles and heroic martyrdoms. They

PEARL ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices : London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income	£2,949,000
Claims Paid exceed	£12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHRUBSALL, } Directors.

would help them in their present struggles—struggles far harder, in a sense, than the struggle for national unity, though they are its natural complement, and necessary in order to elicit its full historical, indeed its permanent, significance for humanity as a whole.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

A PUBLIC meeting will be held, under the auspices of the International Association for Labour Legislation, on Monday, June 10, at 8.30 p.m., at the Caxton Hall, Westminster. The chair will be taken by Professor Sir Thomas Oliver, F.R.C.P., and amongst the speakers will be Mr. J. Ellis Griffith, M.P., Mr. A. D. Steel Maitland, M.P., Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., and probably some of the foreign members of the Special International Committee on Hours of Work in Continuous Processes which is meeting in London the two following days. There will be a few reserved seats at 2s. 6d., for which application should be made not later than Saturday, June 8, to the hon. secretary, Miss Sophy Sanger, 4, Bloomsbury-square, W.C.

THE Annual Council Meeting of the Boys' Own Brigade will be held at Essex Hall on Monday, June 17, when an address will be given by Mr. J. H. Whitehouse, M.P., hon. secretary of the National League of Workers among Boys. The Business Meeting will be held at 7.45 p.m., Mr. Ronald P. Jones, M.A., President of the Brigade, in the chair. At 8.30 p.m. Mr. Whitehouse will give his address, after which the meeting will be open for questions and discussion.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bermondsey.—The annual flower service was held at the Port-road Unitarian Church on Sunday, June 2. The church was beautifully decorated with flowers, the gifts of members of the congregation and friends, among whom we should specially like to thank Mrs. Ellis, of Guildford, Mr. F. Nettlefold, Mr. F. H. Ruck, of Maidstone, and Mr. W. P. Evershed, of Clapham. A deeply interesting sermon was preached by Mr. H. M. Caley on the text, "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow." The choir also rendered the anthem "Consider the Lilies" in an able manner. As the day was also the Sunday-school anniversary, the evening collection was given to the school funds, which, unfortunately, are extremely low.

Newcastle-on-Tyne: Church of the Divine Unity.—The annual business meeting of the congregation was held on Monday evening, June 3, Mr. Otto Levin, Esq., in the chair, and, despite the very wet weather, there was a good attendance of members. The Committee's annual report, and the Treasurer's financial statement, which were adopted, showed the church to be in a more prosperous condition, both financially and numerically, than it has been for a number of years. The reports from the various institutions—Sunday school, Literary Society, and Ladies' Sewing Society—all testified to the useful work that was being done. Very warm appreciation was expressed by the various speakers of the work of the minister, the Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A.

Nottingham: The High Pavement Chapel. Resignation.—At the annual meeting of the congregation, held on Tuesday last, a letter was read from the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas resigning the charge which he has held for twelve years.

Tallynaskeagh: Co. Down: The late Mr. J. Chambers.—The death has occurred of Mr. John Chambers, at Tallynaskeagh, where the news was received with deep regret. Mr. Chambers, who had reached the ripe old age of 82, was one of the largest farmers in Lecale. A man of genial nature, he deservedly gained the esteem of all creeds and classes, and the poor by his removal have lost a friend. In religion he was a Non-Subscribing Presbyterian, and for many years acted with acceptance as secretary and treasurer of the church at Ballee. He was interred in the graveyard at Ballee in presence of a large number of mourners. The Rev. J. H. Bibby, who conducted the service, in the course of an impressive address, said that Mr. Chambers was a man of great courage, for all his life long he took the side which he deemed to be right, no matter at what cost to himself in social prestige or personal honours. There was a time when a tenant-farmer could gain many favours if he would only carry himself so as to please the powers that be. He had a healthy contempt for cant and hypocrisy. A friend of the weak and oppressed, he possessed much earnestness of purpose, and was able to say "no" when it might have suited him better to say "yes," had he considered his own personal interests. In these and many other ways, he set an example worthy of imitation. He was always distinguished in a high degree by an affectionate, sympathising disposition that made him ready for every good work; ready and willing to do those offices of kindness which many a sick and sorrow-stricken home in the neighbourhood would always remember with loving gratitude. For his sorrowing relatives the prayer was that they might be supported by the sense of the public sympathy received, and cheered and consoled with the hopes of Christ's Gospel.

The Society for the Relief of Aged and Infirm Protestant Dissenting Ministers.—The ninety-fourth annual meeting of this useful society was held on Tuesday, May 28, at the Sunday School Union Offices, 56, Old Bailey, the Rev. John Brown, B.A., D.D., presiding. The Society affords assistance to ministers of the Baptist, Independent, and Presbyterian denominations, who through age and infirmity have had to retire from the ministry. The report presented by the secretary, Mr. James E. Flegg, showed that seven of the beneficiaries had passed away during the year. Two had been able to resume active service, and were in charge of churches, and their names had been removed from the list. Ten names, however, had been added, making the number on the list 70. Cases were from time to time brought before the Committee where the circumstances were specially distressing, and donations were granted to meet these special cases. In this way 12 ministers had been assisted, bringing the total number of cases relieved during the year up to 82. The sum of £939 had been expended in this effort to relieve the pressure on aged and infirm ministers. The letters from the recipients made it apparent how valuable the grants were, often arriving just in time to prevent disaster, or to meet urgent claims. Some of the subscribers had been removed by death, and an appeal was made that others would assist in carrying on the beneficent operations of the Society. A Committee drawn from the three denominations was appointed, viz., Sir Francis Belsey, Messrs. A. H. Baynes, G. W. Brown, J. Chown, C. F. Pearson, Ion Pritchard, H. Smith, E. Towers, E. Unwin, T. P. Warren, T. Wilson, and H. E. Wood; and the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, Dr. Brown, R. J. Evans, T. Greenwood, Jas. Harwood, and J. H. Shakespeare, with Mr. J. Martin Viney as treasurer, and Mr. James E. Flegg as secretary, from whom reports can be obtained.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE OXFORD.

THE ANNUAL PROCEEDINGS in connection with the CLOSING OF THE SESSION will take place at the COLLEGE on THURSDAY and FRIDAY, JUNE 20 and 21.

THE ANNUAL MEETING of TRUSTEES will be held at 12 o'clock noon on FRIDAY, JUNE 21.

A VALEDICTORY RELIGIOUS SERVICE will be held in the COLLEGE CHAPEL at 2.30 p.m. on FRIDAY, JUNE 21.

The FAREWELL On behalf of the COLLEGE will be given by the PRINCIPAL, and the

WELCOME into the MINISTRY by the Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

A. H. WORTHINGTON, B.A.,
1, St. James' Square,
Manchester. } Hon. Secs.
Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.,
3, Keats-grove,
Hampstead, London, N.W. }

UNIVERSITY HALL,

Gordon Square, W.C.

(Between Russell Square and Euston Square.)

Services at 11.15 and 7.

PREACHERS (both Services):

June 9.—Rev. Dr. S. H. MELLONE (Principal of the Home Missionary College, Manchester).

Subject in the evening: "Shakespeare on Industrial Morality."

" 16.—Rev. PRIESTLEY EVANS (of Bury).

" 23.—Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A. (of Leeds).

" 30.—Rev. RUDOLPH DAVIS, B.A. (of Gloucester).

July 7.—Rev. Dr. ESTLIN CARPENTER (Principal of Manchester College, Oxford).

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. | MISS CECIL GRADWELL.
Miss ORME. | HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION. EIGHTH SUMMER SESSION

For Sunday School Teachers and Workers,

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD,
FRIDAY, 28th JUNE, to SATURDAY, 6th JULY, 1912.

The Programme will include Morning Lectures, Evening Conferences, Socials, Boating, and Visits to Colleges.

Principal CARPENTER will give Three Lectures on "RELIGION IN THE TIME OF JESUS."

Mr. F. J. GOULD, Miss GRACE MITCHELL, Miss D. TARRANT, M.A., Revs. LAWRENCE CLARE, J. TYSSUL DAVIS, B.A., A. W. FOX, M.A., F. K. FREESTON, J. ARTHUR PEARSON, T. P. SPEDDING, G. W. TARRANT, B.A., J. J. WRIGHT, Mr. ION PRITCHARD will deal with various aspects of Sunday School Work.

Our Sunday Schools are urged to send representative Teachers. The total cost of Board and Lodging need not exceed 35s. for the Session, or 5s. a day.

Further details may be obtained from the Superintendent of your School, or from the Hon. Secretary, Sunday School Association, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL,
AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

CHANNING HOUSE SCHOOL,
HIGHGATE, N.—Wanted, in September, a resident Mathematical Mistress. Write, stating age, qualifications, experience, and subsidiary subjects offered. Salary £50, with laundry free.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.
—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad. Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon). Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

CROW'S NEST.—Mr. E. W. LUMMIS proposes to take a party to Eastern Switzerland in August. Inclusive cost: a fortnight abroad, 14 guineas; a month abroad, 19 guineas. Persons wishing to join should write early to 15, Green-street, Cambridge.

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCs.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z., INQUIRER OFFICE, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, LAYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

TO LET, Furnished, near Bournemouth, Lady's superior, well-kept house. Very pleasantly situated in select road on good elevation. Close to station, near church, shops, picturesque golf links. Piano, croquet, gas-cooker, plate, linen. Perfect sanitation. Fare, tram or train to Bournemouth, 2d. Small, careful party, 2½ guineas. Bargain. Trustworthy servant left.—Address C. P., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

FURNISHED COTTAGE TO LET. Large garden, pleasant surroundings, twenty minutes' walk from station, two sitting rooms, three bedrooms.—Yewhurst, Coombe Hill, East Grinstead.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by Christian Scientists.

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought. BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 135, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE
& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming Irish Linen Summer Costume Fabric, "Flaxzella," Washable. Wide range of fascinating designs. Beautiful shades, durable, looks smart for years.—Write, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

REMNANT BARGAIN!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen. Big pieces suitable for making Teacloths, Traycloths, D'oyleys, &c., 2s. 6d. per bundle. Postage 4d. Irish Linen Catalogue FREE.—Write, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY."—Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda. Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 1½d.—1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to EDITOR, "Dove-stone," Denton-road, Gorton, Manchester.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, June 8, 1912.

* * * Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3651.
NEW SERIES, No. 755.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 15, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.]

JUST PUBLISHED.

Elements of Psychology.

SECOND EDITION, REVISED

BY

S. H. MELLONE, M.A., D.Sc.,

Formerly Examiner in Philosophy in the Universities of St. Andrews, Edinburgh, and London;
Principal of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester;

Lecturer on the History of Christian Doctrine in the University of Manchester;

AND

MARGARET DRUMMOND, M.A.,

Lecturer in Psychology in the Training College of the Edinburgh Provincial Committee.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD AND SONS.
Price 5s.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,
ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
Miss ORME. HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought, BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 135, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE OXFORD.

THE ANNUAL PROCEEDINGS in connection with the CLOSING OF THE SESSION will take place at the COLLEGE on THURSDAY and FRIDAY, JUNE 20 and 21.

THE ANNUAL MEETING of TRUSTEES will be held at 12 o'clock noon on FRIDAY, JUNE 21.

A VALEDICTORY RELIGIOUS SERVICE will be held in the COLLEGE CHAPEL at 2.30 p.m. on FRIDAY, JUNE 21.

The FAREWELL On behalf of the COLLEGE will be given by the PRINCIPAL, and the

WELCOME into the MINISTRY by the Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

A. H. WORTHINGTON, B.A.,
1, St. James' Square,
Manchester. } Hon. Secs.
Rev. HENRY GOW, B.A.,
3, Keats-grove,
Hampstead, London, N.W. }

UNIVERSITY HALL,

Gordon Square, W.C.

(Between Russell Square and Euston Square.)

Services at 11.15 and 7.

PREACHERS (both Services):

June 16.—Rev. PRIESTLEY EVANS (of Bury).

„ 23.—Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A. (of Leeds).

„ 30.—Rev. RUDOLPH DAVIS, B.A. (of Gloucester).

July 7.—Rev. Dr. ESTLIN CARPENTER (Principal of Manchester College, Oxford).

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

THE AGGREGATE SERVICE for Teachers and Elder Scholars will be held at Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, on SUNDAY, JUNE 16, at 3.15 p.m., and will be conducted by Miss AMY WITHALL, B.A. All young people are cordially invited.

R. ASQUITH WOODING, Hon. Sec.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL, AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

CHANNING HOUSE SCHOOL, HIGHGATE, N.—Wanted, in September, a resident Mathematical Mistress. Write, stating age, qualifications, experience, and subsidiary subjects offered. Salary £50, with laundry free.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS. —Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad. Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon). Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

CROW'S NEST.—Mr. E. W. LUMMIS proposes to take a party to Eastern Switzerland in August. Inclusive cost: a fortnight abroad, 14 guineas; a month abroad, 19 guineas. Persons wishing to join should write early to 15, Green-street, Cambridge.

PEARL ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000
Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHRUBBALL, } Directors.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, June 16.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN, M.A.
 BERNONDESEY, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.
 Child's Hill, All Souls', Weech-road, Finchley-road, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. E. DAPLYN.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11, Rev. G. CRITCHLEY, B.A.; 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D., Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11, Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON; and 7.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. W. ROBSON, B.D.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Rev. JOHN ELLIS; 6.30, Mr. E. CARLETON.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11 and 7, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, M.A. Sunday School Anniversary.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. H. GOW, B.A.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. T. DAVENPORT BACON, of Salem, U.S.A.
 Ilford, High-road, 11 and 7, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Rev. Dr. TUDOR JONES.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11 and 6.30, Rev. F. HANKINSON.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 and 7, Rev. C. ROPER, B.A.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. ARTHUR PEARSON.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. F. W. G. FOAR, Litt.D., M.A.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLOR.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Mr. W. R. HOLLOWAY; 6.30, Rev. JOHN ELLIS.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C., 11.15 and 7, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. W. G. TARRANT.
 Wimbledon, 27B, Merton-road, 7, Mr. WM. LEE, B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11, Rev. JOSEPH WILSON.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. FRED. BROCKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30. Supply.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. WOOD.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. W. AUSTIN, M.A.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. BODELL SMITH.
 BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45, Scholars' Service; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.

BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. V. D. DAVIS.
 BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, M.A.
 BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.
 BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Churchgate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. GEORGE WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CAMBRIDGE, Assembly Hall, Downing-street, 11.30, Rev. E. W. LUMMIS, M.A.
 CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BECKH.
 (DEAN ROW, 10.45 and STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A.)
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. H. PICKERING.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS and Rev. H. W. KING.
 HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, School Services, Rev. E. I. FRIPP.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. J. R. RUSSELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. D. ROBERTS.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. C. ODGERS, B.A.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. AMHURST D. TYSSSEN.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. DOUGLAS WALMSLEY, B.A., of Windermere.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, Rusholme, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WHITAKER.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. ALFRED HALL, M.A.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. Dr. CARPENTER.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVERS.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. JAMES HARWOOD, B.A.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. NICOL CROSS, M.A.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. B. STALLWORTHY.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hoog-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

MARRIAGES.

MARTIN—CARSLAKE.—On June 7, at Toronto, Cyril Frederick Martin, eldest son of F. W. Martin, of Farquhar-road, Edgbaston, to Gwynedd, youngest daughter of J. Barham Carslake, of Westfield-road, Edgbaston.

SEDGFIELD—PROCTOR.—On June 8, at the Presbyterian Church, Manor-road, Stoke Newington, Walter, younger son of the late Henry Brougham Sedgfield, of Poole, Dorset, and Mrs. Sedgfield, 50, Whitehall-park, N., to Rachel Kathleen, youngest daughter of the late George and Sophie Proctor, of 7, Bruce-grove, Tottenham, N.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

FRUIT GROWING.—Vacancy occurs for a Pupil on a Fruit Farm and Market Garden. — RYLAND, Radford Nurseries, Leamington.

SITUATION as Clerk, Storekeeper, Overlooker, Collector, or any position of trust, required by business man (34). Moderate salary. — "CORNUBIAN," INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

TYPEWRITING.

SERMONS, ARTICLES, and MS. of every description accurately typed. 1s. per thousand words. Price List on application. — Miss KENNEDY, 21, Cheverton-road, Hornsey-lane, N.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	403
THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT:—
The Church of the Living God	404
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS:—
The Meaning of Progress	406
The Delectable Day	407
CORRESPONDENCE:—
The Shooting of Rare Birds	408
A Remarkable Gathering	408
Memorial of Dr. and Mrs. Sadler	408

BOOKS AND REVIEWS:—
The Land of Uz	408
The Church of To-morrow	409
Literary Notes	409
Publications Received	409
FOR THE CHILDREN	409
MEMORIAL NOTICE:—
The Rev. W. E. Atack	410

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES:—
The League of Liberal Christianity	410
National Conference	411
National Unitarian Temperance Assoc.	412
Central Postal Mission	413
British and Foreign Unitarian Association	414
NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	414
NOTES AND JOTTINGS	415

 All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

SIMPLICITY and sincerity are the supreme characteristics of all noble natures, and Frédéric Passy, the political economist and peace advocate, who has just died in Paris at the age of 90, was no exception to the rule in this respect. The following extract from his will gives a deeper insight into the soul of the man than any words of ours can do:—"I ask my friends above all not to enrol me in any party, sect, or school in politics, or religion or science. In the liberty of my weak judgment I belong to the great universal Church of all sincere spirits and all pure hearts who seek what is true and just. I hate nothing except that narrowness of spirit and that dryness of soul which because we are divided on secondary points prevents us from working together for the great causes in which we might easily unite." The words might well remind those who have enrolled themselves, at all events, under a religious banner that the true spirit of Christianity is not the sole possession of the Christian Churches. Pastor Wagner, the author of "La Vie Simple," who was Passy's friend, will conduct the funeral service. There will be no flowers or pomp. On the bier has been laid a plain cross and a wreath bearing the word "Paix."

* * *

M. PASSY, it will be remembered, founded (together with the late Sir E. Randal Cremer) the Inter-Parliamentary Union for Arbitration and Peace in 1888, and he was a member of the Committee of the Peace Bureau at Berne. In 1901 he received the Nobel Prize, sharing it with M. Dunant. He laboured in the cause of peace all his life without losing courage or confidence, and he used to say, when the futility of the efforts of the pacifists was pointed out in time of war, that to reproach them for their failure was like telling a farmer that "because too frequently hail and rain destroyed his crops there was no use in sowing, and that he was only exposing himself to inevitable disappointments." He was the author of numerous books on economics and education, and only last week, says the Times, he addressed a touching letter to the political economists from many foreign countries who had assembled in Paris to celebrate at once his 90th birthday and the 70th anniversary of the Paris Society of Political Economy, of which he was president.

* * *

At the annual public meeting of the International Arbitration and Peace Association, held on June 6 in Caxton Hall, the Baroness von Suttner was the chief speaker. The peace movement, she said, had three aspects. "As a religion we must preach it. As a science we must teach it. As a warfare we must fight it. Their ammunition is stronger than ours. They have the money, they have the men, they have behind them the ambition of the mighty, the greed of the selfish, the instincts of the ignorant. Never mind. We have behind us faith, the laws of the progress of nations, the law of evolution." We believe the Baroness is right in laying stress on faith as stronger than deep-rooted custom and selfish passions. War is one of the greatest and one of the most remediable of human evils. From the point of view of reason it is absurd. From the point of view of morality it is horrible. From the point of view of religion few men would dare to claim to-day that the nation which is in the right will win, and that a righteous God will secure justice through war. The system looks strong and deeply based in modern civilisation. It is really rotten to the core. It would crumble into ruins like the walls of Jericho before a determined faith.

* * *

THE news that the sentence on Miss Malecka has been commuted to expulsion for life from Russia, by Imperial decree, has caused much satisfaction to all lovers of justice and liberty, and will be especially gratifying to those who have laboured so assiduously to enlist the sympathy of right-minded people, both in Russia and England, on her behalf. The case has awakened unusual interest, and apart from the consequences to Miss Malecka herself, the episode will not have been without its good results if it has brought home to the public mind the absolute futility of trying to stamp out ideas by imprisoning the people who venture to express them. Of course, ideas become more persuasive and revolutionary in proportion to the depth of sincerity and the force of personality behind them when they find utterance, and we wonder how many people realise what a nuisance they would be to any Government in the world if they passionately transmuted into life and conduct some of the sayings of Jesus, which are eminently "dangerous" from the point of view of society as it is at present constituted.

* * *

WE rejoice that the Government has starred the Bill for Criminal Law Amendment in connection with the White Slave Traffic. The second reading was moved last Monday by its chief promoter, Mr. A. Lee, and after some discussion it was carried without a division. The chief point in the Bill is that it enables the police to arrest without a warrant men or women who are trying to deceive and destroy young women. It is aimed only at those who profit by this infamous and widely organised traffic, and it strengthens without much changing existing laws. It has been found impossible to interfere with this hideous traffic under present arrangements; while the policeman goes for a warrant the man to be arrested vanishes with his victim. It is no new principle in English law that a policeman in certain cases can arrest without a warrant before the crime is consummated. A policeman can arrest a man prowling round a house whom he suspects of burglary, he can arrest a man who is suspected of designs to murder, and he can even arrest a suspected poacher without going to a magistrate for a warrant. The right to arrest a man or woman who is deceiving a girl to her ruin is felt by all those who have studied this terrible subject to be of vital importance. It is one of those non-party measures, long desired and greatly needed, which for the most part have such a poor chance of passing because party spirit and enthusiasm is not evoked. We earnestly hope that the members of all parties in Parliament will for once unite in placing on the Statute Book a Bill for the further protection of innocent and unfriended girls.

* * *

THE following reference to the forthcoming jubilee of the Working Men's Club and Institute Union will be noted with especial interest by readers of THE INQUIRER. Mr. Hall, the secretary, writes from Club Union Buildings, Clerkenwell-road:—"Fifty years ago this club movement was started by the Rev. Henry Solly (a well-known Unitarian minister) with a view to securing better meeting places for workers than the poor and dirty public-houses then existing. Lord Brougham and Lord Lyttelton took part in the first meeting. . . . Mr. Solly's proposal commanded support from many distinguished men of varying shades of opinion. Among them were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, Professors Tyndall and Huxley, Lord Frederick Cavendish and Lord Rosebery, Sir Stafford Northcote, and Sir Charles Dilke. Queen Victoria gave both books and money, as did also King Edward, then Prince of Wales. After 20 years of struggle the Union became self-supporting, and its associated clubs now number nearly 1,500, with a membership closely approaching half a million. . . . The jubilee will be celebrated by a dinner at the Holborn Restaurant on June 14, for which Lord Brassey, Sir Edward Clarke, with several members of Parliament, have accepted invitations, and branch gatherings will take place in most provincial towns." It is well that the section of the Christian Church to which Mr. Solly belonged should be reminded of the great work he initiated fifty years ago, and should congratulate his friends and descendants on the occasion of this jubilee.

* * *

HEARTY congratulations are due to the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, who has accepted an invitation to the ministry of the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, in succession to the Rev. Joseph Wood. The loss to the High Pavement Church, Nottingham, can only be measured by those who really know something of Mr. Lloyd Thomas's personality, his eloquence and originality, his high courage and sincerity, above all, his absolute devotion to a spirit of the widest catholicity in religious thought and worship which makes him one of the most impressive and stimulating preachers of our time. He goes to Birmingham to take up the splendid work which Mr. Wood is at last compelled to give up, and we do not doubt that the beauty of the church of which he is to be the minister, the fine traditions for which it stands, and the surging life-currents which converge in a great industrial centre like Birmingham, will give fresh inspiration and scope to one whom we should always expect to find promoting the great causes of humanity where the fight is thickest and the need most urgent.

* * *

WE print in another column a letter from Mr. Lloyd Thomas drawing attention to the Summer School in connection with the Inter-Denominational Conference of Social Service Unions to be held at Swanwick, Derbyshire, June 22-29. As Mr. Thomas points out, the dream of securing the friendly co-operation of men and women of different denominations will actually be realised when this gathering takes place, and we should like to urge upon all those who have the time at their disposal to seize this unique opportunity of coming into contact with members of other religious communities than their own on the common ground of social sympathy. Nothing is more urgently needed at the present time than that those who really care for the welfare of others should be brought into contact, not only with people of their own way of thinking, but with those whose opinions may be different from theirs while their motive is the same. Nothing but good can come from the interchange of ideas and methods which are the outcome of such meetings, and all who are interested should send for the Summer School programme, which includes the names of Mrs. Margaret Alden, M.D., Mr. Charles E. B. Russell, Miss Gertrude Tuckwell, Mrs. Philip Gibbs, the Rev. A. J. Carlyle, the Rev. Will Reason, and Mr. B. Seebohm Rowntree.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT

THE CHURCH OF THE LIVING GOD.*

BY THE REV. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, D.D.

NOT much more than half a century ago Hampstead was still a village. Small parks and fields, not yet crowded with villas, sundered it from the great city which lay in the broad valley beneath its heights. Its High Street as it climbed the hill, its nooks and corners in retired lanes, were full of quaint old houses; and their occupants had their own life, their own traditions, their own interests of art and literature, their own intellectual and religious culture. Here had been formed some time after the passing of the Act of Uniformity whose fifth jubilee we commemorate this year, a little congregation of English Presbyterians under the ministry of Thomas Woodcock, a son of one of the clergy ejected in 1662. Their successors worshipped in my childhood under the pastorate of Thomas Sadler, who had drunk deep at the wells of Richard Baxter's piety, and imbibed a full measure of his catholicity of spirit. Round him were gathered men of affairs, of law, of science, of historic learning—it is enough amid the crowd of memories to name Edwin Field and Henry Sharpe among those who had given to the Hampstead of that day of their best—some coming from Highgate, some from the busy town, drawn by the attraction of a singularly pure and guileless spirit and the simplicity of homely worship. The chapel had been formed, so it was said, out of a stable attached to an adjoining mansion. One-third was added to its length in my boyhood, and a little later another third to its breadth, to provide room for the increasing number of those who found in it a resting-place from weekly care; and only the inability of the venerable walls to bear further expansion led to the erection of the building whose opening fifty years ago you commemorate this night.

That half-century has covered a mighty change. The village has expanded into a crowded borough, and linked itself by innumerable ties with the giant city on whose edge it stands. The growth of the population has created new responsibilities in every direction. You have not been unmindful of them. From Kentish Town to Kilburn you have aided the service of the poor, and the promotion of that worship which demands assent to neither creed nor rite. You have seen education spread over the land, and render the provision which you once made for the elementary teaching of the young no longer needful. You have beheld science extend the bounds of knowledge beyond our utmost dreams, and philosophy again and again re-interpret the mysterious relations of the soul, the world, and God. You have watched mighty movements as empires have fallen and risen, and nationalities have been reunited. You have gone in and out on the paths of daily labour while immense territories with vast native populations have been brought almost without our knowledge under British rule. You have witnessed an unexampled activity among the churches for the remedy of social ills at home, and the propagation of Christianity abroad. And you have followed from this quiet sanctuary of faith and prayer the studies which have transformed our religion from faith in a Book to faith in a Person. Truly did the preacher at the first worship in this place affirm that the function of the Christian Church is "to bring us home from the works and ways of God to communion with himself, to make time and place and lot, and life and death, no longer able to separate us from him." "The life of communion with the Divine Guide abiding in us, of personal affection towards himself and trust in the leadings of his thought . . . this," said James Martineau, "is the characteristic of the Christian mind." If you ask, then, for any venerable words which may fitly designate the spiritual reality of which these walls, this congregation, are the symbol, I would suggest those in 1 Timothy iii. 15:—

* Preached at the Jubilee of Rosslyn Hill Chapel, June 5, 1912.

"The House of God (the household or family of God), which is the Church of the Living God." And the "Living God," the same writer tells us, "is the Saviour of all men."

These words imply that God has a life which he is for ever communicating to the world and to humanity. This mighty truth, taught us anew by poet and seer in the last century, has now been brought back into our religion. The language of prophecy and psalm speaks once more intelligibly in our ears; and that conviction which lay in the heart of Jesus has been wrought into the tissue of our modern faith. That the universe in which we stand is no product of blind force; that its harmonies utter the thought, as its constancy embodies the will, of a Being who makes his appeal to us through perpetual creation; that we ourselves are summoned into this high fellowship through mind that traces out his ways, and conscience that recognises his law within our hearts, and affections of gratitude and trust and love that fill our souls; that here are secrets of hope, and solemnities of rebuke, and comforts in sorrow, and inspirations of endeavour, which flow in upon us from the envining Presence in which we live and move and have our being, and bear witness to the august communion into which he has deigned to call us—these are the notes of our religion, as it has been displayed to us in the teaching of this place.

We know, indeed, that the beloved pastors whose memories you recall this night were not unconscious of the stress and strain around them. They saw science come in like a flood, as the tides of new knowledge rose over the ancient landmarks, and threatened to engulf what were regarded as venerable truths. They saw the Scriptures which had been cherished as the ark of God examined with a fearless sincerity which brought every inconsistency to light, revealed each flaw, and gradually dissolved the authority with which they had been invested. They saw the national prosperity increasing by leaps and bounds, the simplicity of an elder generation passing into new modes, fresh habits being formed, and other interests awakened.

There were times when conviction tottered and apprehension quailed around them. They could confront such seasons with a fearless gaze. They had been nurtured in a faith that was not injured if the geology of the Bible proved erroneous, or its history too short for our time-scale. They had been taught to find its sanctions in the human heart, in the experience of life interpreted by the purest and wisest of our race. There were the testimonies of the Living God, there were the voices which brought living words from heaven. There was the guarantee that however theologies might change, and worship even cease for a time to engage the continuous interests of the soul, it was only to prepare for new developments of faith in which the superstitions and narrowness of the past should be left behind. "So far as the ultimate prospects of religion are concerned," said Dr. Sadler more than twenty years ago, "the present aspect of things does not give me a moment's uneasiness, any more than a few days of cloudy weather give me uneasiness about the sky. Of nothing am I more convinced than that man cannot do without religion, and that as the sun never fails to dispel after a while the clouds which enshroud the sky, so the light of heaven will not fail to penetrate the mists which at times gather about the human heart. We learn from history that it has been so again and again, and we learn also that ages of the brightest faith are often heralded by a period of darkness." And Dr. Herford, looking back over a life's experience, gathered among rich and poor, the men of the world and the men of thought, on both sides of the Atlantic, with that courage and cheer which sustained so many trembling spirits, declared that the recovery of religious faith was one of the most practical questions of the day. "This last generation," he told us among his final words, "has been a time of great unsettlement in religion. Multitudes who were brought up in the older creeds of the churches have found themselves obliged to give them up, and at last many have found themselves without any faith, all adrift." But with most people, he added, any mood of antagonism to religion is only temporary; and he bade us rest in the great thoughts and feelings which come to us we know not how, unsought, unsummoned, monitions from a source above ourselves. "The uplook to some infinite life that is in the vast whole"; "the sense of an infinite care that somehow leads on the worlds"; "the sense of something in man and man's best life too great to die"—these are "the fruits of keeping touch with the old worshipping habit of the world."

For the primary function of the Church is worship. The life which it seeks to foster will have various aspects, but its root will lie in the endeavour to surrender ourselves to the indwelling presence of the All-Holy, to accept his discipline, to submit ourselves joyfully to his will, to bless him for his constant mercies, and work with him as the lowly ministers of his purposes. The truth we apprehend through it must needs be ethical, as it unfolds to us continually higher ideas of righteousness, presiding over the paths of our daily walk. It will be scientific, as it discloses to us more and more of the meaning, the history, the constitution of the world in which we have been set to play our part for God and man. It will be social, as it reveals to us with increasing clearness the mysterious ties that bind us each to each all round the globe, and suggests to us new ideas of service to the community in which we dwell. But the Church is not a hall of ethical culture, nor a class-room for teaching, nor a laboratory for technical investigation, nor a club for social reform. On its different sides it may touch each or all of these, for it must infuse the spirit of righteousness and trust into all callings, but it is something wider and deeper, which lives beneath, above, and through them all. Do you ask what is its essence, what it is which gathers its members together in a common act? Its central purpose is worship, the expression of man's relation to the unseen, conceived as no dead power but as Living Spirit, to whom he may utter his thankfulness, offer his trust and love, confess his failures, and through whom he may enter into peace. It is on the reality of its worship that the vitality and force of the Church depend. By this I do not mean exclusively the forms of devotion which follow each other with customary usage in what we still sometimes call "divine service." You may place yourself in the presence of God, you may consecrate to him your being and your powers, you may ask his aid in your best efforts, among the solitary hills, alone with the silent spaces of the divine immensity, or amid the throngs of men and women in the rushing tides of humanity in city streets along the common ways of daily toil. The path of prayer is for ever open, and the spirit of God does not confine himself to our weekly calendar. But the members of the household of God know that these high moments, which are like summit eras in our lives, rise out of many lowlier hours. They are not satisfied only to pray alone. They need each other's sympathy in the sublime converse with heaven. They are quickened into warmer gratitude, into more poignant consciousness of shortcoming, into more strenuous resolve, by sharing the experience of their brethren. They live by the inherited labours of innumerable generations; and the struggles and the trusts, the sorrows and the satisfactions, the energy of endeavour, the pain of defeat, the joy of victory, felt by a multitude of kindred souls, beat in their own desires, and prompt their own aspirations. But, just as in the household of the home the elder and the young, the strong and the weak, the inexperienced and the mature, with every range of difference in physical vigour, intellectual outlook, and moral power, are knit together in a common life with mutual offices of helpfulness and trust, of labour and patience, ever educating the heart in gentleness and self-sacrifice and love, so is it—ideally at least—in that household of faith which we call "the Church of the Living God." The worshipper who thinks only of what he can get, of the strength which he is to receive, of the help which is to be given him, will come away unsatisfied, for he has carried nothing to the common store. You will depart unwarmed and fretful, if you first come in cold and dull. You will be fastidious about the music, superior towards the prayers, critical of the sermon, because you have let the dead weight of your indifference fall upon each act, demanding that the worship should move you, when you should yourself have been upholding the worship. Ah, let us remember that if each one of us has his own secrets whose joys or cares are known only to God, we belong also to a mighty fellowship. Even in the gladness of sacred song or the murmur of general confession we hear each one of us more than our own gratitude or humiliation before God. The trusts which are most sacred and sustaining to ourselves beat in the company of kindred souls. They link us to the corporate piety of Christendom. They spread far beyond the sacred name of Christ. They pass the limits of our mortality. For, wherever there are conscious spirits throughout the range of creation in all worlds, communing with the Father of our being, there is "the household which is the Church of the Living God."

Is not such a confidence the natural result of fifty years of common devotion in this place? Not many, indeed, can respond with unbroken continuity to such a question. Out of the distinguished company of ministers who were present around the pastor on the opening day, but one venerable figure, the Rev. T. L. Marshall, still survives. Of the honoured roll of laymen, some have passed away leaving no inheritors of their names, though many—let us trust—of their spirit. Those of us who were then looking forward to entering life now cast our glances backward; we remember the days of old; we meditate on all God's doings. And how rich and manifold are the treasures which memory thus brings to the aid of faith. I will not limit my appeal to the little band of my own contemporaries. It matters not whether our period be long or short, to all of us there are some moments outstanding amid the dimmer recollections of the past, when we have known that it was good for us to be here. The voice of the preacher has spoken to us out of an experience wider than our own. The piety of Dr. Sadler, like a deep silent pool, held within it innumerable reflections, the lights and shadows of the life around, folded within the encompassing sky. The supporting optimism of Brooke Herford was no trick of temperament or sport of nature; it was the rich fruit of varied knowledge of men and things, of untiring labour, of failure and disappointment as well as of achievement and success. Their words of prayer or teaching appealed to us through the vicissitudes of our own lives. From them some of us drew our first knowledge and practice of religion outside the imperishable lessons of the home. They made themselves the friends of our earlier years. They understood our gladness and our grief. They knew the meaning of our struggles. They could interpret our unfulfilled endeavours; they made the voice of praise or the aspiration after righteousness a reality and a delight. They showed us how bravely to endure pain, how to face hardship, how to suffer loss without repining, how to fight the good fight with cheerful courage, how to carry a Christian simplicity and steadfastness amid the world's glittering trials. We may not have learned all the lessons that they sought to teach; but those who have received their early impressions in the worship of this place, whether in former or in recent years, will never forget its lessons of spiritual faithfulness, of loyalty to truth, of lowly reverence, of abiding trust.

Another generation may bring grave problems into view which those who went before us could not see. A philosophy of materialism has been practically driven off the field, but new conceptions of social justice loom vague and undefined out of the unrest around us, and the Church cannot remain indifferent to them. It must labour to give them noble shape. It must hold up the highest ideals of equity and love. It must kindle the flame of sacrifice for the common good. For this is the method by which God trains us to do his will; he sets us fresh tasks, needing a higher wisdom, patience, sympathy, in the great education of mankind as his children. This is our privilege—to be fellow-workers with him; this is how we discharge our debts to the past, and show our faith in the future. Looking back over the long roll of the heroes and the saints of Israel, the writer of that letter to the Hebrews which constituted the first great apology for Christianity, described them as not having "received the promise, that apart from us they should not be made perfect." The past in truth, is never completed. It lives on in the present, and each stroke of our faithful work accomplishes some little portion of the great purpose which we, in turn, hand on to our successors. Through it there breathes the perennial guidance of the Living God. Commit yourselves to him, then, without fear, for "of him and through him and to him are all things." "Wherefore, my beloved brethren," pastor and people of this congregation, "be ye steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not vain in the Lord."

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

THE MEANING OF PROGRESS.

PROGRESS is a word of which our age is very fond. When an orator wishes to drive home some nail of eloquence he thunders out it syllables and waits for the applause they always evoke. The reactionary as well as the "advanced" politician knows its value, and borrows its term in order to give discredited principles, long since worn thread-bare, the appearance of up-to-dateness. Yet how few of the crowds in whom it rouses a vague response ever pause to question its significance, for, though it is an old thing on the earth, its meaning is only now being grasped. It has become in fact the key-word of the Twentieth Century. It was not always thus; there have been periods when whole generations and races have simply marked time. Take, for instance, the early Christian centuries. If we give "progress" its modern meaning, then we see clearly that the people of that time did not understand the term. The world had run up, as it were, against the thought of Eternity, and all earthly movements towards Art, Literature, or Social Science received a check. The vision of the saint had lost its true perspective, and just as in certain atmospheres mountains which are thirty miles away seem close at hand, the things of Eternity appeared so real that mundane matters assumed in comparison trivial importance. The end of the world was considered imminent. What reason was there then to develop the resources of a doomed earth? The Gospel winged with mercy and fear spread through the nations, and men prepared for a Judgment Throne, but forgot that it had first to be built, and that by the aid of human hands. A perfected society, a humanity which has absorbed the Spirit of God and clothed life with righteousness, and shown the ideal and the possible not in words but in fact, such will form the vantage ground from which the Great Judge will speak His sentence. For this, progress is demanded, the slow advance of the centuries. The early Christians were believers in the ready-made, they overlooked the art of making. Yet theirs was not an idle task, they imparted the leaven which was to stimulate growth, which when brought into contact with the fertilising thought of a Past, for the moment buried, would produce progress.

If we wish to discover the origin of modern progress, we must go back to the days of ancient Greece. There we shall find the seed, which for centuries lay, as it were, in a mummy case awaiting the contact of Christianity to quicken it into life. Perhaps the pediment on the Parthenon at Athens can give us a clue. There we see carved figures full of suggestive symbol. Athena, the conqueror of darkness, stands supreme. Around her she has marshalled the hosts of Beauty, Learning, Truth, and Wisdom. Before their advance the exhausted steeds of night take their final plunge into the waves of oblivion; while behind the chariot of dawn is seen in its triumphant course to peep above the eastern horizon. It was the prophetic vision of a far-off day. Not easily were the shades of ignorance dispelled, and for many a century after the Christian era began they still held sway.

Rome had admired Athens and sent her youths to seek its culture, but she never understood the inner secret of the latter's wisdom. Her teachers imitated rather than imbibed the spirit of the Greek sages. She borrowed much, but after all it was only the externals, the dress but not the life. How otherwise can we explain the sequel to Stoicism and Roman philosophy? There we find the seed ideas of Greece opened out in flower, but the moment we study the process we see that it is artificial. Roman writers, copying the heroics of Greece, extolled liberty, yet freedom lessened instead of increased. They repeated the teaching of Plato, yet in place of human life becoming more valued it diminished in dignity; progress became extinct, and with the victories of the Goths it seemed as if the hands of the clock had been put far back. Though the Church absorbed the new element, yet it did not resurrect the dead "Progressive " Spirit. The years went on, and the tread of generations only beat down harder the soil on the grave of "Progress." Yet, though buried, it still contained the seed of life, and impatiently awaited the hour of its awakening. This came with the Renaissance. The spirit of Greece was revived, and at last understood, and it was this spirit coming now for the first time into real touch with Christianity that produced "Progress." The value of the individual became realised, and at once a blow was struck at Feudalism; Democracy was born. Reason, emancipated from serfdom, regained the throne usurped by Force. Descartes incarnated the new-born spirit, and his writings became a megaphone that shouted the notes of optimism and progress over a drowsy world, which was already turning in its sleep. Henceforth the face of mankind was directed towards the future in place of the past, and the eyes have opened farther ever since, until to-day the modern world is surely wide enough awake.

And yet the ploughshare of "Progress" has not dug very deeply into the subsoil of human nature. A great deal of surface work has been done, and the result only shows that much of the effort has been disappointing. Progress is a profounder thing than most men imagine. For instance, read the speeches of political orators a generation or two ago, and you would imagine from some of their statements that democracy was the solution of all evils. Their dreams of advance have been realised, but they have brought with them things they little dreamed of. Injustice has changed form, but still remains. Majorities are often more tyrannical than the old-fashioned autocrat. Trusts are more pitiless for they have no heart to which one can appeal. While there has been progress, its path has been strewn with disappointed hopes.

All this testifies to the enormous down-pulling weight of evil. To force a way upward against such a gravitating power will ever be a struggle in which souls will gasp and faint until the purer air is reached. There will be slips backward, and the ground will be regained only at great cost; while every step will only be won, as of old, by the sacrifice of the martyr, whether he be social reformer, scientist, or religious pioneer. Blood is the only cement that fixes in their place the stones on the upward stair of progress. Newer patents have been tried, but the moment humanity endeavours to rise on such steps they give way beneath its weight.

Still there are signs that a higher elevation is being slowly reached. Reverence for human life is becoming heightened, and just as in industrial enterprise, more attention is being turned to the waste products, and what before was considered worthless is now being redeemed. Again, ignorance is disappearing, and with it are vanishing the evils it fostered. The bundle of life is becoming a phrase more and more descriptive of humanity. The number of cords binding ever closer the different races is constantly on the increase. Separation breeds suspicion, while familiarity begets faith. The thin wire, hidden away in its tube, resting on the ocean bed, has been a most effective aid to veracity; and now the very air itself with its voiceless Marconigrams is seeming to breathe abroad over the face of the whole world the spirit of truth. Before it prejudice dies and war fevers abate, and there is stimulated a growing respect for the judgment of others. There is a deepening consciousness too amongst the nations of responsibility to a Higher Power. In fact, when we probe to the centre we find that the dynamic of all true progress is faith in God.

THE DELECTABLE DAY.

"Pleasures are like poppies shed;
You seize the flower; the bloom is fled!
Or like a snowflake in the river,
A moment here . . . then gone for ever!"

SUCH is Pleasure; and what of Happiness? Is it any less elusive? Who can tell how it comes, how it goes? Are we even aware of its presence, when it does pay one of its angel-visits?

And after all, supposing that we could express, in cut-and-dried words, our conception of Happiness, cui bono? What use in putting into words what is just a subtle, precious possession, belonging to one's very inward self! What is Happiness? What matter! It just "happens"; and perhaps philologists may trace some common origin for the two words. For surely Happiness is most often an unexpected thing; and as surely it evades deliberate pursuit. It just "is"; and oh! sing hosannas when it comes your way! Seize it with both hands and hold it with careful grasp. No particular quality or cause, therefore, entered into the composition of the Delectable Day. It was just devoted to a very ordinary excursion, undertaken by a family which perhaps to outsiders appears very ordinary too. But that merely shows want of insight in these benighted onlookers. They know no better. What consciousness have they of the Mutual Admiration Society that exists in this same family?—an excellent ingredient in a home, being based upon Love and Forbearance; this last being an essential, especially among the younger members. Here, the central figure of the cult is, the Mother. Be it added that though, thank God! one meets worshippers every day at that shrine, there are degrees of enthusiasm among them.

The Delectable Day, then, happened in June, when,

"If ever, come perfect days."

Poets may not always be right, but this saying is true. Being a June day, it was, of course, a long day. It opened for the Family at nine o'clock in the morning, when a passing train was boarded; yet was it all too short for the happiness it was to hold. The object of their journey was a certain lonely, lovely valley in the heart of Wicklow. The home being quitted was as pretty, as "homey" as human heart could desire. A generous garden encircles it; beyond is wide outlook over hill and sea. So it was not the force of contrast that heightened the charm of the Delectable Day to so warm a glow. But the sources of happiness are as mysterious as those of the Nile itself.

It was an absolute necessity that the party should travel together. Fortunately, carriages that adjoined were available, separated only by a half-way partition. These were invaded by a swelling wave of tall youths and maidens, agreeably aware of suitable summer garments. The parents were established in corners, where they sat, smiling and observant; the rest of the party were about as placid as a hedgeful of sparrows or a hive of bees. They were much noisier than either. I daresay the laughter was out of all proportion to the wit; like Falstaff's half-penny-worth of bread to the intolerable deal of sack! But what of that? The quality of the mirth was all right; gay and wholesome as the makers of it.

In a corner seat, when they had entered, a cleric was already established, grave and white-haired, who, amid all the merriment that ensued, continued patiently reading his book of devotion, now and then closing his eyes to meditate thereon. And the fact that he obviously belonged to a Church differing in some of its ways from that to which the Delectable Family owed allegiance, was an added reason for the Mother to address a few words of apology to him as she was leaving the train with her flock.

In reply, a kind old hand was laid upon hers, and a kind old voice said, "My child, it has been a happiness to look on at happiness such as yours."

The words sounded like a benediction, an echo from a heavenly mind; removed, aloof, yet still very humanly sympathetic. It served to sanctify the day, to hallow it as if for worship, though the journey had been set about for pleasure—

"Not to the domes, where crumbling arch and column

Attest the feebleness of mortal hand;
But to that fane, most catholic and holy,
Which God hath planned.

"To that cathedral, boundless as our wonder,

Whose quenchless lamps the sun and moon supply,

Its choirs the winds and waves; its organ thunder,

Its dome the sky . . ."

It heightened and spiritualised the delights of driving along the flowery, fragrant mountain roads. The hawthorn that " . . . comes in beauty and in beauty blows away,"

was sending down drifts of white petals, so that one of the girls was moved to declare that their way looked like a bridal path. Indeed, the country was half hidden beneath layers of warm snow, so luxuriant was the bloom of the hawthorn. Furze was in equal profusion; a hill covered with it was declared to be a throne of gold ready for a fairy queen. At the foot of this hill lies a lake, in which the furze mirrored itself, so that the water resembled molten gold. And oh! the tender, laughing beauty of the little mountain fields of corn shimmering like green silk as the warm June winds sweep over them.

"Unprofitably gay" may be the weeds by the wayside, but how beautiful they are at this season! The very nettles show soft waving plumes of French grey, in happy contrast with their slender crimson stems; and grey predominates in the "goslings" of the sally-bushes (willows), as if they were really turning into grey geese, and losing their first yellow baby down. The young uncurling ferns are as thick as they can stand, still undefiled by passing motors. Such patches of crowfoot—of white and purple clover! Such buttercups, and rock-roses and bladder-campions! Such dog-daisies and heather, and even early poppies! And among them all run and gurgle such gay, sparkling little brown streams from the hills.

On the homeward way the setting sun shone through the red stems of a pine wood, supplying a new fragrance, as well as a fresh vision of beauty. For while the shafts of light penetrated here and there, through rifts in the heavy foliage, they did not dispel the great shadows that lay beneath, and added a lovely mystery, a sense of retreating presences, to the solemn splendour of the wood; like Life itself, whose clouds have their values as well as the sunshine.

Here, all told, was our Delectable Day. Very simple; really nothing to tell about. Herein, perhaps, lies one difference between Pleasure and Happiness. Pleasure comes from outside, from things done; Happiness lies deeper, and comes from within. Pleasure is evanescent; while such happiness as that of the Delectable Day remains a fragrant and lovely memory, to be laid up among the treasures that never are lost.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

THE SHOOTING OF RARE BIRDS.

SIR,—I wish to express my sympathy with the protest made by Mr. Joseph Collinson, quoted in your columns. Any one who has heard the wonderful sound of the bittern, and caught a rare glimpse of that most interesting bird on our fens and marshes, will agree with me that it is a shameful loss that this and other birds mentioned by Mr. Collinson should now so seldom be seen and heard in Great Britain. What is the sense of shooting and otherwise destroying these infrequent visitors almost as soon as they are found? The argument seems to be this: the bird is rare, therefore we must by the utmost means in our power prevent it from ever again becoming common.

Apart from the stupid cruelty of these so-called "sportsmen," and apart from the vandalism (there is no fitter name for it) of destroying beautiful and wonderful creatures of nature, is there not something startlingly inconsistent in the notion that because a bird is uncommon, therefore it may with impunity be denied the chance of living and breeding in this country?—Yours, &c., N. D. DEUCHAR.

Glasgow, June 10, 1912.

A REMARKABLE GATHERING.

SIR,—Will you be so good as to permit me, as chairman of the Committee of our Social Service Union, to call the attention of your readers to a forthcoming gathering of the utmost importance and significance? We sometimes dismiss as a beautiful, ineffectual dream the hope of securing the really close and intimately friendly co-operation of Roman Catholic and Protestant, Anglican and Nonconformist, Sacerdotal Ritualist and Quaker, Trinitarian and Unitarian. Yet, as a matter of simple fact, this dream will be realised in the Inter-denominational Conference of Social Service Unions to be held at "The Hayes," Swanwick, Derbyshire, June 22-29. It will be an assembly quite unprecedented in the history of English Christianity, including, as it will, all the Social Service Unions of the country—Roman, Anglican, Congregational, Friends', National Conference, Presbyterian, Primitive Methodist, United Methodist, Wesleyan, and Baptist.

Our own people may have special joy in this Conference as it arose directly out of a suggestion made at the Summer School of our Social Service Union at Manchester College, Oxford, when I had the honour of being president. The Wesleyans and the Friends, however, deserve the chief credit for having readily accepted the suggestion then made, and which will now result in this extraordinarily encouraging fellowship. It is quite safe to say that no such stimulating and fruitful concourse of experts, students, and workers in the great field of social reform has ever yet been held, and it will be a happy and a proud thing for us to be able to say in years to come that we were present at the first actually comprehensive gathering of the kind. The programme is an exceptionally interesting one, the terms moderate, and return railway fares will be issued at the customary reduction. The place is specially adapted for Summer School purposes. The grounds are about 40 acres in extent and well wooded. When tired of lectures and discussions, the guests may find every recreation, for there are fine tennis lawns, a croquet lawn, a fives court, and an enclosed swimming bath, as well as other delightful attractions.

Applications for programmes or membership should be addressed to the Rev. J. J. Stark Ashmead, Orleans-road, Upper Norwood, S.E., or to Miss Lucy Gardner, The Mill House, Wormingford, Colchester.—Yours, &c.,

J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

Nottingham, June 8, 1912.

MEMORIAL OF DR. AND MRS. SADLER.

MISS E. MABEL CASE, writing from Arcadia Gate, Tenterden, informs us that she has a good many copies of the little memorial volumes that were printed after the deaths of Dr. and Mrs. Sadler, to whom so many references were made at the meeting at Rosslyn Hill Chapel last week. Miss Case will be glad to send copies to anyone who will write to her at the above address.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE LAND OF UZ.

The Land of Uz. By Abdullah Manshūr (G. Wyman Bury). With 38 Illustrations, a Map, and a Preface by Major-General P. J. Maitland, C.B. 8vo. Pp. xxviii-354. London: Macmillan & Co. 8s. 6d. net.

To the numerous travellers whose acquaintance with South Arabia is limited by the jagged rock-pinnacles of Aden and Perim, it will seem little short of incredible that at Lahej, barely twenty miles distant from sun-scorched Aden, "there are miles of date groves and heavenly scented gardens of lime, orange, banana and cocoanut, among which one may linger in the heat of the day, with an occasional dip into an irrigation channel, listening to the liquid, nightingale tones of the bush cuckoo." The attractiveness of the picture is, however, marred by the evil reputation of these oases for malaria. Even on the high plateaux beyond the inhospitable coast cultivation is by no means inconsiderable; "the main range, a high rampart of 7,000 to 9,000 feet, which forms the backbone of Southern Arabia, together with a broad belt of country north and south of it, are marvellously fertile and—except in the more inaccessible mountain districts—in a high state of cultivation. There is a regular and adequate rainfall in the summer, while in the cold weather a dense wet fog comes up at dusk and lies till nearly 9 a.m., supplying sufficient moisture to avoid any break in agriculture." In the days of old, when Balkis, Queen of Sheba, left this country to pay her famous visit to King Solomon, the width of this fertile belt must have been much greater in order to support the many cities with forgotten temples and palaces that now lie half-buried in the sand of the Great Red Desert—the Empty Quarter, as the Arabs so graphically term this vast waste. It is evident that the country has relapsed greatly into barbarism under the domination of Mahomedanism, and it may be doubted whether it will ever rise again under the system of tribal vendettas and the sense of insecurity engendered by the levying of toll upon venturesome caravans which seek to establish commercial relations with the villages of the hinterland. Although his religion is very real to the hillsman, he is, according to the author, "a bigoted fanatic in the letter and narrow dogma of his creed, yet complacently ignorant of its fundamental truths and spiritual teaching." On the other hand, the women enjoy a striking amount of independence and freedom compared to the inhabitants of any other Islamic country, excepting perhaps among the Kurds of the Armenian Highlands. The first half of the book deals with the author's participation in a military expedition that was rendered necessary by the hostility of certain hill tribes towards the Anglo-Turkish Boundary Commission; whilst the second half is an equally vivid and racy account of the adventurous and hazardous journeys of the author, who made his way through the country dressed as a native hillsman. Since the time when Sir Richard Burton penetrated to Mecca in Mahomedan disguise no one could be better qualified than the intrepid author, with his intimate knowledge of the language and of local customs, to penetrate into districts where it would be madness for any traveller less well equipped in these respects to venture, and it is to be hoped that Mr. Bury may, as Abdullah Mansûr, continue his explorations so as to lift the veil from this ancient and mysterious land.

FELIX OSWALD.

THE CHURCH OF TO-MORROW. T. H. Crooker. London: The Lindsey Press. 2s. 6d. net.

It is always stimulating to ponder the pages of a prophetic writing, even when, as not uncommonly happens, there is in it more criticism of the past than forecast of the future. Mr. Crooker, like a true prophet, is a voice and not an echo, but is less concerned with what has been than what he believes is to be. Of the six chapters in this volume two are devoted to the methods and tasks of the Church, one to its teaching, another to its worship, which pulpit and pew claim one chapter each. The conception of the church is marked by a fine catholicity. "Difference of opinion respecting obscure texts and metaphysical problems ought never to bar any man from the church of God. The fellowship of the spirit ought never to be limited by dogmatic tests."

In his statement of the Church's task, Mr. Crooker strikes one as unnecessarily timid in the presence of the socialistic wave now invading the churches, and not very accurate in his description of it. The emphasis upon changed material conditions as essential unto salvation, so characteristic of certain modern politicians, is met by an insistence upon the power of personality to shape environment which is scarcely less untrue. It may be the case that "a perfect human society can come into existence only as we have perfect individuals of whom to make it." Nevertheless, it remains the duty of the Christian Church to remove bonds and temptations from the weak and wayward rather than to demand that these feeble folk shall break them or be damned.

Again the statement "It is a fallacy to teach that a majority of drinkers drink because they are poor" is only half a truth. Poverty, in the opinion of those best acquainted with the facts, is as much a cause as it is a result of the habit of drinking.

For our author's view of the message of the Church and of the functions of pulpit and pew we have nothing but praise. A discussion of the purpose of prayer is rational and reverent, though the forms of public worship are not considered. One sentence should be written in letters of gold, "the congregation is at work for religion only when its methods and aims are spiritual; to help a soul, not simply to pay a church debt; to elevate the general moral tone of the community, not simply to provide it recreation; to make sinners repent and sufferers rejoice, not simply to increase church attendance." The Church of To-morrow is obviously American in its language and sentiment. Not yet do American modes of spelling commend themselves to English taste, and Church life on the other side of the Atlantic is not the same as on this side. But with these reservations, it may be frankly said that this is a book which members of our Free Christian Churches would do well to read.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE Bookman is publishing, on June 28, a Keats-Shelley Memorial Souvenir in connection with the forthcoming Haymarket Theatre Matinées, in aid of the fund that is being raised to pay off the debt on the Keats-Shelley Memorial House at Rome. The Souvenir will be lavishly illustrated, and will contain presentation portraits of Keats and Shelley, numerous portraits of the poets and of their friends, photographs and sketches of places associated with them in England and in Italy, and reproductions of many drawings and paintings illustrating scenes from their works. The literary contents will comprise articles on Keats and Shelley by William Watson, H. Buxton-Forman, Mark Rutherford and Jane Barlow, and an important article on the art of Arthur Severn, R.I., R.O.I., the son of Keats' friend, illustrated with reproductions of two of his paintings.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. have in preparation a series of text-books dealing with philosophy from the historical point of view. The series, which is edited by Sir Henry Jones, will comprise (1) the History of Greek Philosophy as one continuous development; (2) the History of Modern Philosophy in parallel movements from Descartes to Kant, and from Hobbes to Reid; and from Kant through his Idealist successors on the one side, and through his Naturalist successors on the other. Finally, the Application of Philosophy will be shown (a) in Educational Theory, (b) in Political Theory. The first volume, "The Evolution of Educational Theory," by Dr. John Adams, has just been published. "The History of Greek Philosophy from Thales to Aristotle," by Professor John Burnet, and of "Modern Philosophy from Hobbes to Reid," by Professor G. F. Stout, are expected in the autumn.

THE same firm also publishes a new book of stories and sketches, just out, by Mr. Stephen Reynolds entitled, "How 'Twas," and "Pan's Garden," a volume of nature studies by Mr. Algernon Blackwood, in which the idea that in all the universe there is nothing dead, familiar to readers of The Centaur, is further developed. Mention should also be made of an important series of historical essays by Mrs. J. R. Green, "The Old Irish World," published by Messrs. Macmillan. The volume includes "Tradition in History," an article which appeared four years ago in the Nineteenth Century, and which is now reprinted at the request of Irish friends.

MISS MAY SINCLAIR, the well-known novelist, has written a new book entitled

"The Three Brontës" which will shortly be published by Messrs. Hutchinson. Miss Sinclair is said to have formed a personal view of the Brontës independent of the purely traditional one, and certainly we should expect that her treatment of the subject would be at once penetrating and sympathetic.

MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD'S volume on "Syndicalism" is another book which will undoubtedly be read with great interest in view of some of the latest developments of industrial unrest. It appears in Messrs. Constable's series of "Philosophies, Ancient and Modern." Contributions to this series by Mr. J. M. Robertson, M.P., and Mr. D. L. Murray will appear at a later date.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

THE CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS:—Silas Marner: George Eliot. 1s.

MESSRS. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD.:—Comédies and Proverbs, Vol. II.: Alfred de Musset. 1s. net. De l'Amour: Stendall. 1s. net.

THE LINDSEY PRESS:—Man's Chief End: Robert B. Drummond, B.A., T.C.D. 1s. net. Communings with the Father: James C. Street. 1s. 6d. net.

MESSRS. LONGMANS, GREEN & Co.:—Some Weak Points in Christian Socialism A. Sanday, D.D. 1s. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Review of Reviews.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

A TRAGEDY OF SPRINGTIME.

RAYs of sunshine fell aslant through branches of larch and oak upon a glossy green holly-tree where a thrush had built her nest. The place was most carefully chosen, both for safety and beauty of situation. You could see the crimson tassels of the larch-blossom above you, and without moving from one spot you could see hundreds of primrose blossoms on the hedge-side below. It was a tall straight holly-tree, ten feet high. The lower branches had been cut away because they had clustered around the latch-post of a field gate; and when the ploughman had come along, with his team of horses, the prickly holly leaves had scratched his hands as he loosened the chain and lifted the latch. So they cut off the side branches, and what might have been only a holly-bush had grown upward into a tall holly-tree with a dense clump of foliage at the summit, which sparkled in the sunlight.

This was the place the thrush had selected as a hiding-place for her nest. No one could possibly see it. The holly is ever green; and in the month of April and during the early days of May, when the thorn and the sloe have not yet grown their leaves, the holly is a splendid hiding-place for a mother's treasure, when the mother happens to be a thrush and her treasure happens to be a nest containing four young affectionate hungry thrushes.

But these four young birds had known nothing of real hunger or cold, for the mother was constantly arriving at the edge of the nest with food all day long from sunrise until sunset; and when the nights were frosty she brooded over them with the protecting warmth of her body so that they never knew what the frost might have caused them to suffer. They were very happy. But disasters always come when they are least expected. One bright morning when each of the young birds had been fed three or four times, and were all feeling cosy and comfortable beneath the rays of sunlight, the mother had gone out in search of food near some gradens where working-men grew flowers and vegetables and bush-fruits for their own families. It happened that a man who rented one of these gardens had a son about twelve years old. He had been unwell, and had been nursed by his mother and kept away from school for a few days; but, as the day was bright and warm, he had been allowed to go to the garden to plant potatoes in a certain corner which he called his own.

The thrush saw him. But, because he was a gentle-looking boy, and because the men who tended these gardens were quiet nature-loving men, she ventured quite near to the boy as he pushed his spade into the soft brown earth. There were so many slugs and wire-worms uncovered with each turn of the spade that if she had known him better, and had been able to trust him, she would have hunted quite close to him as she sought food for the little ones in the holly-tree. But, as she did not like to take such a risk, she turned her back to him, and began tapping smartly with her beak on the grassy sward about twelve yards distant. This was a plan which caused worms to come to the surface sometimes, and she was looking intently at a place in the grass where the blades were trembling as if a worm were just emerging from the roots into the light of day, when the boy caught sight of her, and an evil spirit of destruction entered into his heart, and he picked up a stone and threw it at the bird with fatal precision. Before she knew what was occurring, the great stone fell upon her back and crushed her to the earth, breaking the bones in her right wing, and some of the protecting ribs on the right side of her body. She could scarcely breathe for the great agony, and was quite unable to move. She fluttered her left wing and screamed when the boy picked her up to take her home. He was very proud of himself and exultant. He put her in an empty cage and wondered why she did not sing for him as he got his dinner.

How could she sing? She had a damaged body and an anxious mind. Worse than her broken bones and the fiery pain in her lungs was the grief in her heart that four young birds would now die in the holly-tree for lack of a mother's care. The boy found the mother thrush dead in the cage at sunset.

At first the young birds were confident she would come back. In the afternoon they grew very hungry, and they could not help themselves; but they did not despair. They were looking out for the mother all the time. They now realised what a precious joy a mother is. They had only one friend in the world. Alas! She lay bruised and helpless in the bottom of a cage which a stupid boy had provided for her. But this they never knew. When the little birds looked over the side of the nest they saw the white woolly lambkins frisking in the field—the field of a thousand daisies—running at intervals to their mothers' side when she called them to be fed. They saw an old speckled hen in the distance with her chickens, and they noticed how all young things are dependent on mothers—how she scratched the ground and called them to her side when she had found food; and they longed ardently for their own mother.

Then the darkness came. They were very lonely. Owls cried and hooted, as they fluttered with dangerously silent wings near the holly-tree. The young thrushes were terrified. They saw the stars come out in the sky; but on this night of horrors there was no protecting warmth from the mother's body; and the lack of food and the frosty air caused two of the weakest of the brood to die in the early morning. The two survivors were so hungry when the sun rose that they were obliged to scream because of the hunger-pangs they had to bear. But there was none to pay any heed.

When the speckled hen came out, marching proudly in front of her brood of chicks and calling with such a tender voice, the young thrushes resolved to go to her for food, and they struggled until they fell over the side of the nest and were instantly killed, because they did not understand the danger and their wings were not yet ready for flight.

All this would have been very different, and the end happier, but for the boy who threw stones at birds.

When the ploughman came to unfasten the latch at the field gate he saw the two half-fledged little birds lying dead at the foot of the gate-post. He did not know that there were two others lying dead in the nest, out of sight, in the holly-tree above him. The tragedy was worse than he knew. But he said, "Some mischievous boys have been at work here! It seems to me they can never have been taught about God in Heaven, nor about Pity, nor about a Parent's Love—to do such cruel work!"

He thought the two young birds had been killed by direct cruelty. But the indirect cruelty of the boy who cast the stone was even worse in its results than any one ever knew.

H. V. M.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

THE REV. W. E. ATTACK.

WE regret to record the death of the Rev. W. E. Attack, which occurred at Longsight, Manchester, on Thursday, May 30. He had been in a low state of health for some time, and succumbed early to an attack of pneumonia. His remains were cremated at Manchester last Monday in the presence of a large gathering of his brother-ministers and members of his congregation, all of whom held him in the highest respect. He was in his fiftieth year.

Mr. Attack was born at Bradford, Yorkshire, of Quaker parents. He was trained for the teaching profession, which he followed until his adoption of Unitarian opinions. In 1884 he entered the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, and won there the Gaskell Scholarship, founded in memory of the Rev. William Gaskell, M.A., a former tutor of the College, author of "Though lowly here our lot may be," and other well-known hymns, and husband of Mrs. Gaskell, the famous novelist. This brought him into connection with Manchester University. In 1888 he became minister of Spain-lane Chapel, Boston. As a preacher he was popular, and from the first attracted unusually large congregations. He founded the Chapel Library, and extended it into a public institution; after his time it became the basis of the present Public Free Library. He moved to Ipswich in 1892. The best work of his life began with his settlement at Mill-street Free Church and Mission, Bradford, Manchester, in 1898. For fourteen years he laboured in this part of Manchester, and built up a strong organisation with many branches of social and philanthropic work. His own personal benefactions among the poor of this densely populated district were numerous, and he won the affection of all who came into contact with him. The large and representative attendance at his funeral was striking evidence of the esteem in which he was held by all classes of the community. Among ministers present was the Rev. W. C. Hall, of Northampton, formerly of Boston, who was a member of Spain-lane during Mr. Attack's ministry there, and entered the ministry through his encouragement and tuition.

Mr. Attack leaves a widow and three children.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

THE LEAGUE OF LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY.

FOURTH SPRING ASSEMBLY.

THE fourth Spring Assembly of the League of Liberal Christianity was held at Leicester during the last week in May, upon the invitation of the minister and congregation of Wycliffe Church. It will be remembered that on his return from America the Rev. R. J. Campbell resigned his presidency on account of ill-health, and the changes that followed have necessitated considerable re-organisation. The branches rejected the advice to dissolve the League, as they felt it stood for a principle, and supplied a want not otherwise provided for; this Assembly was therefore organised by the committee.

On Whit-Sunday morning the pulpit of Wycliffe Church was occupied by Miss A. H. Alleyne, hon. secretary to the League, who took for the subject of her sermon "Veiled Divinity," and preached a persuasive discourse upon the possibilities of the present life. In the evening the minister, the Rev. F. S. Beddow, B.A., preached to a large congregation, and subsequently the church was crowded when an address on "A Catholic Remedy for Social Ills" was delivered by the Rev. Father McNabb, O.P., who charmed everyone by his persuasive eloquence.

Monday morning's session was devoted to business under the presidency of Mr. A. Dawson. Miss Alleyne was reappointed hon. secretary and Mr. E. Capleton hon. treasurer, and the Constitution was revised subject to ratification by the next Assembly. The objects of the League were defined as Theological Freedom, Spiritual Fellowship and Social Reconstruction. The roll at present includes 42 branches and six affiliated churches or societies; the last recruit being the new Congregational Chapel at Woolwich.

At the afternoon session, over which the Rev. F. Seaward Beddow presided, the Rev. D. J. Simon (curate of St. Mark's, Leicester), in the unavoidable absence of the Rev. F. L. Donaldson, read a paper on "Symbolism in the Christian Church." In justifying the use of symbolism in worship, Mr. Simon claimed that it belonged to the primitive poetical instinct. The whole universe was symbolic, the law of symbolic expression operated in all departments of human activity, and had, he contended, a rightful place in religious worship.

Some discussion followed, and Mr. Simon was cordially thanked for his paper.

Lady Emily Lutyens afterwards addressed the session on "The Coming of a World-Teacher." Her address dealt chiefly with Theosophical teachings, which she reviewed with much power and eloquence. She then passed on to a consideration of various social and international movements and the universal unrest, which all pointed to the new spirit coming over the world. These movements needed a great teacher, that they might be unified and co-ordinated. It was the great personality that made a movement live and gave it life and vitality. A vote of thanks closed the session.

Over the tea-cups the Rev. F. R. Swan gave an address on "Syndicalism," and a lively discussion followed.

In the evening the members discussed the future of the League. It was generally felt that in uniting scattered liberal religious thinkers, in placing spiritual fellowship before theological agreement, and in endeavouring to fearlessly apply religious principles to social life, the League had a unique work before it. It was now a League of private soldiers, and the members, through relying on themselves, had strengthened the League immensely.

On Tuesday morning the proceedings began with a devotional service.

The Rev. F. S. Beddow, B.A., afterwards presided, and the Rev. T. P. Jenkins, of Hinckley Free Christian Church, read a paper on "The Positive Aspects of Christianity." He said criticism was the constructive force and a warm friend of truth and religion, and creeds to a great extent were dead and buried. The vital elements that should be emphasised was the getting back to the noblest representations of Christianity as expressed in the Gospels. God was not a creed, nor something that should be worshipped on the Sabbath day, but a really ever present experience. The sense of God was one of the most important features of the Christian religion.

After a short discussion, the Rev. E. H. Reeman (Hull) gave a paper on "The Sense of Sin as a Factor in Social Progress," in the course of which he stated that the average, decent, respectable man did not break known Divine commands for the mere fun of the thing, or for the purpose of flinging defiance in the teeth of the Deity. He wanted to do the right thing, but his difficulty was in knowing what was the right thing. The sense of sin proved that man was not the opposite of what he ought to be, but that he was in the true line of his natural progression. Speaking with reference to social progress, he said they had travelled far enough to know how much faster they could travel. What was it that they were really conscious of in their lives? It was not a sense of perfection they had lost, or which somebody else had lost for them, but the sense of development possible in their lives for achieving things they had not yet achieved. No man wanted to go back to the innocence of childhood; they had seen the vision of something that enlightened. Some discussion followed.

At the afternoon session Miss Caroline Graveson, M.A., gave a most interesting address on "Some Aspects of Quakerism." The Rev. Stanley James, of Walthamstow, followed with an address on "The New Aristocracy." He contended that the race of great men that Christianity required must consist of those who would use their great abilities for the good of all.

In the evening a public meeting was held at the Trade Hall under the presidency of the Rev. F. S. Beddow. In explaining the objects of the League to the audience he pointed out that a Roman Catholic, Episcopalian, Unitarian, Congregationalist, Presbyterian, Friend, and Theosophist, had taken part in the proceedings. No fact could be more eloquent as evidence of the breadth of the League's sympathies, and of its belief that theological differences need be no bar to spiritual fellowship.

The Rev. Dr. W. E. Orchard, of Enfield, who has just returned from the Holy Land, was the first speaker, and gave a fine address on "Social Mysticism." Mysticism he defined as the consciousness of direct communion with God; the mystic did not accept secondary experiences conveyed through a mediator or a book. Its claims were supported by psychology and philosophy. There were three steps which the soul had to take to find God, which could be defined by the words sincerity, grace, surrender. Mysticism had asserted itself in communities as wide apart as the Roman Catholics and the Friends. If at times it had been guilty of extravagances, this was owing to the fact that it had not tried to give social expression to its experiences, and that was absolutely necessary. There was an internal and an external to all healthy modes of life. Religion, therefore, could not exist without religious communities which were equivalent to the Church, using that term in its broadest sense. In other words, religion must be social. Economically, he was an agnostic, for he had no definite conviction on the great problems facing the age, but he was daily more impressed with the shortcomings of the present system. We have never yet created the religious atmosphere in which Christianity can be practised, and therefore it has never been tried. That atmosphere must be one of justice and love between man and man. The mystic to-day, therefore, must become the social revolutionist.

The Rev. J. Bruce Wallace, of Letchworth, was the last speaker. He said he would confine his remarks to the same line of thought as that introduced by Dr. Orchard. Christianity began in the mystical experiences of Jesus, followed by the gift of the Holy Spirit to the 120 in the upper chamber. Men were not good or bad according to the class of society to which they belonged; the oppressed often became the oppressor when circumstances altered. So it was with the Puritans; and he noticed when in Canada that the evicted Scotch Crofter, when he came to own land, often held it for a large rise in price. We must change the heart of man in all classes of society before a proper social state can come about.

Hymn-singing varied the proceedings, and a three days' conference was thus brought to an impressive conclusion.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

THE first meeting of the new Committee of the National Conference was held at Dr. Williams's Library, London, on May 29, when there were present Mr. Hugh R. Rathbone (President, in the chair), the Revs. J. S. Burgess, W. T. Bushrod, Dr. Carpenter, Rudolf Davis, A. H. Dolphin, H. E. Dowson, F. K. Freeston, A. Golland, H. Gow, Alf. Hall, C. Hargrove, W. H. Lambelle, W. W. C. Pope, H. D. Roberts, C. Roper, H. S. Solly, J. M. Lloyd Thomas, C. Travers, F. H. Vaughan, Jos. Wood, J. J. Wright, Miss Spencer, Messrs. Jno. Lewis, C. R. W. Offen, Ion Pritchard, T. Fletcher Robinson, J. Wigley, L. N. Williams, G. W. R. Wood, and the Secretary (the Rev. Jas. Harwood). Apologies for absence had been received from the Revs. D. Agate, Gwilym Evans, J. A. Kelly, H. J. Rossington, G. J. Slipper, Sir J. W. Scott, Mrs. Sydney Martineau, Messrs. J. Hall Brooks, H. P. Greg, Jno. Harrison, C. Sydney Jones, and J. Harrop White.

The Rev. H. E. Dowson gave a cordial welcome to his successor in the chair.

The Revs. J. Worsley Austin, C. J. Street, Messrs. G. H. Leigh, Grosvenor Talbot, and A. S. Thew were co-opted members of the committee.

It was agreed that a message of affectionate regard and deep sympathy be sent to Mr. Jno. Harrison in his serious illness, and that the other officers be authorised to make temporary arrangements for the office of treasurer.

Several interesting points were raised in regard to correspondence which had taken place. The resolutions passed at the Triennial Meetings were reported, and where necessary directions with regard to them were given. It was agreed that the ordinary meetings of the Committee should be held at Whitsuntide (in London), in October (in Birmingham or some Midland centre), and in January (in Manchester).

The Treasurer's statement was presented, and it was agreed that the usual annual statement of accounts, &c., should be circulated.

Representatives were chosen for the following bodies:—Committee on the Supply of Ministers, Ministerial Settlement Board, Joint Committee for Revising List of Ministers in the Essex Hall Year Book, and the National Council of Peace Societies. It was agreed that the next meeting should be held in Birmingham, on October 16 if possible.

The ex-President expressed his acknowledgments to the Secretary for his assistance during the last triennial term, and tendered the warm sympathy of the Committee with him in his recent bereavement.

NATIONAL UNITARIAN TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION. CONFERENCE ON "ALCOHOL AND MODERN LIFE."

A CONFERENCE was held at Essex Hall on Friday afternoon, May 31, at 4 o'clock, in connection with the annual meeting of the National Unitarian Temperance Association. There was a much better attendance than has been usual in previous years. Dr. Lionel Tayler read an exceedingly thoughtful and instructive paper on "Alcohol and Modern Life," which was listened to with deep interest by those present and followed by a discussion. Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., occupied the chair, and on the platform were the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, Mr. G. W. Chitty, J.P., the Rev. H. Shaen Solly, and Mrs. Solly.

Alcohol, said Dr. TAYLER, was a nerve drug, a drug that acted upon the whole nervous system, and therefore it must be considered largely in relation to other nerve drugs. It was quite true that alcohol did more. It acted on every tissue in the body, not only the human body, but also nearly every living body that existed; but when we spoke of the alcohol problem we thought mainly of its effect on the mind and the great social problem that confronted us. Therefore, the question that had to be considered was what nerve drugs meant and what was the relation of alcohol to them. A number of people at the present time were inclined to think that the problem of alcohol was on its way to solution and that they need not trouble themselves. Here Dr. Tayler produced and explained a diagram showing the past and present comparative uses of nerve drugs, from which there appeared to be a slight decline in alcoholic beverages at the present time, but a total rise in nerve drugs, the full extent of which it was difficult to estimate. Broadly speaking, we knew that a very large number of other drugs were being used, not recorded in the returns; drugs such as bromide, chloral, liqueurs, &c., which all related to the same problem of their effect on the nervous system. In all probability the middle class was more sober than it had ever been in the world's history, but the richer class and the very poor had a record which was worse than any period of history had ever seen. When we looked at the figures and statistics to hand two things were suggested: that we had no right to feel satisfied with the problem that confronted us to-day, but ought to feel misapprehension, and that we ought to draw a legitimate inference that there was some strain or defective methods of living, or both, at the present time tending to force the majority of people to take some large amount of drug, if not alcohol, to fortify themselves. There was some kind of strain that was unhealthy, and this fact was borne out by independent data. Of late years the subject of insanity had been very frankly discussed, and people saw that the strain of life led to an increase of insanity. For the purpose of that paper, there were five kinds of nerve drugs to be considered, namely:—hypnotics, selective tissue drugs, nutritive nerve drugs, true stimulant drugs, and narcotic drugs, to which alcohol belonged. All drugs were consistent in their action, even when they seemed to be inconsistent. Dealing with the kinds of nerve drugs in turn, Dr. Tayler said that the hypnotics induced sleep but created no craving. They were dangerous as habit-forming drugs upon which sleep, and that unnatural sleep, at last depended. The power was broken if sleep could be induced by healthy means. Selective tissue drugs acted on special tissues, but they were not of evolutionary or devolutionary significance. The recent increased use of hypnotic and nutritive groups had no distinctive significance for social students beyond the inference that the increased use suggested overstrain in our mental attitude towards life. Of the true stimulants no craving was created except that the habit formed, and the loss of the stimulant at the customary hour that the drug or beverage was taken, caused discomfort; and the danger lay where a neurasthenic state, which ought to be treated medically, was often exaggerated by resort to them. Under this head came tea, coffee, and kola. The narcotic group included drugs seemingly stimulant, and paralysing in small and large doses respectively, in reality acting in the inverse order of healthy development. Alcohol was a narcotic; and by the constant use of narcotics, power of self-control was destroyed, later ideals were destroyed, leaving appetites ascendant; muscular paralysis was caused, and life functions of the body paralysed, eventually causing death. They created a sense of well-being that was fictitious, and usually they created a craving. Dr. Tayler said that there was one complete devolutional disease known, and that was general paralysis of the insane. It was the most fatal and perhaps the most terrible of all diseases, destroying life in about two years or more. He gave outlines of the various stages and then went on to compare them with the various stages in the action of alcohols on the human system. It was a vivid and impressive comparison. In the alcohols the first and so-called stimulant stage showed that the imagination was freed from control, the feelings expressed themselves briskly, unfettered thoughts came and went without restraint, and the feeling of bodily strength and mental ability was much raised, with the loosening of checking influences. The appetites of the body asserted themselves more definitely in consciousness. Even a small quantity of alcohol had some or all of those effects as an abstaining diner could easily verify for himself when placed among non-abstainers. The individual re-acted on a slightly lower mental plane, was less critical, and less disposed to serious thought. To what extent that deterioration of character was a permanent one in the regular moderate drinker it was difficult to say, but some of the loss of youthful ideals in middle aged, more prevalent in men than women, might be due to that cause. As in general paralysis of the insane the change was unnoticed by the patient, who often believed that his more commonplace outlook was higher and more practical. The second stage it was usual to classify in four groups, the lachrymose, hilarious, pugnacious, and sensual types. Untruthfulness, moral failure, and slovenliness of attire were characteristics. Later came inco-ordination and extreme disorder of the mind and body, and in the fourth stage muscular paralysis, leading later on to paralysis of life functions, and death. All narcotics, said Dr. Tayler, must go; including tobacco. A denarcotised nation and world would give our ideals liberty. Here was a straight moral issue, and the spreading of the truth as to what narcotics were—devolutional drugs—was the path by which progress could be reached. If we were to go forward to a society that was free, it could be only by the development of our ideals. We ought to rely on a sane education to give us a larger point of view. Whatever was false, whether alcohols or narcotics, all things that destroyed ideals had no right to a place in advancing modern life.

A conference and discussion followed in which Mr. T. Wicksteed, Mrs. Shaen Solly, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, Mr. Scott, Miss Amy Withall, Mr. W. T. Colyer, Mrs. Tudor Jones, the Rev. F. Summers, Dr. Tudor Jones, Miss Tarrant, and others took part, Dr. Tayler replying to each one.

BUSINESS AND PUBLIC MEETING.

After the Conference tea was served, and the business and public meeting commenced at 7 o'clock. The President, Mr. H. G. Chancellor, was in the chair, supported by Mr. Edward Chitty, J.P., the Rev. H. Shaen Solly, Mrs. Shaen Solly, the Revs. W. Tudor Jones, J. Arthur Pearson, W. G. Tarrant, P. H. Wicksteed, H. D. Roberts, Dr. Lionel Tayler, Mr. T. Wicksteed, Mr. E. F. Cowlin (secretary), and Mr. A. W. Harris (treasurer). Letters regretting non-attendance were read from Sir William Bowering, the Rev. Chas. Hargrove, Dr. Carpenter, and Miss Harriet M. Johnson.

The SECRETARY presented his report, which showed that 17 members had been lost, and that there were 22 new members, making a total membership of 233; and that four new societies had been affiliated, making a total of 80. In connection with Temperance Sunday 145 sermons and addresses had been given, or services held, as against 90 for the previous year. It was a regrettable fact that in some of the churches temperance work was languishing for want of helpers. The "N.U.T.A." Hymnal, which was prepared at considerable trouble and expense to take the place of books in which unsuitable sectarian hymns abounded, had not been adopted by Temperance Societies to the extent hoped for and expected. In January, 1912, Mr. E. F. Cowlin succeeded Mr. W. R. Marshall, who as secretary had held office for ten years to the satisfaction of the Committee and the great advantage of the Association. On the whole, although the Association is doing good work, there still seems to be room for improvement and increased effort.

The TREASURER submitted his report, showing receipts of £104 5s. 7d., and expenditure £109 11s.; deficit, £5 5s. 5d. on the year's working, a financial position which causes anxiety.

The adoption of the reports was moved by the CHAIRMAN, who said that he thought of the Unitarian movement as being in the forefront of all kinds of social and moral improvement, yet in this important movement of temperance there were only 80 churches affiliated to the Society. They were pleased to learn that there had been a reduction in the number of licensed houses and in the national drink bill. The habits of people indicated great improvement, and the speaker surmised how far various forms of amusement and the growth of athletics had conduced to that reduction. There was an important measure this year, deserving the support of all temperance reformers, the Scottish Temperance Bill, which offered to the Scottish people the decision on the number and existence of facilities for obtaining drink that shall prevail in their localities. The Association must go forward with its good work vigorously, not only amongst young people, but also amongst adults, so that when next year the Government brings in a measure not less drastic than the measure of 1908, there shall be such a weight of public opinion behind it that would make it possible to carry the measure through without any danger of the House of Lords throwing it out. Their Association must make its influence a power in the formation of that public opinion, and so help forward the cause of temperance for which they stood.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT, seconding, spoke highly of the value of the new "N.U.T.A." Hymnal, which was used by his temperance workers at Wands-worth; and suggested that in order to strengthen their hands in the work they were engaged upon, a personal letter should be addressed by the President to every Minister of their churches, drawing attention to the value and importance of their work. After a short discussion the reports were adopted. A proposal by country members of the Association was put in by Mr. J. Bredall, that all future annual meetings should be held before Friday in Whit-week; and it was decided that it be left to country members to write to the Secretary with their suggestions and desires.

The election of Committee and Officers, including the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed as the new President, was moved by Dr. W. TUDOR JONES, who gave an interesting account of temperance legislation in New Zealand, and some of its results. He said that for twenty years the subject of temperance had received a great deal of attention. The problem had been an exceedingly difficult one, and drunkenness had been as prevalent there as in this country, but since women had received votes a radical change had come; drunkenness had decreased; the welfare and happiness of the people had increased, and Dr. Jones thought there was a probability, bordering upon certainty, that in another twenty years there would not be a public-house in New Zealand. Miss Spencer seconded, and Mr. T. Wicksteed appealed for better attendance by members of the Committee.

The new President, the Rev. PHILIP H. WICKSTEED, moved:

"That this meeting of the National Unitarian Temperance Association respectfully urges the Government to take the earliest possible opportunity of introducing the promised licensing Bill, and of embodying therein the principle of Local Option."

On the general principle of legislation, Mr. Wicksteed said that of all the mischievous things that could possibly be said, one of the most mischievous was that you cannot make people honest or sober by Act of Parliament. Of course they could not; but they could help people to be all those things. It was said that if a man wanted a drink he would get it; but the truer idea would be expressed in that if a man wanted it enough to get over the obstacles he would have it. If not, he wouldn't. Mr. Wicksteed was open to argue that one form of legislation was better or worse than another, but to say that it made no difference was sheer nonsense.

The Rev. H. D. ROBERTS seconded, forcefully and briefly, and, in supporting the resolution, the Rev. T. D. BACON, of Salem, Mass., spoke of the temperance work being done in America, more especially in connection with prohibition and the prohibition States.

A speech was given by Mr. ARNOLD LUTON, from the body of the hall, after which the CHAIRMAN declared the resolution carried.

An interesting feature of the proceedings was the presentation made to Mr. W. R. Marshall, in recognition of his valuable services as Secretary for ten years, and on behalf of the members the Chairman presented him with a cheque for £7 7s., made up of shilling subscriptions.

Mr. MARSHALL acknowledged the gift in suitable terms, and recalled the kindness and good feeling he had always met with during his tenure of office.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman and speakers was moved by Mr. EDWARD CHITTY, J.P., seconded by Mrs. SHAEN SOLLY, and carried, and the meeting closed with the Doxology and Benediction.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION. ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Annual Meeting of the Central Postal Mission was held on May 30 at Essex Hall, Miss Tagart, the President, being in the chair. Miss Tagart said it seemed to the workers when engaged in the correspondence of the Postal Mission as if it was a small affair, an effort to give a little help to a lonely soul here and there perhaps in some remote village, and yet they had the whole globe for their field of work, and their message could be delivered wherever letters were carried. In England they had a special mission to the villages, and they had received such generous words and such cordial response to their efforts that it often made them feel how little they had done to merit these results. The eagerness with which the books and pamphlets sent out were read and passages from them copied out was most remarkable and touching. Miss Tagart gave a warm welcome to all present, especially to those who had come from afar.

The report was taken as read, but some extracts from it were given by Miss Florence Hill, hon. secretary. Miss Hill said she had received letters of regret from Miss Ethel Lake, hon. treasurer, and Mrs. Noel Johnson, now President of the Manchester Mission, of which she has been the secretary for eighteen years, neither of whom were present. Miss Lake was especially sorry that she was unable to be with them, but she had been obliged to take a complete rest under doctor's orders. The report draws special attention to the new and important religious movement in Italy, initiated by Signor Gaetano Conte, formerly pastor in the Italian Methodist Church, who has resigned his pulpit, and is now devoting his life to the spread of liberal ideas in connection with religion and social reform. An account of his work was recently given by Dr. Wendte in an address reported in our issue of April 20, and in a very interesting little book entitled "After Ten Months," Signor Conte himself gives an account of the circumstances which brought him into touch with liberal religious thinkers, both in America and his own country, and of the causes which led him to start the "Italian Association of Free Believers," the new society which is doing such good work at the present time. This Association is undenominational, and exists for the purpose of influencing the existing churches as well as the "unchurched," in the direction of enlightened and progressive thought, giving men a more spiritual and at the same time rational conception of Christianity, and preparing the way for the further study of ethical and social questions in order to uplift the masses of the people.

Mr. Conte has already translated and circulated several pamphlets, and held conferences in many Italian towns. The first four pamphlets he issued dealt with Unitarianism, and were sent to 1,000 people. The Association numbers at present over 113 subscribers, and professors, lawyers, doctors, and other people of culture have given evidence of sympathy and approval. Mr. Conte has been nurtured in the high ideals of Mazzini, and he desires to lead Italians to a deeper faith and to a higher sense of moral duty, founded on that faith. He meets with opposition both from Catholics and Protestants, and needs all the help and sympathy that can be given him. Members of the Central Postal Mission Committee have been in constant communication with him ever since the resignation of his pastorate, and the President and Secretary had the privilege of meeting Mr. Conte and some of his friends and sympathisers in Venice last January, and of hearing many interesting details concerning this new religious movement in Italy.

The report states that during the year the Postal Missions have been in direct communication with over 3,000 people. There were 1,663 new applications for literature in 1911, and communications are still kept up with 1,957 old correspondents.

Applications for literature came from 681 different places, mainly from Great Britain, but some have come from abroad—from Australia, Canada, India, New Zealand, S. Africa, W. Africa, and the United States; also from Algeria, Argentina, Antigua, the Bermudas, Fiji, Java, and from a few European countries.

Encouraging reports from the secretaries of the affiliated societies, and from the branches in India, Holland, China, and Australia, have also been received.

In the absence of Miss Lake, Mrs. Herbert Smith read the financial statement, at the same time paying a warm tribute to the devotion and energy of the hon. treasurer, whose absence was regretted by all. The Rev. Lucking Tavenor, in seconding the adoption of the reports, made special references to the excellent work which is being done by the Suffolk Mission at Bedfield and Framlingham. He thought the ministers of the various churches might make more use of the Postal Mission than they did when trying to meet the needs of inquirers. The resolution was carried. Dr. Herbert Smith moved the election of the committee and officers for the ensuing year, and expressed his entire sympathy with the work of the society, especially as it was a society of women, which was giving help to many who really needed it without prejudicing their interests in any way. The resolution was seconded by Mrs. Lewis, who stated that about seventy letters were sent out each week, in addition to books and papers. Dr. Angelo Crespi then delivered his interesting address on "The Present Tendencies of Religious Thought in Italy" which we summarised last week. Signor Crespi, who co-operated with Fogazzaro in the Modernist review, Il Rinnovamento, has contributed a study on "Mazzini and the Future Religious Synthesis" to Mr. Conte's new movement, and has also promised him a pamphlet on "The Method to be used in Religious Studies."

Mrs. Roberts, in a charming speech, proposed a vote of thanks to the lecturer. She said she had no words in which to express the gratitude they must all feel to Dr. Crespi for his wonderful and vivid description of religious and philosophical tendencies in Italy. She had never enjoyed anything more than she had enjoyed that address. The speaker had the magical glamour of Italy behind him, that beautiful country from which we have inherited so much. They could never forget all that they owed to Italy and its empire over the world, over art, and over literature. The Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, in seconding, said he hoped they would be able to see Dr. Crespi's masterly address in some permanent form. The brilliant way in which the whole subject had been put before them in their own language, and the broad philosophical survey which had been given in such a short time, had left some of them almost in a state of bewilderment. Dr. Crothers added a few appreciative words, and said that all they could do to help the new movement in Italy would be too little.

It should be to them a new inspiration. A vote of thanks to the President, who occupied the chair, was moved by Dr. Tudor Jones, seconded by the Rev. C. Hargrove, and supported by Mr. Charles Hawksley. This brought the meeting to a close.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

SUMMARY OF ANNUAL REPORT.

MUCH of the information contained in the annual report of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association has already appeared in these columns, and some idea of the activities of the Association during the past year was given in the report of the annual meeting which appeared last week. The work of the Van Mission and the report of the Colonial and Foreign Committee were especially dealt with, and mention was made of the scheme for increasing ministers' stipends, which received so much attention at the National Conference at Birmingham.

In regard to Home Missions, the Report states that the grants made towards the salaries of ministers, special lectures and services, repairs to buildings, and other home mission work in 1911 amounted to £2,332; in addition, £267 was expended in grants of books and tracts, making £2,599 for the year. £1,850 was expended on ministers' salaries and pulpit supplies, £345 in building grants, £135 in lectures and special services. If a scheme were carried out for appointing two or three district ministers whose whole time would be devoted to home mission work, and whose salaries and expenses would be provided for by the Association, an additional income of £1,000 a year would be required for this object alone.

The Committee have had abundant evidence of the good work carried on in the Western Union district by the Rev. Rudolf Davis, and in the London Unitarian Society's district by the Rev. J. A. Pearson. The South-East Wales Society has approached the Association with a view to the appointment of a missionary minister for that district, and the Committee have replied that they will be pleased to consider a scheme with favour, adding, however, that in order to provide adequate financial assistance it may be necessary to readjust some of the present grants to the churches. Suggestions for special work in North Wales that might involve a similar appointment for a time have been made to the Association; but as there are no Unitarian churches in North Wales, the advice of the Liverpool District Missionary Association has been sought as to the advisability of arranging a series of lectures and religious services, with an intimation that the Committee will be glad to co-operate in making the necessary arrangements.

In connection with the Van Mission, 2,659 meetings have now been held during six seasons, including 445 held last season. The cost of the Mission for each year since 1907 for four vans has been as follows:—1907, £1,083; 1908, £1,066; 1909, £931; 1910, £996; 1911, £822. It is gratifying to report also that with the assistance of a few special and generous subscriptions, the income was just sufficient to cover the expenditure, and to leave a small balance of £2. The subscriptions in 1907 and since have been as follows:—1907, £820, including £300 for the purchase of new vans; 1908, £736; 1909, £635; 1910, £620; 1911, £791. The subscriptions for 1911, with £33 from Van collections and sales of books and tracts, enables the Mission to meet its expenditure, including the maintenance of four vans, wages, working expenses, printing, and the salary of the missionary agent.

Since the last annual meeting of the Association a considerable number of books and tracts have been issued. It was decided that the imprint, "The Lindsey Press," be used on the title-page in future issues of any special books or other publications, whenever it was considered advisable not to use the imprint of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Mr. Ronald P. Jones kindly prepared a special design for the title-page of The Lindsey Press, and it is peculiarly appropriate that the name of Theophilus Lindsey should be connected in this way with publications issued by the Association.

The financial statement shows that the receipts for the year ending December 31, 1911, were as follows:—Subscriptions, £2,702; collections, £638; dividends, £1,476; book room sales, £724; book room grants, £422; Van Mission, £824; special, £50. The payments were:—Home work, £2,332; colonial and foreign work, £1,173; book and tract grants, home, £267; colonial and foreign, £155; deputations [and meetings, £46. Van Mission, £822; book department, £1,036; anniversary expenses, £97; salaries and wages, £860; general expenses, including rent, postages, &c., £235. There was an excess of expenditure over income of £186. Several subscriptions received in the early part of 1911 properly belonged to the previous year, and are not likely to be renewed in 1912. The Association Sunday collections show an increase of £117, compared with 1910, but the comparison is a little misleading owing to delay in receiving some of the collections. Amounts paid early in January occasionally belong to collections taken in the previous November.

An appeal for new subscribers and subscriptions has been issued, and the assistance of the members of the Association in making it known is earnestly desired.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Acton.—The sixth anniversary of the opening of the Unitarian Church in Creffield-road, Acton, was celebrated on Sunday, June 2, by special services conducted by the Rev. Dr. Lionel Tayler and the Rev. E. Daplyn; and on Tuesday night by a public meeting, presided over, in very genial fashion, by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, of Essex Church, Kensington. There were between fifty and sixty present, and the addresses delivered by the chairman, the Rev. Dr. Tudor Jones, Mr. H. G. Chancellor,

M.P., the Rev. J. A. Pearson, and the minister of the church, the Rev. A. C. Holden, were much appreciated by all present. The hon. secretary (Mr. A. Barnes) and the hon. treasurer (Mr. E. B. Athawes), in compliance with a call from the chair, spoke on behalf of the church, the latter in his remarks commending with enthusiasm the project of a bazaar to be held in about a year's time, with the bold object of raising £300, to enable the balance of the loan on the site (£264) to be paid off, and to provide the nucleus of a building fund for the erection of a permanent church at some future date. A cordial vote of thanks was accorded to the chairman and visitors, and also to the ladies who had provided the refreshments, on the motion of Mr. Brison, seconded by Mr. D. B. Soeats.

Bermondsey: Unitarian Church.—We are asked to say that funds are urgently needed to defray the expenses of the annual excursion in connection with the Sunday school, which will take place early in July. The smallest donations will be thankfully received by Mr. Thos. Javison, secretary, 99, Fort-road, Bermondsey, or Mr. Herbert N. Caley, 74, Fort-road, Bermondsey.

Birkenhead: Appointment.—The Rev. J. E. Jenkins, of Padiham, has accepted a unanimous invitation to become the minister of the Unitarian Church at Birkenhead.

Birmingham: Appointment.—The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas has received and accepted an invitation to become the minister of the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, in succession to the Rev. Joseph Wood. Mr. Lloyd Thomas has been the minister of the High Pavement Church, Nottingham, for eleven years. At the quarterly committee held last Monday in the High Pavement Schools, Nottingham, a resolution was unanimously passed expressing the Committee's great regret at Mr. Thomas's approaching removal from the district, and congratulating him on his acceptance of the pastorate of the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham. The Committee desired to place on record their grateful acknowledgment of his invaluable services as secretary of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association for eight years, and latterly as one of the vice-presidents, and the generous way he has given himself to the common work of the Liberal Christian Churches.

Chowbent.—The School sermons, afternoon and evening, were preached at Chowbent Chapel on Sunday, June 9, by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, of London, to crowded congregations. The Rev. J. J. Wright took the scholars' service in the morning. On the cover of the hymn papers were printed the following items of information about the school:—"£62 6s. 6d. were the collections last year (1911); £35 5s. 9d. of this have had to be spent on improvements, repairs, painting, &c., of the school buildings during the past year; £4 8s. 8d. in debt the schools find themselves at the end of the year (March 31) in consequence, after paying for the usual fuel, light and cleaning, and the necessary class books (chiefly illustrated New Testaments), and other school equipments. There are 447 scholars in the Sunday school; there are 34 teachers: 4 superintendents (besides the Minister); a gain of 48 scholars during the year is recorded; 157 of these scholars are over 16 years of age, 19 more than last year; 16 more scholars have become members of the chapel in this year, 1912. A £65 collection could be well used in the cost and work of the schools, towards helping the good life of these 447 young lives." Last Sunday's collections resulted in £68 3s. 8d. being raised—more than the sum asked for above. During the day a presentation was made on behalf of 100 past and present members of the Young Men's Class to Mr. Robert Greenhalgh, J.P., who has been its teacher for more than 23 years, on his retirement from service. His place is being taken by his son-in-law, Dr. Jessel.

Clifton.—The induction of Dr. G. F. Beckh as minister of Oakfield-road Church, Clifton, will take place on June 25 at 3.30. Principal Carpenter, D.D., the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, Mr. P. D. Worsley, and the Treasurer of Lewin's Mead Meeting will take part in the service, to which all are cordially invited. A luncheon at the Imperial Hotel, Clifton, at 2 for 2.15, will precede the service. Those desiring to be present are requested to inform Mr. C. Cole, St. Ives, Westbury-on-Trym, of their intention, in order that suitable arrangements may be made. Afternoon tea will be provided in the lecture hall or garden immediately after the service.

Dover.—The annual meetings of the General Baptist Assembly were held at Adrian-street, Dover, on Tuesday and Wednesday in last week. There was a fair gathering of ministers and delegates from the various constituent churches, and the meetings were not without lively episodes. After a board meeting on Tuesday afternoon, followed by tea in the school-room, a service was held in the church, conducted by the Rev. S. Burrows. At the close a communion service was conducted by Mr. Ginever. On Wednesday morning the Assembly met for business. The Secretary's report and the Treasurer's accounts were read, and after some discussion, accepted. A new board was elected, as follows:—Mr. W. Walker, J.P., president; Mr. Edward Chitty, J.P., vice-president; Mr. Offen, treasurer; the Rev. J. Brinkworth, secretary; the Revs. T. Bond, S. Burrows, and Geo. Lansdown, and Mr. Hazel. Mr. Ginever was elected as messenger in place of the late Mr. Marchant; he was also appointed as assistant secretary to the Assembly. Lunch was followed by a pleasant drive, after which tea was again provided in the schoolroom. In the evening a public meeting was held. Mr. Lansdown and Mr. Harvey Smith gave addresses on the subject, "What Relation has Religion to Labour Unrest?" A very interesting and animated discussion followed, and the meeting terminated with votes of thanks to all who had contributed to making the visit of the Assembly to Dover a success.

Hull: Park-street Church.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Wednesday, June 12. The printed reports of the Committee, the Sunday-school, and the various societies give evidence of continued vitality and progress, and under the stimulus of the Rev. Lawrence Clare's ministry, the outlook is bright and promising. Generous donations by devoted members of the congregation have brought the contemplated extension of the school-room and adjoining premises within reasonable prospect of realisation, and it is hoped shortly to commence building operations. Officers were elected for the ensuing year, and two ladies were again appointed to the Committee. A garden party was held at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Harris on Saturday, June 8, when, despite unpropitious weather, over £23 was obtained towards the extension scheme. Several hundred pounds are still required to complete the scheme, and donations will be gratefully acknowledged by the treasurer, Mr. H. E. Holmes.

Kensington: Essex Church Appointment.—The Rev. Harold Speight, M.A., has accepted the invitation of the congregation to become the junior minister of Essex Church, for a period of three years from September 1 next. Mr. Speight had a distinguished career at the University of Aberdeen, and is now completing his second year at Manchester College, Oxford, as holder of the "Daniel Jones" fellowship. He has also assisted the staff of the College in the tutorial work, and has lectured on historical and philosophical subjects.

Manchester: Longsight.—The Rev. B. C. Constable, of Stockport, has accepted a uni-mous invitation to the Free Christian Church, Longsight, and will commence his ministry there on the first Sunday in July.

Newbury: Presbyterian Meeting House.—The 215th anniversary of the Presbyterian Chapel at Newbury, which is one of the historic features of the town, was celebrated on Whit Sunday. There were special services to mark the occasion, the pulpit being occupied by Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., who preached on "The Freedom of Faith"; while in the evening a service of sacred song, entitled "The Good Samaritan," was given, with readings by the Rev. R. Newell. In connection with the chapel it is intended to hold a sale of work and garden party on the lawn, 121, Bartholomew-street, by kind consent of Dr. and Mrs. Hickman at 3 o'clock on Wednesday, June 26. Mrs. Walter Baily, of London, will perform the opening ceremony, and the Mayor of Newbury (Mr. S. Knight) will preside. Any help in the way of goods or money will be gratefully acknowledged by Miss Stillman, secretary, Marsh Cottage, Newbury, and Mrs. Newell, treasurer, Arthur-road, Newbury.

Northampton.—In connection with the recently formed teachers' preparation class at Kettering-road Unitarian Church, Mr. F. J. Gould, of the Moral Education League, gave a demonstration lesson in moral instruction on Friday, the 7th inst. The attendance was good, and included several teachers from other local schools.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

AN EXHIBITION OF PHOTOGRAPHS AT THE COLONIAL INSTITUTE.

An exhibition of photographs taken by Mrs. John H. Harris during a journey in West Central Africa of nearly 5,000 miles will be held at the Royal Colonial Institute on June 19, 20, and 21. The photographs, which number over 500, represent the production of cocoa, rubber, palm oil, and gum copal; forest and river scenery, African industries, native customs and diseases, cicatrising, fetishes, canoeing, &c. The exhibition is private, but open to all adult members and friends of the Royal Colonial Institute, the Royal Society, the Royal Geographical Society, the African Society, the Institute of Journalists, and the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society. Tickets of admission may be obtained by sending a stamped and addressed envelope to Mr. Travers Buxton, 51, Denison House, Vauxhall Bridge-road, S.W., or Mr. J. R. Boosé, Royal Colonial Institute, 18, Northumberland-avenue, W.C.

"SAFETY" FLANNELETTE.

All is not "Safety" flannelette that is so labelled, according to the Child's Guardian, and more prominence, it is urged, should be given to the good work done by the British Fire Prevention Committee, which undertakes tests and investigations from time to time for the purpose of enlightening the public as to the dangers they run from causes of which they are lamentably ignorant. One of the recent tests was devoted to what is called by the manufacturers and retailers "Safety" flannelette. The material was of good quality, described as of "fine finish," and the price paid was 8½d. per yard. The tests were careful and systematic. They resulted in proving that this so-called "Safety" flannelette was of a highly inflammable nature. The need for legislation to prevent the sale of a material so destructive to life has been frequently urged. Its importance is all the greater when remembering that the cheaper qualities are far more dangerous. The British Fire Prevention Committee say, "To sell a textile falsely described as 'safe' should be an offence punishable by a summary procedure," and all who know of the lamentable waste of infant life through burning accidents will be in hearty agreement.

ENTENTE OR ALLIANCE.

At the monthly meeting on Wednesday, June 5, of the National Peace Council, representing thirty allied organisations, Mr. Gordon Harvey, M.P. (chairman), moved the following resolution, which was seconded by Mr. Harry Nuttall, M.P., and adopted unanimously:—

That the National Peace Council expresses its strong disapproval of the proposal which is being made in certain quarters for an offensive and defensive alliance with France. It rejoices in the existence of the present cordial relations between the two peoples, and earnestly desires that they may continue and spread from both sides until they include all other nations.

It is the opinion of the Council that the formation of an alliance such as is suggested would not only prevent the extension of international European goodwill, but would certainly add to the unhappy feelings of suspicion and irritation which now prevail, and would lead to an increase in the burden of armaments and military service already intolerable.

THE TOWN OF ASOLO.

Asolo, a magic word to all lovers of "Pippa Passes," is no longer the quaint old town given over to silk-weaving of fifty years ago. New machinery has now taken the place of hand labour, while the railways have drawn the centres of industry from the hill-perched town to the cities of the plain, says Mrs. Miller Morrison in a recent article in the Daily News. "But the hand that transformed the lovely old-world Asolo into the very fairyland of a poet's dream held a gift in its still, and the present lace school of Asolo, founded in 1892, is a son's tribute of affection to the little town his father loved. Mr. Barrett Browning bought the crumbling factory in which Pippa worked and sang, hoping to resuscitate Pippa's craft. But the silk industry was found to be past and gone beyond recall, so the old silk factory was transformed into the new lace school, and within its walls, looking down on the verdant rivas, and the blue, misty plains, and across to the Euganean Hills, some thirty small pairs of hands are to be seen, all busy with their pillows and their bobbins, weaving lovely Venetian lace in the beautiful antique patterns, and decorating hand-woven linen such as one sees shining white on the tables in old Venetian pictures. Just across the street from the lace school we read on a tablet let into the wall of the little house in which Robert

Browning and his sister lodged during his last visit to Asolo:—

In questa casa
abitò
Roberto Browning,
Sommo Poeta Inglese,
Vi Scrisse Asolando,
1889."

* * *

The centenary of the poet whom Asolo loves to claim as its own has been celebrated by the township by the inauguration of another tablet, bearing the following inscription:—

Celebrando il Centenario del suo Poeta
al Nome di
Roberto Browning,
questa via consacrava
7 Maggio, 1912.

This has been placed on the little house in which he lodged, "thus naming, in token of Asolo's love and gratitude, the street in which he last lived and worked Via Roberto Browning."

THE BANKS OF THE WANDLE.

The annual report of the Kyrle Society for 1911 gives an interesting record of the activities of the committee in regard to many important schemes for the preservation of open spaces. Particular reference is made to the River Wandle, which rises at Waddon, near West Croydon, and flows through Beddington to Hackbridge, where it joins another stream and flows on through Wallington, Mitcham, Morden, Merton, Wimbledon and Wandsworth to the Thames. The banks of this river include many lovely bits of country scenery, as the photographs included in the reports show, and several tracts of land along its banks have already been acquired for parks and recreation grounds, in addition to a beautiful mere, and a lovely stretch of stream and bank near the Lower Mitcham Bridge, which have been purchased by generous friends. It is hoped that other pieces of land may also be procured.

* * *

Ruskin, in the introduction to the "Crown of Wild Olive," has written a delightful passage about this beautiful little stream:—"Twenty years ago there was no lovelier piece of lowland scenery in South England, nor any more pathetic in the world, by its expression of sweet human character and life, than that immediately bordering on the sources of the Wandle, and including the low moors of Addington and the villages of Beddington and Carshalton, with all their pools and streams. No clearer or diviner waters ever sang with constant lips of the Hand which 'giveth rain from Heaven'; no pastures ever lightened in spring-time with more passionate blossoming, no sweeter homes ever hallowed the heart of the passer-by with their pride of peaceful gladness—fain-hidden yet full-confessed." But in those days there was much pollution, and it is partly due to Ruskin's influence that some of the springs of origin at Carshalton have been protected, and much done since to purify the once famous trout stream which is so perfect in epitome an beauty of its greater brother the Thames.

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANC.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z. INQUIRER OFFICE, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, LAYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED

WHITE

& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming Irish Linen Summer Costume Fabric, "Flaxzella." Washable. Wide range of fascinating designs. Beautiful shades, durable, looks smart for years.—Write, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

REMNANT BARGAIN!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen. Big pieces suitable for making Teacloths, Traycloths, D'oyleys, &c., 2s. 6d. per bundle. Postage 4d. Irish Linen Catalogue FREE.—Write, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by Christian Scientists.

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY."

Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda. Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to EDITOR, "Dove-stone," Denton-road, Gorton, Manchester.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday June 15, 1912.

* * * Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

Library of the
PACIFIC UNITARIAN SCHOOL
OF THE MINISTRY
Berkeley, California

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3652.
NEW SERIES, No. 756.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 22, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.

The International Visits Association

Founded for the Purpose of Studying the Customs and Institutions of Other Countries.

THE SEVENTH VISIT TO DENMARK.

August 13-23, 1912.

The arrangements include visits to Frederiksborg High School for the Danish People, Koerehave Agricultural School for Cottagers and Cottagers' Wives, a Co-operative Dairy, an Agricultural Museum, the Open-air Museum at Lyngby, a Home for Old Age Pensioners, a Labour Bureau, a Co-operative Bakery, the Training School for Domestic Servants, the Finsen Light Institute.

THE THIRD VISIT TO HOLLAND.

July 23-August 2, 1912.

The arrangements include visits to Rotterdam, Amsterdam, and the Hague, a Cheese Factory, an Automatic Auction, Small Market Gardens, "Polders," the Club of the Diamond Workers' Union, &c.

All particulars may be had from the Hon. Sec., Miss F. M. BUTLIN, Old Headington, Oxford.

The inclusive cost will not exceed Eight Guineas for the visit to Denmark, and Six Guineas for the visit to Holland.

WHITE STAR TOURING CLUB.

(President, Mr. William Carter, Parkstone.)

- July 5. Montreux, 16 days, £8.
Hon. Conductor, Councillor ROYSTON.
- August 2. Lugano, 16 days, £9 9s.
Hon. Conductor, Mr. W. CARTER.
- August 2. Montreux, 16 days, £8.
Hon. Conductor, Rev. T. P. SPEDDING.
- August 30. Lugano, 16 days, £9 9s.
Hon. Conductor, Councillor ROYSTON.
- August 30. Interlaken, 16 days, £8 12s. 6d.
Hon. Conductor, Rev. R. B. MORRISON.
NO EXTRAS.

The above prices include full programme of Excursions.

Particulars from the White Star Touring Club, 27, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

CROW'S NEST.—Mr. E. W. LUMMIS proposes to take a party to Eastern Switzerland in August. Inclusive cost: a fortnight abroad, 14 guineas; a month abroad, 19 guineas. Persons wishing to join should write early to 15, Green-street, Cambridge.

CANCER CURE.

Dr. ROBERT BELL's latest book,
"The Cancer Scourge and How to Destroy It."

1s. 2d. post free.

THE ORDER OF THE GOLDEN AGE,
153, Brompton Road, London, S.W.

THE FOURTH INTERNATIONAL SUMMER SCHOOL.

To be held at TORQUAY,
AUGUST 3 to 17, 1912.

Director: D. N. DUNLOP, Editor of "The Path."

TO PROMOTE UNITY IN RELIGION, PHILOSOPHY AND SCIENCE, AND ITS EXPRESSION IN ALL BRANCHES OF SOCIAL SERVICE.

A few of the LECTURERS are:—

Rev. Dr. K. C. Anderson, of Dundee; Professor Patrick Geddes, of St. Andrews University; Mrs. Despard; Sir Richard Stapley; Professor A. W. Bickerton; C. Lazenby, B.A.; Philip Oyler; W. Loftus Hare; W. Wroblewski; Dr. Tudor-Jones; Madame Pogosky, of the International Fellowship of Workers; J. C. Hudson (The Home School, Highgate); Miss Dora Marsden, B.A., Editor of "The Free-woman"; Professor R. M. MacIver, of Aberdeen University, and others.

A few of the SUBJECTS are:—

Brotherhood, Mysticism, Educational Problems, The Religions of the World, The Future of Art, The Philosophy of Work, &c., &c.

MUSIC.

Miss Margaret Holloway, Violinist; Mr. Van der Straeten, Cellist; Mr. Van der Straeten, Jun., Violist, and others. Mr. Conal Quirke at the Piano.

Societies and Organisations interested and desiring to be represented by a Lecturer are invited to communicate with the Secretary.

Descriptive pamphlet and COMPLETE PROGRAMME OF LECTURES, &c., can be obtained from Department I1, The Fourth International Summer School, Oakley House, Bloomsbury-street, London, W.C.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY of Presbyterian and Unitarian Ministers and Congregations of Lancashire and Cheshire.

THE ANNUAL MEETING will be held at Southport on Wednesday next, June 26.

11.30 a.m. Service in the Unitarian Church, Portland Street. Preacher, the Rev. A. W. Fox, M.A., of Todmorden. Supporter, the Rev. B. C. Constable, of Longsight.

12.45 p.m. Luncheon in the Cambridge Hall, Lord Street, 1s. each.

2 p.m. Business Meeting in the Temperance Institute, London Street, the President, the Rev. R. Travers Herford, B.A., in the Chair.

5 p.m. Tea in the Cambridge Hall, Lord Street, 1s. each.

6 p.m. Meeting in the Temperance Institute, London Street, Arthur S. Thew, Esq., in the Chair. Addresses by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A., Alfred Pilling, Esq., and the Rev. C. M. Wright, M.A. The Mayor of Southport will be present and will offer a welcome to the Assembly.

H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A. } Hon.
N. ANDERTON, B.A. } Secs.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL. NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL,
AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

TAN - Y - BRYN, LLANDUDNO.— PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

Sound Education under best conditions of health.

For Prospectus and information apply to
C. J. MONTGOMERY, M.A., Head Master.

LETCWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.
—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad.
Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon).
Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

FRENCH YOUNG LADY wishes for Situation au pair for three months, from beginning of July, in respectable English family. — For information apply to Mrs. GAYTE, 43 rue de Boulainvilliers, Paris 16^e.

PEARL ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000
Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHRUBSALL, } Directors.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, June 23.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN, M.A.
 Berrymondsey, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.
 Child's Hill, All Souls', Weech-road, Finchley-road, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. E. DAPLYN.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D., Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11 and 7, Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11 and 6.30, Mr. C. A. WING.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Mr. J. W. GALE; 6.30, Rev. JOHN ELLIS.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11 and 7, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, M.A.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. H. Gow, B.A.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. T. DAVENPORT BACON, of Salem, U.S.A.
 Ilford, High-road, 11 and 7, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Rev. Dr. TUDOR JONES.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11 and 6.30, Rev. F. HANKINSON.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 and 7, Rev. C. ROPER, B.A.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. GORDON COOPER.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. W. ROBSON, B.D.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. F. W. G. FOAT, Litt.D., M.A.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLOR.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Rev. JOHN ELLIS; 6.30, Mr. R. W. PETTINGER.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C., 11.15 and 7, Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. W. G. TARRANT.
 Wimbledon, 27B, Merton-road, 7, Mr. WM. LEE, B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11, Rev. JOSEPH E. WILSON.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. FRED. BROOKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30. Supply.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11, Rev. J. W. AUSTIN, M.A.; 6.30, Rev. J. WOOD.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11, Rev. JOSEPH WOOD; 6.30, Rev. J. W. AUSTIN, M.A.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. BODELL SMITH.
 BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45, Scholars' Service; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.
 BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. V. D. DAVIS.
 BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, M.A.

BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.
 BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Churchgate-street, 11 and 6.45, Mr. J. J. LAY, (Norwich).
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BECKH.
 { DEAN Row, 10.45 and
 { STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A.
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. E. DOWSON.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS and Rev. H. W. KING.
 HOBESHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. E. W. LUMMIS, M.A.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. H. M. NOLAN, M.A., B.Litt.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. J. R. RUSSELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. D. ROBERTS.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. STANLEY RUSSELL, B.A.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. ALEXANDER FARQUHARSON.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. R. H. MAISTER.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, Rusholme, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WHITAKER.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCAID, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. ALFRED HALL, M.A.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. DR. ODGERS.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TEAVERS.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. JAMES HARWOOD, B.A.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. T. P. SPEDDING.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Unity Hall Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. B. STALLWORTHY.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hong-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY."

Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda. Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 1½d.—1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to EDITOR, 36, Burlington-road, South Shore, Blackpool.

MARRIAGE.

GRIFFIN—FEWINGS.—On June 15, at the Unitarian Church, East-hill, Wandsworth by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., Ernest, eldest son of Alfred Ernest Griffin, 12, Morella-rd., Wandsworth Common, to Eleonora Irene Phelps, youngest daughter of Edwin Fewings, of Bolingbroke-grove, Wandsworth Common.

DEATHS.

EVERSHED.—On June 15, at Malthouse Villa, Station-road, Billingshurst, Sussex, Caroline, widow of the late William Evershed, of Tedfold, Billingshurst, aged 83.

ISAACS.—On June 14, at Rosenheim, Branksome-park, Bournemouth, Alice Mabel, second daughter of Charles Isaacs.

SMITH.—On June 15, at his residence, Oakfield, Woodbourne-road, Edgbaston, Birmingham, Howard Samuel Smith, aged 70 years.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

FRUIT GROWING.—Vacancy occurs for a Pupil on a Fruit Farm and Market Garden. — RYLAND, Radford Nurseries, Leamington.

SITUATION as Clerk, Storekeeper, Overlooker, Collector, or any position of trust, required by business man (34). Moderate salary. — "CORNUBIAN," INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

TYPEWRITING.

SERMONS, ARTICLES, and MS. of every description accurately typed. 1s. per thousand words. Price List on application.—Miss KENNEDY, 21, Cheverton-road, Hornsey-lane, N.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	419	CORRESPONDENCE :—	FOR THE CHILDREN	427
A PLEA FOR MIRACLE	420	Control of the Feeble-Minded	MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES :—
THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT :—		The Memorial to Miss Toulmin Smith at	Boys' Own Brigade	428
Love Among the Ruins	421	Manchester College	Yorkshire Unitarian Union	428
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS :—		The International Visits Association	The Eastern Union of Unitarian and
Church Life in Scotland.—I.	424	The Sunday School Association	other Free Christian Churches	429
The Altar on the Desolated Hearth	425	The Shooting of Rare Birds	Announcements	429
		BOOKS AND REVIEWS :—	NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	429
		Some Criticism of Bergson	NOTES AND JOTTINGS	431

 All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE proceedings at the annual British Conference of Young Men's Christian Associations, which opened at Manchester on Saturday last, show that the outlook of this Society has broadened by force of time and circumstance. A mere glance at the subjects for discussion shows that other questions than those with which the Y.M.C.A. occupied itself at its foundation have thrust themselves upon its notice. Problems of leisure and recreation, of belief and unbelief, of employment and unemployment—all these were discussed in a frank and liberal spirit. Mr. W. M. Oatts, of Glasgow, presented the report of a commission on "problems of belief and unbelief," which said that its members "were not despondent about the progress of religion in this country." They believed that the forces which tended towards unbelief and irreligion were spending themselves. Just as much of the unbelief of to-day was a recoil from the other-worldly religion of a preceding age, so there was likely to come a reaction against the tyranny of the materialism of the present age."

THE Commission on Employment and Unemployment reported that "broadly speaking, really efficient men were not often found out of employment. Such isolated cases as there were could generally be traced either to the temporary overcrowding of an industry, or to a lack of initiative, enterprise or character in the individual." We do not wish to comment on the last sentence further than to say that there is a great weight of disinterested and authoritative opinion against it. Of other causes of unemployment mentioned by the Commission the most prominent place was given to the exploitation of juvenile labour. Although the Commission did not believe that such exploitation could be absolutely abolished, they recommended, says the Manchester Guardian report of the Conference, "the formation of advisory committees in each centre dealing with boys, the support of the policy of making attendance at continuation schools compulsory, and the co-operation of the Y.M.C.A. with education authorities."

THE death of Professor A. W. Verrall, which took place on Tuesday last, has deprived Cambridge and England of one of their best-known classical scholars. In the Classical Tripos, he was bracketed second with Mr. T. E. Page, the late Professor Butcher being Senior Classic, while in the competition for Chancellor's medals this brilliant trio were bracketed equal. An exact and original scholar and fascinating lecturer, he had at the same time a rare gift of friendship, which will cause the greater regret at his decease so soon after his appointment as the first King Edward VII. Professor of English Literature. The work with which his name will be most associated in the public mind was "Euripides the Rationalist" and other expositions of the Greek dramatist, which, with Professor Gilbert Murray's translations, have taught us that Euripides was not merely a collection of particles or a corpus vile for critical dissection, but a man and a prophet whose teachings are worthy of the attention of this age no less than of fifth century Athens.

MR. ROOSEVELT was so frank in his criticism of European methods of government when he last burst upon us that he can hardly be surprised if there is some disposition on this side the Atlantic to criticise his present methods of establishing himself again at White House. When he announced to an expectant world that his hat was in the ring, it was generally felt that he had accurately described the state of affairs. To some of us it has always seemed that he was an amalgam of Abraham Lincoln and P. T. Barnum, in the proportion of 1 per cent. of the former to 99 of the latter. And although there is still too large a proportion of electors, both here and in the States, who will accept anything that a strong man says, especially if copy-book maxims are bawled at them through a Rooseveltian megaphone, it is a little too much to be expected to believe that the ex-President and his political rough-riders are "battling for the Lord." To the mere average European it appears perfectly clear that he has but invoked primitive instincts of combat and taken up quite carnal weapons in a battle for himself.

As there is some danger that the Woman's Movement should be identified in the public mind with indiscriminate window smashing, it was well that an attempt should be made to present the spiritual aspects of women's claims. The meetings at the Queen's Hall on Wednesday last were remarkable both for the number of distinguished people of various types who took part in them, and for the quality of the addresses that were delivered. The aim of the meetings was "to bring before the public the graver and more serious issues of the women's movement," on the ground that these are liable to be obscured in the midst of political conflict and social unrest. The Archbishop of Canterbury, in the course of a letter which was read, and the Bishop of Hull, in an address delivered at the afternoon meeting, pointed out that the movement is a much larger thing than the question of giving the suffrage. Mrs. F. E. Willey, speaking of its world-wide significance, said, "this movement for the freedom and emancipation of women is a great religious movement. There are no wrongs to women that are not also wrongs to men."

THE Bishop of Oxford, in a brilliant speech at the evening meeting, said, "I understand by the women's movement a movement which has led to the opening up to women's activities of a vast number of new fields of effort. As it presents itself to me the entrance of the women's movement into the strictly political arena and the demand for the suffrage has been part of the movement in its essence. . . I am as sure as I can be of anything in the world, that the existence of the law as it is at present (i.e., the state of things which it is sought to remedy by the Criminal Law Amendment Bill) has been possible because the mind of women was not represented in the legislature of the country. I might say the same with regard to a good many facts concerning the position of women in industrial and educational life. It has been possible that her views should be ignored and her interests overlooked only because the Legislature represented exclusively the male point of view. If the women's movement represents the claim of women for self-realisation, then I am certain that the movement, however much it may benefit by the individual activities of men and women will never secure its position without legislative enactment, which makes men and women side by side voters and citizens."

* * *

ALL lovers of justice—though probably many of them may never have heard of Dr. Bell's theory of cancer before last week, and may regard it sceptically even now—will be glad that his claim to practise research and explain his views to the public have been vindicated so triumphantly in the Lord Chief Justice's Court. When an injurious attack is made by one eminent medical man upon another because the latter has dared to put forth unorthodox views relating to the treatment of disease, we are confronted once more with that attitude of intolerance which some of the best people in the world seem to be capable of assuming whenever they meet with individuals whose painstaking search for truth has led them into new and uncertain paths. Whether Dr. Bell's theory is right or wrong, the mere layman is perhaps not yet qualified to judge; but, in view of the alarming increase in the number of victims to this terrible scourge, and the lack of any infallible cure or even unanimity of opinion as to its origin, it is not too much to ask that a medical man with the qualifications of Dr. Bell, and a record of disinterested service on behalf of humanity, should be allowed to place his views before the public without being stigmatised as a "quack" or having his honesty questioned. As The Times points out, the applause with which the verdict was received indicated that "public sympathy is on the side of honest unorthodoxy when made the object of an attack which wears the air of persecution." And it adds, "it is of no use for the medical profession to resent this feeling or to wrap themselves in superiority and put it aside as due to ignorance."

A PLEA FOR MIRACLE.

WHATEVER else the twentieth century revolt against intellectualism may have done or not done, it has, at any rate, made the modern mind profoundly uneasy about the scientific interpretation of the universe. Twenty years ago most of us hailed Natural Science as the new Light-Bringer. It gave us all a fine sense of superiority over our benighted fellows who were still groping about among the superstitions of religion. We were going to know everything and to do everything. We were also going to be everything, but more especially we were going to be "advanced." Gradually we began to suspect that we were "advancing" backwards into a cul-de-sac. To-day we realise we have been trapped by our intellectual pride into a rationalistic blind alley from which BERGSON and others are busily trying to lead us out.

The truth is that Human Life cannot exist without religion, and religion cannot exist without miracle. A natural science that reduces external reality into the "immutable laws" of nature, and a psychology that reduces internal personality into a deterministic system of states of consciousness, have begotten a salutary reaction. We cannot, indeed, limit miracle to Palestine or the apostolic age. Nor can we limit it, as MARTINEAU tried to do, to the inward soul. In so far as Science is true at all, it is true always, everywhere, and among all. It is true of inside and outside, of mind and of matter. If the principles whereby it predicts future events are exactly and not merely approximately sound, then it is sheer moral cowardice to refrain from asserting that in principle Science is able to predict the weather six months hence at a particular place, and the sex of a child about to be born, or the immediate issue of the bacteriological struggle now going on in the carcase of the present writer. The factors in these problems may be too complicated and minute for modern science to handle with certainty and precision; but there is nothing in the problem itself which can prove in principle refractory to scientific solution.

But many minds are satisfied not only that there are things in heaven and earth not dreamt of in our philosophy, but that of the ordinary daily movements and activities of life, the most important are, and for ever will be, too complex and too delicate for even the most exact of our instruments of precision, for our most minute and subtle methods of investigation. There are, indeed, many science-ridden intellects still so enslaved by Mid-Victorian prejudices that they shrink from the word "miraculous." But they are at least humble enough to admit the thought of the mysterious. Yet in the autobiography of most men it will be found that there is only a step, if indeed it be even a step, between the vivid consciousness of mystery and the frank acknowledgment of miracle. For the real content of miracle is that which is admirable, surprising, marvellous—something which awakens amazement and wonder. To the profoundly reflective mind and to the deeply brooding heart all life is strange, bewildering, baffling, full of suddennesses and inexplicable changes and fresh creations.

However loyal we may wish to be to Science we cannot acquiesce in the pedantic idea that the Universe is a self-contained machine, moving with uniform order, without any shock of surprise or thrill of the unexpected, or awe of unexperienced beginnings. Whatever order may belong to the world is the order, not of mechanism, but of an ever-poetic, creative life. It is not a thing of wheels and cylinders and pistons and cranks. It is essentially a Consciousness, a Divine Consciousness. It is the place of souls, the abode of intelligent beings who are being trained for ever-deepening communion with God. Even though our system be an ultimate Monism, it must be a Monism that includes what we call the Supernatural as well as the natural. It must admit of the invasion of the spiritual into the material, of the entrance of the eternal into the midst of time, of the irruption and eruption of the supernatural into and out of and through the natural. It is truly the scene of powers and presences most busy with us behind the veil, who yet send forth swift-moving, invisible hands, operative here and now in the commonplace routine of every day. Behind and within the visible is the invisible; behind and within the temporal is the eternal; behind and within the material is the spiritual. Our secular affairs are saturated through and through with sacred meanings. Nature is soaked with supernatural significances. Humanity is drenched with Deity. There is no order, no system, no plan, no design so finely constructed, so closely woven or firmly knitted, but that some mysterious and essentially miraculous reality beyond that order, system, plan, design, finds entrance and escape through its joints and meshes.

Our natural science, though true everywhere always and for all, so far as it goes and within its own order, is utterly inadequate to interpret the perpetual miraculousness of Reality. Science is a sieve too coarse to hold the gold dust and liquid wonder of all the True, the Beautiful, the Good. Our scientific knowledge is a fisherman's net in the ocean of wonder—the tides and currents of the deepest life of the spirit pass and repass through its meshes unobstructed and unobserved. The sense of this breaks out now and again into a fresh plea for the miraculous. The most readable modern book on the subject in English, known to the present writer, is Dr. JOHANNES WENDLAND's volume translated from the German by Professor H. R. MACKINTOSH, of Edinburgh.*

It states the difficulties of the non-miraculous view with great force and convincingness; but it hardly succeeds in removing the objectionableness of its own extreme logic. But it is decidedly a book to read, being full of stimulating suggestion and interest. It seeks to show us that the Universe, and our life, in it, are open and pervious on every side and through and through to the influence and presence of God. It exposes as the greatest of all superstitions the rationalistic superstition which regards reality as a self-enclosed system governed and controlled by rigid laws, whose "evolution" is simply an unrolling and making explicit of the film of the implicit, an unwinding of the inexorable implications of the past, without producing any departure or change or fresh life. It is not that we must set the Spiritual as something contrary to Nature, but that Nature itself is seen to be miraculous in every pulse and movement. We might almost say (not that Dr. WENDLAND says anything so inexact) that the Natural gives out the Supernatural as a flower gives out perfume, that it receives in the Supernatural at every pore as a tree drinks sunlight and breathes in air. The natural world we live in teems with the Supernatural; it is the very abode of amazement. To every regenerated heart it speaks of a "Love so amazing, so divine." The confession of our most vivid religious experience is always "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor heart conceived." Two words that described the Pentecostal experience still apply—"Suddenly . . . from Heaven." Suddenly the round of habit is broken; suddenly there is burst of light and love; suddenly earth is irradiated with heaven; suddenly sober men become drunken with the Spirit; suddenly the cold heart is fired with inextinguishable enthusiasm. No young man or young woman has ever yet fallen in love without believing in miracle. Whatever rationalistic or romantic nonsense they may talk, the miraculous fact is an extraordinary heightening and deepening and expanding of the joy and beauty and interest of life, a feeling that life has been flooded from founts of glory and illuminated with celestial splendour. There may have been no classifiable change in the visible fabric of things, except that all the world has somehow become lovely and lyrical and divine, the very leaves of the trees are fresher and greener, and all life is younger and more thrilling than it has ever been before. The great change is within; a tongue of fire has rested on the heart and burns there to brighten all that is without. So it is with any genuine access of religious experience. Where God's finger touches us, there our life leaps into flame. Real religion always opens all our faculties to a world of miraculous and adorable reality. It makes us aware that the obvious surface-world we habitually live on is a shadow-world lower than the world of God's Truth. Every great experience breaks the crust of custom and convention and lets in streams of new life from the realm of the Invisible. Every moment of emotional crisis makes a rent in the systematic order of things opening out into the Unknown and giving gleams and glimpses of a higher mode of being. Death, calamity, love, sorrow or overwhelming joy may stab our spirit broad awake, and we rise from dreams of system makers to find that the obvious is incredible and that only the miraculous is the simple believable thing. A freshness of feeling like the deliciousness of youth brings an atmosphere of romance even into our philosophy. Old scenes, old facts, old pursuits, are invested with an incantatory charm full of brightness and colour and song. "Away with systems!" The iron walls of negation are shattered by a breath. The pressure of physical prohibitions is removed and the wings of the soul are spread abroad in liberty. The ideal is felt to be the most actual instant thing of all, and the actual passes into a dream-world of illusion. The tangible becomes sacramental and seems ever on the point of vanishing.

What we worship and admire, and love and hope and pray for, becomes more enduring than the things of sense. The "accidents" of the Universe may appear constant, but essentially it has been transubstantiated into the body and blood of God.

"O world invisible, we view thee,
O world intangible, we touch thee,
O world unknowable, we know thee,
Inapprehensible, we clutch thee!"

J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT

LOVE AMONG THE RUINS.*

BY PROFESSOR G. DAWES HICKS.

1 Cor. xiii. 8 : Love never faileth.

BURNE-JONES exhibited for the first time in 1873 at the Dudley Gallery a picture that has never failed to appeal to all who care for what is beautiful in nature and in life. The picture bore the title, Love among the Ruins. It was great as a work of art; it was great also, as every true work of art is, through the wealth of meaning to which it gave expression. In the foreground were two lovers, seated on the fallen columns of a Renaissance palace, and around them was the crumbled masonry of the old building, overgrown now with wild rose bushes, indicative of the loveliness and beauty with which nature herself blots out the effects of the havoc and decay that sooner or later overtake the material productions of man. The maiden is gazing into space, with heavy pensive eyes, betraying all too clearly the thoughts and emotions of which her mind is full. The youth, to whom she clings for comfort, looks down upon her with tender wistful countenance, telling that he too is sharing the experiences which, at that moment, make up the contents of her consciousness. And overhead is the dark and stormy sky, frowning down upon them, as if to emphasise still more pointedly the obstacles to be encountered. But love is there, even amid those memories of "old unhappy far-off things," and the look of confidence in the young man's face betokens that love is strong enough to triumph over the tragedy of the bygone time.

What was that "tragedy"? The ruins are its symbol, but I do not know that the artist has anywhere left it on record what exactly he wished us to understand by them. Was it the tragedy of the girl's own past? Perhaps. And, then, the surrounding scene of desolation was rehearsing the story of a first home, of its early affections, its early hopes, its early joys, its early associations. It was recalling the stroke of desolation, by which all these had been wrenched from her present existence, and which had cast her adrift into a new environment, strange and unfamiliar, whence she had to seek for other companions and other interests to replace those which yesterday were hers, but which to-day are hers no longer. Crises such as that are experiences, sufficiently common, and when they come they sever the very fibres of our life in twain, so that the self that now is and the self that has been seem almost two different personalities. Lit by the lamp of memory, how soft and radiant is the image of the past that stands out to view! In the calm light of retrospect we realise how much of quiet joy and happiness was distributed over the story of our years. We see then the care and solicitude that made life bright and fair, the youthful affection that made the world romantic, the birth of thoughts that brought our soul in harmony with nature, and deepened our hold on earth's familiar scenes. How often is it the case that the worth and value of our inheritance is only recognised by us when thus we sit among its ruins!

Or, perchance, the picture had yet a wider significance. Did it refer symbolically to the conditions which surround the men and women of the age in which we live? Did the artist mean those shattered and silent witnesses of former human greatness, those remnants of walls and towers, to suggest the ravages which science and criticism have made upon the beliefs and convictions that sustained and supported the lives of our forefathers? Did he mean them to kindle the reflection that in the place of what were once assured certainties we have the ground strewn now with doubts and misgivings, which seem

* Miracles and Christianity. Hodder & Stoughton. 6s. net.

* A sermon preached at Manchester College, Oxford, June 9, 1912.

often to bar the road to hope and trust; that in the place of temples reared to God, the Parent Mind, we have now, for many souls, only the fragmentary stones, representing, when thus torn from their original setting, but abstract and powerless ideas? Are the young people, now entering upon life, in the position of those depicted by the painter, encompassed by the débris of a vanished spiritual world? I do not intend, of course, to thrust this interpretation upon the artist. I am content to offer it as one that is of interest on its own account.

But, take the ruins to signify what you will, the main consideration is the lesson intended, in any event, to be conveyed—the lesson, namely, that there is a native vitality, if one may call it so, of the human heart capable of rising above the chaos, and of building again the shrines of the sanctities that make us men. It would, indeed, ill betide us, pilgrims as we are across the fields of change, were it otherwise. We are wending our way along paths that are not strange to the tread of human feet, and hardly any features shall we encounter but such as are intertwined with the thoughts, the feelings, the aspirations, of untold generations of rational beings who had striven, toiled, and died, ere we commenced the journey. Around us everywhere are the relics and memorials of thoughts and notions which are no longer ours; and were we given much to meditate thereon, it might almost appear as though this ancient earth were fast becoming the grave of ideals that are bereft of their inspiration, and of divinities that have ceased to be regarded as real. As a rule, we are too deeply immersed in the duties of the hour to give ourselves over to broodings such as these. It is only when the forces of destruction burst forth in our immediate vicinity, only when a violent severance comes and the continuous thread of our existence is snapped asunder, that the problem is forced upon us in all its magnitude and intensity. Then it is—so may we render the lesson of the artist—then it is that we learn the strength of love among the ruins, then it is that we become aware of the power of that great faculty of soul which is ready to build a temple to God on the tomb of every earthly happiness and even out of the very stones of the sepulchre. Whilst, in such circumstances, the merely cold calculating intellect will attain, at the most, to Stoic courage, love, hoping ever and believing ever in goodness and beauty, will keep us in touch with the eternal verities, and suffer us not to lose sight of their deathless character.

“The thing that seems
Mere misery, under human schemes,
Becomes, regarded by the light
Of love, as very near, or quite
As good a gift as joy before.”

Whether there be prophecies, they shall be done away, whether there be tongues they shall cease; but Love, the quickener of Faith and the inspirer of Hope, abideth. Religion attains its highest consummation in that evangel, and for Christ and his apostles love was a principle universal in its scope and replete with inexhaustible resources for keeping the ordinary ways of life fresh and bright and beautiful. As they viewed it, the world itself existed for the sake of love, and the common things of nature, the common things of the human heart, were the greatest things and the most fair, just because they were constantly exemplifying, in ever varied forms, the one fundamental principle. Modern modes of thought have sometimes tended, it is true, to thrust recognition of this principle into the background, and even to deny altogether its credibility. “The trampling march of unconscious power is,” we have recently been informed, omnipotent, and for us it only remains to cherish, ere the blow falls, the lofty thoughts that ennoble our little day. But suffer a great poet to cast his eye upon the scene, and once more it yields the old familiar lesson. Browning, for instance, seeks, in one of his finest efforts, to re-tell the story of the world’s development in such a manner as, without doing violence to the facts of science, shall yet be consistent with the facts of life. Paracelsus is represented in that work as a man whose pride lay solely in the analysing intellect, and whose one aim was to solve through its means the problem of existence. And when thus dealt with, the whole structure and fabric of civilisation seemed to be nothing but the exhibition of power which by sheer strength had obtained supremacy on the surface of the globe. Paracelsus had gazed on power so exclusively that he had grown blind to aught beside. He “saw no use in the past; only a scene of degradation, ugliness, and tears.” At last, however, there came upon him the crushing weight of an overwhelming sorrow, and through its revealing influence the theory he had advanced with so much confidence collapsed like a fictitious dream. “Love’s undoing taught him the worth of love in man’s estate,” taught him, too, how love preceded power, and “with much power, always much more love.” The entire movement of evolution presented itself to him then in a new and gracious light. The fashioning of the universe had itself been the work of joyous love—a love that is born anew in the myriad centres of life in the universe, and goes on multiplying itself lavishly and unceasingly.

And is not science itself along its own lines gradually arriving at Browning’s conclusion? Earthly love, so science is being constrained to admit, was no late arrival, no afterthought, no addition to the merely mechanical process of natural selection. With the first appearance of the living cell it took its rise; there, in the most rudimentary of organisms, were contained the possibilities of all the subsequent manifestations of it with which we are now familiar. Never, at any time, has evolution been a mere struggle for existence; never, at any time, has its procedure been one merely of battle and strife. Always, from the very beginning, the individual has been sacrificing itself for its offspring, and has been thereby exhibiting the characteristic of living for others. Love, in the larger sense of the word—crude, instinctive love in the primitive stages, no doubt, but still love—has been from the commencement a ruling central principle in the upward march of life. And who can gauge all that it covers in the human world? It stands for the earliest outpouring of feeling that leads the little child to nestle in its mother’s arms, and for the responding thrill that sends the answering caresses back. It stands for the feeling that originates the merry comradeship of young people, and the strong grip of friendship by which in later years grown men are held together. It stands for the bliss our painter has depicted, and for the deep peace that will follow it, when in after time the old man and his life-companion will pass together down the vale of years. It stands for the feeling that binds one to one’s native land, and prompts one to do and dare that its homes may be safe and their inmates secure. It stands for the feeling that urges the search for truth and which clings to it with a passionate devotion when once it is found. It stands for the feeling that impels the great and good to sacrifice every personal ease and comfort in the pursuit of noble ideals, and leads them to surrender all for the sake of realising that which to them is of highest worth. Thus might you trace its ever-deepening hold upon the advancing life of our common humanity, and observe its constant tendency towards the expansion of the merely single self, culminating only when the heart of the whole community beats in the pulse of the individual, and the joys and griefs, the disasters and triumphs, of mankind are felt by him as his own. This it is which makes our world a drama of profound and often breathless interest, which converts it from a pale succession of mechanical events into a theatre of strenuous spiritual exertion and noblest moral deed.

Once to appreciate these facts in their true proportion is to become conscious of their tremendous import in any serious attempt to construe the nature and meaning of the universe. And in view of them, we need count it no small matter to be thrown back upon a potency of soul so persistent and ever deepening, when the glory of our outward lot seems to have departed, and the things of time make manifest their evanescence by crumbling into fragments at our feet. Consider, then, what it is that love can do among the ruins of our earthly lives. How does it evince its efficacy when our path is strewn with the remnants of what were once the objects of our trust?

In the first place, Love may regain for us the road that leads the human soul to God, even though we had come to regard that road as irretrievably lost. For always and repeatedly it has been through the ascending pathway of the affections that the consciousness is gained of a Personality to whom we ascribe the characteristics we are wont to designate as divine. Perception and thought are not, indeed, the materialising faculties they are sometimes represented as being. There is, in truth, nothing materialising in the interpretation they yield of the vast scheme of reality—the interpretation which tells of the unchanging laws exhibited everywhere by changing phenomena, of the enduring principles indicated everywhere by transitory events, of the invisible ideas manifested everywhere by the visible things of sense. These are precisely the traits of rationality, and that reason discerns them throughout in the processes of the universe is certainly a curious ground for the contention that reason materialises whatsoever it touches. Yes; but, though they enable us to find a unity in the world, they do not of themselves suffice to guarantee a-unity of souls. It is the unique, the profoundly inner and yet essentially outgoing and self-expanding feeling we have for other souls, that in linking us each to each, carries us all to God. Love—the enlightened love of a knowing mind—waits as little for supernatural attestations as it waits for logical proofs of the reality of Him in whose charge it reposes the commonwealth of minds; it bears within itself, so to speak, the intimation of its divine origin, and in its own unfaltering way knows that intimation to be one on which it can depend. Something, I think, wonderfully significant—and wonderfully reassuring too—is to be found in the implicit persuasion of even the most sceptical of intellects that the power of discerning the secret of one noble heart would bring us into immeasurably closer contact with the meaning of existence than would be obtained, for example, by the facility of reading the law of gravitation through and through. Explain it how you will, there lies at the back of all our intellectual doubts and difficulties the insuppressible conviction that no indifferent Nemesis presides over the course of the ages or determines the trend of human affairs. Native as it is to the soul, that conviction will not be silenced. It finds expression, for instance, in the confession that has just been wrung from the Wessex poet, face to face as he conceives himself to be with a fast vanishing belief in a personal God:—

“How sweet it was in years far hied
To start the wheels of day with trustful prayer,
To lie down liegely at the eventide
And feel a blest assurance he was there!

“And who or what shall fill his place?
Whither will wanderers turn distracted eyes
For some fixed star to stimulate their pace
Towards the goal of all their enterprise?”

I know not how to interpret the tenderness here evinced towards the former things save as the protest of Love, re-asserting its supremacy among the ruins, and vindicating once more its claim to be heard. And surely, if reason be true to itself, if its function still be to prove all things and to hold fast that which is good, it cannot afford to ignore that voice, or to dismiss as baseless the testimony it bears. Reason, at least, must meet the challenge which the largest and deepest experiences of life force upon it; reason, at all events, must not stultify itself by taking lightly for granted the enormous assumption that the love we feel is greater than the Love we ought to trust.

Love, again, can span the gulf that severs at times one human soul from another. For often, alas, personal affection and mutual sympathy have with us a way of becoming lost treasures. There is, of course, a sense in which every finite being is compelled to live in a little realm apart. The loneliness from which the individual spirit cannot escape, the “straits between us thrown” that isolate us even from our nearest friend, have furnished a well-worn theme for moralists and poets. “Each in his hidden sphere of joy or woe our hermit spirits dwell” is a dictum of Keble’s Christian Year, and that there is in every personality a factor which is incommunicable cannot be gainsayed. Yes; but on the other hand the communicable things are illimitable, and they are, after all, the things of incomparably the greatest moment. The danger we have to guard against is that of keeping these things to ourselves. Is it not the case that we may dwell in the same house with another, and be yet as wide apart as though oceans rolled between? In fact, the estrangements of life occur not as a rule amongst those whose interests differ, but amongst those whose interests are akin. The casual acquaintance offers usually too few points of contact with us for misunderstandings to arise; those of our own family circle, those nearest to us in feeling and in purpose, alone incur the only serious risk of dissension. And the loss of mutual confidence between those who have once known its blessedness is, however it may appear in the pages of drama and romance, one of the bitterest catastrophes of life. Ah! then we may experience the power of love among the ruins, and welcome even the blows of misfortune should they help to discipline our souls into fellowship and re-union. Not seldom, indeed, it does happen so. Have you not noticed the strange and subtle influence there is in suffering and sorrow to knit together in bonds of closest intimacy those who have borne it together? Tennyson’s picture of the reconciliation of a husband and wife over the little grave of the child they lost in other years touches us so deeply because it stands for so much. It is symbolic of Love, rising triumphantly over what had been its ruins, and bringing into companionship two sundered souls.

Love, once more, may build the bridge to Heaven even for those who are in Hades. A fine old legend relates of Christ that he descended into hell. And certainly, in a pictorial way, the legend expresses a great truth—the truth which people have felt to be contained in the thought of Jesus bearing their sins upon the Cross. They have been conscious that perfect Love does in a very real sense suffer the penalty of sin. Suppose that one who is inexpressibly dear to you has somehow been guilty of a wrong which has meant to him or to her social disgrace and ruin. Would you not be willing to take upon yourself almost any penalty could the object of your solicitude be saved thereby? Aye, would the sufferer endure any suffering that would not also be yours? The illustration is not altogether inappropriate. The Christian conception of redeeming love does imply that in this manner the innocent experience, and must experience, the misery of the guilty. Indeed, in this manner, not only Christ, but thousands of good men and women have atoned, and are atoning, for the sins of others. And it is just the assurance that self-sacrificing love by sharing the penalties of evil must ultimately conquer it, which has made Christianity so gloriously optimistic. Human love victorious among the ruins of society is for it the promise and the guarantee of the divine Love winning in the end all conscious souls to itself.

Finally, in respect to those inevitable partings which we cannot prevent, love will confirm and sanctify the trust that love’s fruition is yet to be. For immortality is a sure prophecy of the heart, its inalienable testimony that love is stronger than death. No one more powerfully than Browning has revealed the inner meaning of that testimony. Recall how David, having charmed away the madness of Saul by the tunes of his lyre, flings aside his instrument, and seeks to give utterance in song to the faith which is in him. Before him stands the wreck and ruin of a king, seemingly the destruction of all that had once been great. Yet David finds within himself a love and an affection for his master—a desire, a craving, for Saul’s continued personal existence—so fervid and deep that words can convey no idea of its intensity. “Can I, a frail mortal, possessed only of faculties that have been bestowed, of a nature that has been given, can I,” he urges, “rise to the height of an affection which God, its bestower, its giver, does not feel?”

“Would I fain in my impotent yearning do all for this man,

And dare doubt He alone shall not help him, who yet alone can?”

Can the love I feel be greater than the love I yet must trust? That, surely, were to harbour an unworthy notion of God the Father—thus to doubt the love that is the source and inspiration of our own. Who is there that, when bowed in the presence of a dark, bewildering bereavement, has not rather in the stillness been conscious of a holier resignation, and known the truth of things to be nearer to him than in the dull cold moods of a despairing mind? And in such moments David’s prayer becomes the prayer of our common humanity:—

“I know that my service is perfect;
Oh, speak through me now,
Would I suffer for him that I love?
So would’st thou—so wilt thou.”

Thus it is that Love guarantees the soul’s immortal destiny, such is the pledge it offers of the preservation of our noblest heritage. “The strong desire that your friend shall survive death affords no proof that he will,” protests the critical understanding. “Yes,” answers Love, “it does; for He who implanted in us the desire is no deceiver, but the purest Perfection of true and genuine life. Instinct in nature leads neither bird nor insect astray; instinct in man excites no false anticipations of the future awaiting him, but is at least as trustworthy as that which guides the swallow on the wing.” Let, then, our trembling hearts cast off their fear, and go forward with confidence to the fond greeting of those who will sit with us among the ruins of the transient things of earth, and share with us the higher things of the life that is to be.

"Whoso hath felt the Spirit of the Highest Cannot confound nor doubt him nor deny:

Yea with one voice, O world, tho' thou deniest,
Stand thou on that side, for on this am I."

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

CHURCH LIFE IN SCOTLAND.

I.

THERE are a few esoteric places on the face of the earth—like Oxford and Scotland—which lie in a storm-field of magic-forces, out of which souls come, polarised, so that they beat for ever after to the rhythm of their glamour-waves. To know such places you have to go through them, and when you have gone through them you despise those who have not. They may paint them, discuss them, try to sympathise with them, but the Oxonian and the Scotchman know—it is they who have the music in them. Such places are like the great round, red ball of sun in the heaven, seen from the rapid-moving train, they travel with you along the rush and hurry of life.

The poor world is forced to allow the old Oxford man or the young Scotch man the last word, for it has other things to do than waste time about fine fancies and virginian-creeper sentiments. But the truth may be that if you want to know Oxford, you will have to go to Manchester, and if you want to know Scotland, Germany may be able to give you important information. Scotland's greatest poet believed in the salutaryness of seeing ourselves from across the street or from the next door step. Distance may bring disenchantment, and when we get away from ourselves we may become sensible.

And it were, I think, well if that Presbyterianism which has given birth to Scotland and holds it by its apron strings—as a mother holds her child—could read, mark, and inwardly digest this remarkably well-informed, just, admiring and discriminating book by Dr. Dibelius.* A Free Kirk Professor could hardly have done many parts better, and some parts he could not have done so well. For when it comes to fondling mother-Church the only difference at bottom between a Presbyterian and a Roman Catholic is that the one is Presbyterian and the other Roman Catholic. In both cases alike their church is a divine mother, and all the rest are "steppies," and intruders, of the earth. Dibelius, however, though conscious of what a great mother the Presbyterian Church has been to the Scottish race, can see, without any sentiment in the eye, the wrinkles and crows' feet that are the signature of mortality upon the face.

The book begins with a rapid cinematographic view of Scotch social history—wherein pass Highlands, absentee landlords, solitary places where the wild bird alone is kept alive for the August shootings, young men leaving the paternal roof and passing these moors on their way to the big cities and far-off prairies, being a mere accident on the ground where they were born and bred; "the deep blue seas, the sunny hills, the romantic heights" not theirs, whose blood and bone is of them! The Lowlands, too, are seen: little towns growing up to cities through the eighteenth century, as industry develops; the spirit changing in adaptation to the shop-environment, while "wealth accumulates," and men show a tendency to decay; the rise into first-rate importance of the question, "among the English as well as the Scotch," not as to whether "a thing is good, or a certain standard essential, or a misfortune blameworthy, but what will the thing cost?" At the bottom of the picture, a trickle of whisky among hissing tears, and slums and lodging-houses where the riff-raff welter among darkness and rack-rent, such as have no parallel in Germany.

The ancient poverty of the land is emphasised, its isolation from European culture, some highland parts having never yet been touched by Protestantism, and also the Puritan strictness of its people; its Sabbatarianism, which, as Dean Ramsay has related, so filled some people with godly anger one Sunday as the kirk was "skailin," when they met a man coming along the road "whistlin' and lookin' as happy as if it was the middle of the week," that they attacked the poor sinner to the danger of his life. Out of that poverty and puritanism have come some of Scotland's greatest sons, David Hume, Robert Burns, and Thomas Carlyle—terrible heretics the three of them, however.

When Calvinism and the Scotch character met through the work of that Boanerges, John Knox, it was one of the marriages made in heaven, as far as compatibility of temper goes. Dibelius says "Knox gave Scotland its soul." He gave it both its mind and its soul. For what was Scotland without its Presbytery and School Board? Calvinism brought to the rough, unlettered folk, earnestness, discipline, and a Church for the people ruled by the ministers of their choice. The members had to go to church. If they did not turn up, the kirk-session would know the reason why. Elders patrolled the streets at service-time, and had entry to the homes, to ferret out any guilty wretch who neglected his divine duty of church attendance. As readers of Geo. Macdonald know, the session of Elders sat to try offences of members and impose penalties. The guilty might have to stand with feet in a tub of water at the Church door till service commenced, or blush in some other dreaded place of penance, while before the assembled congregation of the faithful the minister would reprove him, Sunday by Sunday, once, twice, or up to half a year. They were taught that the chief end of man was "to glorify God and to enjoy him for ever." But it was a dread glory and a fearful joy.

It had one similarity with the ancient pagan religions of Greece and Rome, that it entered into all parts of the life, church, public, and domestic. The hearth was an altar, and the father a priest. Obedience and awe made up the greater part of love for the children. The head of the house represented God's majesty and authority, and if there was any grace and fellowship in Godhead, it was the mother who represented it. And what mothers they were! No country could owe more of its greatness than does Scotland to its mothers. Stern, absolutely without gush, often unable even to write, they had enough unfinished material in their heads and hearts to make them equal rearers of philosophers, scholars, and prophets. And religious piety was the soul of them.

But changes came. Culture made its appearance, the social conditions altered, the patriarchal relations declined, and "Moderatism" came to its day in Scotland about the middle of the eighteenth century. Previously the parson was unmercifully punished if he was seen to take snuff on Sunday or powder his wig, like the unfortunate minister of New Machar in 1735. But now they became jolly good fellows, and liked some hearty company of a Sunday night. They struck up acquaintanceships with science and art, became, in a word, gentlemen, and were not unequal to pluralities. It is well known that Chalmers—afterwards the great Disruption leader, when arguing in support of his candidature for a mathematics post in St. Andrews—expressed himself to the effect that two days a week gave a minister all he needed for his ministerial duties, leaving four for indulgence in the studies that delighted him. The Moving Finger wrote that word, and the day came when Chalmers would rather not have said it.

Moderatism, however, in Scotland, was rather a poor aufklärung; it slackened the bonds of Calvinism, but it was without religious inspiration either for ministers or men. When religion tries to be gentlemanly it is apt to become effeminate and pithless. And Scotland had to wait till the Disruption in 1843 for a great outburst of genuine spiritual life in the Church.

The Disruption sprang out of a protest against Patronage. Cases arose—especially the famous Auchterarder case—where a man was presented to the charge and had to be accepted, the people unwilling. The Courts decided that the Church had no right to make its own laws, in such or any other cases. It was a vital question of freedom in spiritual things or State control, for, of course, in Scotland the Church was an Established Church and State-supported. The evangelicals under Drs. Chalmers, Candlish, and Cunningham, decided to come out, and they came out, leaving behind them State emolument and property, their churches, manses, university posts, all the capital and the glebes belonging to the Establishment.

On May 18, 1843, when the General Assembly of the Church took place in Edinburgh, they severed themselves from the State Church, acknowledging Christ alone as their head. It had been estimated that about 70 would brave the sacrifice of church and home, but out they filed from St. Andrew's Church, in august procession, and when the number was reckoned it was found that out of 1,203 clergymen not 70, but 474 had left their mother fold. There ran through Scotland a thrill of mingled sorrow, admiration, joy. Lord Jeffrey, the great lawyer and litterateur, when the news was taken to him, could only exclaim, "I am proud of my country!"

* Das Kirchliche Leben Schottlands von Lic. Dr. Otto Dibelius, Giessen, 1911, 233 p.

The Free Kirk of Scotland had seen its hour of birth. Naked and penniless under the open sky! One of the greatest hours in Scottish ecclesiastical history! The enthusiasm of the deed spread over Lowlands, Highlands and Islands, and by the end of a year "500 churches had been built, and manses were rising; college-buildings were erected for the training of future students, and the Church Constitution was drawn up by representatives of the congregations to the General Assembly!" Of course, as Dr. Dibelius points out, there has been subsequently a good deal of overlapping, competition both at home and in the missions abroad, and, worst of all, a sectarian spirit has sometimes been created that was once very bitter. To-day there is hardly anything essential to choose between the Established and the Free Churches, for in the former also the congregations have power to select their own ministers, and a feeling of friendship and unity is in the ascendant and exchanges of pulpit take place. It would be difficult to-day to find in broad Scotland a gardener who would take the position of a fellow-craftsman after the Disruption, who, when asked the difference between him and the Established Church, replied, "No, it is not in doctrine, service, or organisation." What is the difference, then? "Ah, Sir, there is a very, very great difference between us and them. We are redeemed, and they are damned."

The Union of the Free and U.P. Kirks, consummated under Rainy's leadership in 1900, but surely hastened by the work in 1863 of that fine, simple, big-built, big-hearted man, Principal John Cairns, who had once been a herd-laddie, has given a new awakening to the ideal of complete Presbyterian unity in Scotland. But the principle of Establishment, and that alone, stands in the way, and, personally, we have no hope that it will be removed.

Some practical working arrangement in the Home and Foreign Mission Field, to prevent competition and over-lapping, would remove the worst features of the case, and now that the Established Church has liberty to fix its own formula of subscription, it is not evident what advantages would accrue to compensate for the loss of State support and endowments. It seems impossible to stir up any enthusiasm against the principle of Establishment in Scotland; the people prefer to let well alone; and so long as the question among Scotch folk is, as Dr. Dibelius says (of course, in the face of Covenants and Disruptions), not the principle and good of the thing, but its cost, and so long as the Parish Kirk justifies its existence creditably, as it does to-day, there is not likely to be any Disestablishment Bill for Scotland.

R. NICOL CROSS.

THE ALTAR ON THE DESOLATED HEARTH.

THIS phrase has a history, and a sad one. Upon catching sight of this heading, there are eyes will instantly glow with a strange fire, conjuring up scenes of forty years ago. Then as memory turns its kaleidoscope the ruby glow of passionate indignation will soften and fade out into the tender moonstone hue of compassion, under sense of lachrimæ rerum. The story requires the raking of ashes where once the violent flames of human vengeance leaped in destruction, but the fires have long burnt themselves out. Among the grey cold cinders may be found some bright gold coins of human endurance or human pity.

The tale takes one back to a time when parliamentary representation was a closed preserve for a privileged few. In the County of Cardigan, the county magnates were wont to make selection of their representatives, count the number of their tenants, and adjudge the issue upon that reckoning. There was no supposition that the tenants had any convictions of their own. But in the election of 1868, some of these tenants ventured to vote against the prescribed candidate. As a result, a system of petty persecution began. Men were driven out of homesteads upon which their forefathers, their fathers, and themselves had lived for generations and centuries. One of the evicted was David Jones, of Llewelyn's Fountain. With the Cymro's strong sentimental attachment to the home of his fathers, in order to be comforted for what he felt to be a well-nigh unendurable separation he besought his minister to hold a farewell religious service at the old home, previous to his departure for an unknown residence in a new land beyond the seas.

Friends came from all parts of the countryside, drawn by sorrow and sympathy, and all possible influences were in operation to charge the occasion with unforgettable anguish. To the susceptible actors in this drama every stone in the walls cried out; the tall elms moaned in agony as they creaked in the wind, and the very rafters shook as though sharing the intense emotion of the sad company gathered beneath them. The preacher had laid upon his sensitive spirit that day one of his hardest duties. For him, too, worse times were in store. A few years hence he and his congregation were to suffer eviction from the religious home of their forefathers, and have the gates barred against them from God's Acre, hallowed by the dust of their beloved dead. Such is the way Unitarians in mid-Wales have been called upon and deemed worthy to suffer for their faith. And though the poet-preacher of this occasion must administer the balm of comfort to souls distressed, and bid them rely upon the divine equality for the final award, could he honestly declare that their woes were not preventible woes, and bid them welcome the oppressor as the angel of God? Nay, the habitually cheerful sounds of the yard and meadow seemed to have changed into raucous protest, as they broke upon the hushed assembly; and moving with silent ire, and laying their passion upon the hearts of those present, the ancestral spirits seemed to pass to and fro. In God's name was denounced the unholy power that could wreck homes of peace, and scatter the lovers of their fatherland to alien shores. Never so sweet is the fragrance as the perfumed breath of incense from an altar soon to be flung into the mire. "There are herbs" (said the comforter) "that give forth a sweeter odour when trampled upon. So let the heel of the persecutor discover in us the heavenly grace of patience and resignation and courage to suffer without stint for the cause of truth."

And these unhappy victims of tyranny had need of these virtues, for the chapter of their misfortunes was but just begun. On the eve of sailing from England, the family was lodged in a house that was afterwards known to have been infected by smallpox. The children caught the infection, and every one died, at sea, or shortly after landing in New York. There was left no further desire to venture upon an enterprise undertaken for their children's sake, now that the children were no more. In the mother's breast, at least, the last elements of hope were extinguished. Having learnt in a vision that she was soon to follow her dear ones, she begged to be brought back to her homeless homeland. Like a gaunt Niobe, the fountain of whose tears is all dried up, whose heart is turned to stone, she returned to the countryside where her once happy youth was spent, and the years of happier motherhood had sped peacefully away. Not long did she survive. Then was the man David Jones forlorn indeed. Bereft of home, of wife, of children, small wonder if he felt that his own life was more desolate than the desolated hearth from which he had been driven. A grim retribution overtook his persecutors, but Nemesis can never give back that which has been lost.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

CONTROL OF THE FEEBLE MINDED.

SIR,—May we appeal, through your valuable paper, for help in securing the better protection and control of the feeble minded, one of the most urgent social needs of the present day. The feeble minded at present form from 10 to 20 per cent. of our prisoners, 62 per cent. of the inmates of inebriate homes, 50 per cent. of the inmates of rescue homes, and 20 per cent. of the inmates of workhouses. The individual misery caused by our present treatment of them is unspeakable, and their cost to their country is immense, as they tend to increase more rapidly than the strong and healthy, and in their families mental deficiency reproduces itself continually. Thus one family, where the weakness first showed itself as moral defect, increased in two generations to twenty-seven descendants, only four of whom were normal individuals, the others being either thieves, prostitutes, paupers, inebriates, lunatics, or feeble minded.

For seventeen years the National Association for the Feeble Minded has laboured to bring this evil before the public by demonstrating its influence as a potential source of racial decadence, pauperism, and crime. The Princess Christian's Farm Colony has been founded by it, for the permanent care of the feeble minded at Hildenborough, Kent, where colonists of both sexes, aged from 14 to over 30 years, are rescued from mischievous or vagrant lives, and now usefully and contentedly occupied in farm work and other industries necessary for a community of over 120 inhabitants; and twenty-four other Homes are affiliated with the Association.

It seems now probable that the efforts of the National Association, and of many others interested, to secure better legislation for the care and control of this class, may be shortly crowned with success. The Feeble Minded Control Bill, drawn up by the Association, and introduced by Mr. Stewart at the House of Commons on May 17 last, received strong support from members on both sides of the House, and the production of the Government Bill on the evening before its discussion gave promise that legislation of some kind is likely to ensue. This position is, however, only secured by continually active and necessarily costly propagandism, and funds are immediately needed for this, and for the work of permanent care. £6,000 is needed to pay off the debt upon the five Homes at the Colony.

For a sum of £3,000 donors are entitled to name a house on the Colony.

For a sum of £250 to name a ward.

For a sum of £100 to name a bed.

We appeal to all who are convinced of the importance of the Association's task to support its efforts liberally during the present crisis. All donations in aid of this urgently needed work will be gratefully acknowledged by the Secretary of the Association, 72, Denison House, 296, Vauxhall Bridge-road, Westminster.

We have the honour to remain,

Your obedient servants,

WILLIAM CHANCE (Chairman),
CLIFFORD ALLBUTT, AVEBURY,
SHUTTLEWORTH,
L. R. ROFFEN,
LOUISA TWINING.

June 18, 1912.

THE MEMORIAL TO MISS TOULMIN SMITH AT MANCHESTER COLLEGE.

SIR,—The reference to this Memorial in the report of the Manchester College Trustees, just issued, contains a slight error, which I should be glad if you would allow me to correct in this place. The verses inscribed under the portrait are there ascribed to me. As many who have seen them will no doubt have recognised, they are borrowed from Meredith, one of the few "Epitaphs," Greek in their simplicity and intensity, in which he enshrined his passionate sense of Life in death. My part in the matter is simply that of the fortunate discoverer. For I will dare to assert that these verses were not more exquisitely expressive of the nature of "the Lady C. M.," who inspired them, than they are of the nature of Lucy Smith. As some of those who knew her may not have an opportunity of seeing the Memorial, I quote the lines which are inscribed immediately after her name:

"To them that knew her, there is vital flame

In these the simple letters of her name.
To them that knew her not, be it but said,

So strong a spirit is not of the dead."

I am, &c.,

C. H. HERFORD.

University of Manchester,
June 17, 1912.

THE INTERNATIONAL VISITS ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—Now that the holiday season approaches, would you allow me to remind your readers of the objects of the International Visits Association?

Each summer we visit one or two countries where, with the help of native lecturers who explain, in English, how their country is governed, how the land is divided and cultivated, how the children are educated, how the housewives manage their homes, the character of the Labour and Women's Movements and much besides, and with the help of native guides to schools and colleges, co-operative dairies and automatic auctions, model farms and old-age pension homes; our visitors are able to get more into touch with the life and people of the country in the course of a ten days' visit than they could hope to do in many months, perhaps years, without the help of our Association.

The International Visits Association, which was founded under the presidency of the late Earl of Stamford, has up to the present time arranged six visits to Denmark, two to Norway and Holland, and one to Sweden. This year Dr. Fridtjof Nansen is the president. Councils have been founded in Norway and Denmark to work with the British Council, and the names of the members are a sufficient guarantee of the correctness of the information which is given up to the International visitors. Professor Otto Andersen is chairman of the Norwegian Council, Professor Harald Høffding of the Danish; the English Council numbers among its members Miss Margaret Ashton, Lady Byles, Professor F. Y. Edgeworth, Professor Patrick Geddes, Mr. Lees-Smith, Miss Madeline Shaw Lefevre, Professor Paul Vinogradoff, Mr. Sidney Webb, and Mr. Philip Wicksteed.

This year a third visit has been arranged to Holland (July 23 to August 2), and a seventh to Denmark (August 13 to 23). The centre for the Dutch visit is Haarlem, a peaceful, picturesque old city within easy distance of the more noisy Amsterdam and its picture galleries. There lectures will be given by the best Dutch authorities on "Dutch History," "Horticulture," "The Educational System," "The Social Democratic Party," "Canals and Canal Life," "Dutch Manners and Customs as Portrayed in Dutch Art," &c., and visits will be paid to a cheese factory, "Polders," an automatic auction, the club of the Diamond Workers' Union, &c.

The centre of the Danish visit will be Copenhagen, where lectures will be given in a room, kindly lent by the University for the purpose, on "Danish History," "The Danish Peasantry," "Danish Schools and Scholars," "The Labour Movement in Denmark," &c., while visits will be paid to a People's High School, a home for old-age pensioners, a co-operative dairy, an agricultural college, &c. Reception committees to welcome the international visitors have been formed at both centres.

As these International visits are intended to be accessible to as many as possible who are interested in national or social movements, no trouble is spared in ascertaining how all expenses not essential to the purpose of the visit may be avoided in carrying out the programme. The inclusive cost of the Dutch visit need not exceed six guineas and the Danish eight guineas. Particulars of both may be had from the hon. secretary, Miss F. M. Butlin, The International Visits Association, Old Headington, Oxford.—Yours, &c.,

F. M. BUTLIN.

June 19, 1912.

SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

THE TEACHERS' SESSION.

SIR,—The Sunday School Teachers' Session will open next Friday at Manchester College, Oxford. There is room for more students. The programme of proceedings arranged is a very useful and attractive one, and teachers who can get away for a few days cannot do better than spend them at Oxford. Applications should be sent at once to me at Essex Hall.—Yours, &c.,

ION PRITCHARD, Hon. Sec.

June 21, 1912.

THE SHOOTING OF RARE BIRDS.

SIR,—I have read with interest the letter, signed N. D. Deuchar, on the above "vandalism" as he rightly styles such wanton destruction of rare feathered visitors. Few people have heard the cry of the bittern, whose wonderful note he describes, and few will ever have that pleasure, unless legislation speedily affords such birds protection. If the Picture Palace companies would take up the subject of bird life in a right spirit, teaching the interest of observation instead of senseless slaughter, the public taste might be lifted to more humane methods than at present obtain.—Yours, &c.,

E. L. DAUBENY,

Hon. Sec. Cheltenham Branch R.S.P.C.A.

June 20, 1912.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

SOME CRITICISM OF BERGSON.

Modern Science and the Illusions of Professor Bergson. By Hugh S. R. Elliot. With an Introduction by Professor Ray Lankester. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 5s. net.

It is surely time that Bergson's reputed contributions to philosophy were removed from the beclouded atmosphere of popular discussion and popular propaganda, and some more careful, effective, and expert consideration given to the question whether there really is anything philosophically valuable in Bergson's work, and, if so, what it is. As Professor Dawes Hicks pointed out at Birmingham, in one of the few really philosophical comments on Bergson which it has been our fortune to hear or read, there is a sort of popularity which is fatal to a philosopher; Bergson seems to be suffering from this at the moment to such an extent that those who care for the serious study of philosophy might be excused a little impatient annoyance. There are a few things in Bergson's philosophy which popular discussion and exposition of him carefully avoid, but which, nevertheless, are of primary importance, and moreover constitute the philosophical suggestions of permanent value, if there are any which Bergson has made. Amongst these few things may be mentioned in particular the new theory of the nature of time, which is basic in Bergson's thought, and the theory of perception, which also plays a prominent part in the whole scheme. It is all very well to talk glibly of "the life force," the power and value of "intuition" and "instinct," and so forth; much of all this we have heard often enough before, and much of it may be of enormous interest and importance. Much of it may be peculiarly representative of the spirit of the age, and consequently lend itself to effective popular appeal and exposition. A preacher might get many excellent sermons out of "L'Évolution Créatrice"; but this sort of comment and exegesis does not help to a genuine philosophical understanding of Bergson. That can come only when the basic hypotheses of Bergson, especially his notions of time and of perception, are candidly and carefully threshed out, the one by expert metaphysicians, the other by expert psychologists.

At present we await, and, indeed, we seem almost to be awaiting in vain, the judgment of those competent to give an opinion on these matters. For ourselves we can only say that we are still earnestly struggling to understand Bergson's view of time and of perception. As to the former, if one could but fix its strict and adequate meaning, and if that meaning could be in any way substantiated, then it would constitute a philosophical discovery indeed, one calculated to revolutionise a not inconsiderable number of our ideas. As to the latter, the view of perception, at present we do not understand it at all; the form in which it is presented is elusive; the effort demanded of turning one's self inside out in order to get the point of view at all, even vaguely, is rather prodigious, and if long continued, produces decided symptoms of vertigo. Nevertheless, we do urge that these are the things in Bergson that need discussion, and we deprecate so much distracting popularisation, which will not permit us to see the wood because of the trees. For the same reason, we are inclined to welcome almost anything that we come across in the way of criticism of Bergson, even perhaps when we do not personally find the criticism particularly helpful. The book, for example, in our hands now, "Modern Science and the Illusions of Professor Bergson," is, at least, some sort of criticism; it does not accept the gospel according to Bergson as finally and utterly true. Moreover, the author does, in his criticism, happen to light upon the points in Bergsonian philosophy which need criticism; he does, that is, pour a little of his materialistic and scientific scorn on the theories of time, perception, and intuition. We are not ourselves prepared to say that the criticism offered is permanently valuable; we do not think it is. The author is, perhaps, too ready to reduce all Bergson's work to the state of "mere words." There is probably more in Bergson than that; it is just the "more" we want to get at. However, permanently valuable or not, the book before us is a book of criticism; it is at least an attempt to treat Bergson seriously from a certain scientific point of view; and inasmuch as it is relatively well written and interesting, we are glad to welcome it.

Apart from the more detailed scientific criticism, there is some general criticism which is worth nothing at the moment. Three general faults are laid to Bergson's charge. Firstly, he is accused of "the Mannikin fallacy"—a pretty name, unknown before. Bergson's general method, it is said, is to examine and reject current theories on a particular topic, and then arbitrarily assume that, because the other theories are false, his own is true; the facts he adduces are not to support his own theories, but to destroy those of another. Admirers of Bergson, please defend! We see decided justification for the criticism. So, also, with the second charge. Bergson is accused of a perpetual use of false analogy; as an example, there is given the choice instance of the analogy suggested in "Matter and Memory," between mind and body, on the one hand, and, on the other, a coat and the nail on which it hangs. It must be admitted that many of Bergson's analogies are of this order, highly picturesque, touched with a suggestive imagination, but, when rigorously looked into, rather helpless. But especially do we sympathise with the third general criticism of Bergson. He is charged with "misuse of language." Well, we would rather not put the matter in that way. What is actually the case, however, is this, : Bergson, as we all now know quite well, writes in a charming, fluent, enticing, and easily persuasive style; we read on through pages of delightful imagery, vivid and striking suggestion, plausible analogies, and we seem to know what it is all about; then, perhaps, if we are so foolish, we stop and try to put the thing in our own words—and the result is, well, no, not even chaos! We have a few vague terms, a sense, perhaps, as William James used to say, of having "something by the tail," and nothing more.

This is the great danger in Bergson, and one of the causes also of his popularity. His very command over language, his use of words (call it "misuse," if you like), lures you insensibly to the belief that you really have got hold of something you thoroughly understand, something, in fact, which "you have always said yourself"; and then, in a cool hour of reflection, you try to work it all over again for yourself and you find clouds and darkness. And the end of the matter is this, that we should exercise a little more care in dealing with Bergson, and not be too ready to suppose that his is the last word in philosophy, and that we need no other book besides "Creative Evolution" to guide us into the inner meaning of things as they are. Criticism of Bergson, then, is welcome, and worth while, if it is sincere; and we believe that Mr. Elliot's criticism is at least sincere. His book would have been decidedly better without Professor Lankester's "introduction."

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE GIFT OF "LITTLE PRINCESS."

THE village fairies were in trouble. The boys and girls were so disappointing. There were only twenty children in the village, when you had counted all, but they never could agree for two days together. Sometimes they even fought each other. Of course, the fairies would have liked to play with them, but how could they when such ugly words were flying about? It was dangerous. And now the Queen had said that she must find other fairies to take their places, because it was evident they could not manage their village properly. Altogether the poor fairies were so sad that there was quite a shower through their tears of grief and disappointment.

"Ugh—I am beginning to hate children," said one viciously.

"Oh, don't say that," said another, who had been quite silent until now. "Don't say that, 'Little Princess' is coming."

The fairies all looked up and smiled, and a beautiful rainbow arch spread over the sky.

"Then it will be all right," said the first speaker, with a deep content in her voice.

And, indeed, it was. She came to stay with her grandmother, and she was small and fair with her hair in two pigtails. But her ways were so quaint and queenly, they had nicknamed her "Little Princess." No one wanted to quarrel when she was there, and no one knew why. But the fairies knew, and they were happy because she had come.

It was not that she sat still and sewed, and was very good and prim, and never had a dirty face or fingers sticky with jam. Oh, no—"Little Princess" loved jam, and she knew all the new games. No one seemed to have time to be disagreeable, and you cannot sulk for long if someone loves and comforts you all the time. You get ashamed.

Day after day the children played together, and happiness seemed quite at home in the village. One day, the grown-up people were talking together, and they said: "How good the children are, but then 'Little Princess' is so charming." And the air was scented with roses, as the fairies laughed softly for joy.

"But if only we had her charm gift," said one "we could make the children good."

"Ah, yes," answered another a little sadly, "but we cannot, and she is greater than us."

But soon after came a great message from Sorrow to the village. "Little Princess" fell ill, and everyone thought of nothing but to give her pleasure and to try to make her well again. The children did not quarrel or fight. But, although she was so ill she was still so gay and loving that no one could be very unhappy.

Then a night came when they sent for her dear mother, and the fairies learnt that their beloved little one with the charm gift would never run in their village again. And still "Little Princess" was so sweet that even her mother was helped to bear the great pain in her heart.

And the fairies whispered one to another, "To whom will she leave her magic charm?"

"Let us send and ask the Queen," said another.

So they did, and the answer came in the night, when the moon shone lovingly down on the fields, and on "Little Princess," who was asleep now. "She has divided it among the children," said the Queen's messenger.

N. L.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

BOYS' OWN BRIGADE.

ANNUAL COUNCIL MEETING.

A SMALL but enthusiastic gathering of officers, office-bearers and friends met for the Annual Council Meeting of the Boys' Own Brigade, which was held on Monday, June 17, at Essex Hall, with the President (Mr. Ronald P. Jones, M.A.) in the chair.

The annual report spoke of the striking increase at the present day in the number of societies formed for work among boys, deprecating the tendency, however, to lay undue stress upon mere drill and exercise, and called upon all members and friends of the B.O.B. to make this association stand for the very highest type of such work, free from all theological bias, free from the spirit of militarism, dedicated solely to the advancement of pure and upright living among boys, the life consecrated to the service of God.

Statistics showed the following status of the Brigade:—9 companies (and one in process of formation), 30 officers, 54 non-commissioned officers, 168 privates; in all 249, compared with 234 in 1910-11. In the summer, 1911, 154 members had gone to camp (91 in 1910); and other activities occupying the several companies were as follows:—Sunday classes, church parades, ambulance classes, life-saving, swimming and carpentry classes, bugle bands, social clubs, gymnastic parades, outings, route marches, concerts, displays and inspections.

The report further expressed regret that a larger number of the boys' clubs, &c., connected with the Liberal Churches did not see their way to joining the B.O.B. Sometimes the cause was lack of workers; sometimes, however, it lay in fears of militarism or of an overbearing executive laying down laws with an iron hand. Such fears were quite groundless; for though there must of necessity be some rules, discipline and conformity where there was association, in the Boys' Own Brigade these were neither military nor such as to prevent freedom of individual action.

The London Battalion had reported its summer camp, held at Deal from July 29 to August 8, 1911, and expresses the thanks of the whole Battalion to Mr. R. P. Jones for his renewed generosity in defraying much of the cost of the holiday. Two United Religious Services had been held during the session; at the Battalion Council Meeting in November, Mr. C. E. B. Russell, of Manchester, had delivered an address on "Juvenile Crime"; and at the Annual Gymnastic Competition for the Marian Pritchard Memorial Shield the 4th Company (Essex Church) had gained the honour of victory. The Battalion was now looking forward to its summer camp at Deal again, to be held from July 27 to August 5.

The Liverpool Battalion reported that the companies at Mill-street and Hamilton-road had had a most successful session in every respect. A summer camp had been held at Great Hucklow Home, from July 8 to 15, under command of Captain the Rev. J. L. Haigh, and 51 boys with five officers had spent a delightful holiday. The Battalion, however, had altered its plans for 1912, and were eagerly looking forward to their camp at Ramsay, Isle of Man, to be held in July. To this camp would be invited the boys at Bessborough-road Church, Birkenhead, who were working under Mr. P. W. Hawkes, formerly Captain of the 8th Company, and who hoped soon to be formally enrolled as a new company of the B.O.B. The Company at Monton had reported a successful session, and they also had held a summer "camp" at the Great Hucklow Home in July, 1911.

In addition to its usual routine work the Executive had published in January, 1912, a gift book called "Honour Bright!" for presentation to all the boys of the Brigade, and their thanks were due to the Rev. F. K. Freeston, chaplain of the 4th Company, for writing the subject matter, for supplying the illustrations, and for his generosity in defraying all the cost of publication.

The Treasurer's statement showed that matters in this direction were in a healthy condition, though this was largely due to a special appeal having been issued in 1911.

After the usual election of office bearers, &c., and some general discussion upon the work of the organisation, a lecture was given by Mr. J. Howard Whitehouse, M.P., secretary of the "National League for Workers among Boys," &c., on the present position and future prospects of education in England. Mr. Whitehouse assumed at the outset that the English educational system of to-day was in pressing need of reform; the great difficulty in the way, however, was an easy-going public opinion on the subject. The Ministry of Education was comparatively poorly paid, and was looked upon too often as a mere stepping-stone to some higher seat in the Cabinet; in parliamentary discussions the real issues were lost sight of in a cloud of theological controversy; and even in regard to so simple a reform as the raising of the minimum age at which a child might leave school, there was a strong and ardent (to him most misguided) opposition.

He dwelt at length upon the terms "Elementary" and "Secondary"—on what they mean and ought to mean. At present "Elementary" refers to the education given to the children of the poorer classes, and "Secondary" to that given to the children of the well-to-do who have passed beyond mere childhood; and it had even been suggested that a new system should be introduced, to be known as "Higher Elementary," making still more marked the class distinction, for this was to be schooling for the children of the poorer classes who chose to remain at school after the age of 13 or 14. Contrasting all this with what obtained in schools of the United States, for example, he claimed that what was wanted at home was a more scientific articulation and adjustment of our national educational system, so that the "Elementary" would be the education offered to children up to a certain age, and "Secondary" should refer to that which was suited to more advanced pupils, the same opportunities and privileges being open to all without class distinction, and the secondary education being always appropriate to the tendencies and special aptitudes of the young people concerned.

The Rev. F. K. Freeston moved and Mr. W. H. Ballantyne seconded a hearty vote of thanks to the speaker, and this was carried with unanimous applause. Various members of the Council joined in the discussion.

YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

MEETINGS IN LEEDS.

THE annual meetings of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union were held on Saturday, June 15, in the Priestley Hall, Leeds, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot presiding. The afternoon's proceedings commenced with a service in Mill Hill Chapel, at which the Rev. C. Hargrove was the preacher, and at a subsequent business meeting an encouraging report was given of the progress of Unitarianism in Yorkshire.

In his report the Secretary (the Rev. W. R. Shanks) stated that a new association had been formed with Sheffield as its centre. This move seriously affected the Yorkshire Union numerically at the present time, but it was felt that it would be of ultimate benefit. The following districts now came within the scope of the Sheffield Association:—Bradley, Bolton-on-Dearne, Barnsley, Mexborough, Sheffield (three chapels), Stannington, and Great Hucklow. The Leeds and District Association included Bradford (two chapels), Dewsbury, Elland, Halifax, Huddersfield, Hull, Idle, Leeds (three chapels), Lydgate, Malton, Pepperhill, Pudsey, Scarborough, Selby, Wakefield and York. The change in the constitution necessarily affected the financial arrangements, and it had therefore been decided to hold a bazaar before November, 1913, as a means of replenishing the funds. The Treasurer (Mr. Julius Hess, Leeds) recorded a balance in hand of over £96. The report and balance sheet were adopted. The officers were elected as follows: Mr. G. E. Verity (president); Messrs. G. Talbot, J. T. Kitchen, S. Harris, J. Sagar, and A. Whitworth (vice-presidents); the Rev. W. R. Shanks (secretary); and Mr. Julius Hess (treasurer); Mr. Grosvenor Talbot retired after thirteen years' occupancy of the chair.

At the evening meeting Mr. Talbot was supported by Mr. C. Hawksley (London), president of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; the Rev. C. Hargrove, Mr. and Mrs. F. J. Kitson, the Rev. W. L. Shroeder (Halifax) the Rev. A. Cunliffe Fox (Manchester), the Rev. A. H. Dolphin (Sheffield), the Rev. T. Anderson (Mexborough), Mr. G. E. Verity, and the Rev. W. R. Shanks.

The Chairman after remarking that that was the thirteenth time he had presided over those meetings, said that changes were occurring in their Association. The forming of the new district at Sheffield would bring more power and intelligence into their work. Their members from that district were not able to attend their meetings, and much better work would be done at Sheffield than if the centre remained at Leeds. That society was a necessity, because it took to the country districts the blessings of free thought and a free church. What they had to teach was the great doctrine of love of God and love to man. The preaching they should get from their chapels was to live the best life on earth and to endeavour to raise the character of every man and woman under their influence. Referring to the resignation of the Rev. C. Hargrove, the Chairman said it would be a great loss to them, but although Mr. Hargrove would not attend every meeting he would do all he could to aid the Society.

The Rev. W. L. Shroeder gave an address on "Our Ideals as Unitarians." He said that it had been stated that the churches were afraid to tackle the social problems of the day, so that the people had sought solutions in a more practical fashion by forming political associations. As a set-off they had churches entering into competition with secular agencies. The institutional church tried to follow with religion on Sunday, recreation on the week days, and social life in between. If they said that they could not carry on their work without those agencies it was a confession that religion has lost its power. He protested against the idea of a church which was made a mere social club. There ought to be an intense cultivation of the religious life. They had given the other side a chance, and it had practically failed. They were being driven by the social development to their own particular work, and that lay in the cultivation of the spiritual sense, and the great opportunity given to it in worship.

The Rev. C. Hargrove welcomed the representatives of the other societies who were present, and the Leeds branch of the Unitarian Women's League. Mr. Hawksley responded, and Mrs. F. J. Kitson, in her reply, read a letter on the aims and progress of the League.

The Rev. A. C. Fox, the Rev. T. Anderson and Mr. F. J. Kitson also addressed the meeting.

THE EASTERN UNION OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

THE annual meetings of the Eastern Union were held at the Free Christian Chapel, Churchgate-street, Bury St. Edmund's, on Thursday, June 13, Mr. J. Williment, F.S.A.A. (Ipswich), the President, was unable to attend. Those present included:—The Revs. E. W. Lummis, (Cambridge), Mortimer Rowe (Norwich), G. H. Patterson (Great Yarmouth), H. C. Hawkins (Framlingham), William Birks, F.R.G.S. (Diss), George Ward (Bury St. Edmund's), A. E. Rump (Hapton), Messrs. A. H. Hamblin and R. Scopes (Ipswich), A. M. Stevens (Norwich), and others. The secretary (the Rev. A. Golland) was also unable to attend. The Rev. G. Ward carried out the secretarial duties in connection with the annual assembly. A meeting of the Executive Committee was held in the schoolroom at noon. Luncheon was subsequently served in the club-room, when the Rev. E. W. Lummis presided, the Mayor of Bury St. Edmund's (Major V. Davoren) being also present. After lunch

The Chairman proposed "The Town." It was an extremely interesting and historical town, and it was a pleasure to come to Bury St. Edmund's, especially on that occasion, and to couple with his remarks the name of the Mayor of Bury (Major Vesey Davoren). The Mayor, who was received with applause, said he felt that they should propose the King. As he was the representative of the King he would now give it. During his year of office he was not allowed to take part in political questions. As to his religion, it might differ slightly from theirs, but they were all Christians, and were trying to lead others forward to the same light.

The Chairman then extended a welcome to the Rev. G. Vipond Byles (Wesleyan Minister at Bury St. Edmund's) and the Rev. A. J. Brown (Congregational minister).

The annual business meeting was held in the Chapel after lunch, the Rev. Mortimer Rowe, presiding. The report and balance-sheet were considered satisfactory, and adopted.

A brief address was given by Miss Lucy M. Tagart (representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association). After the business meeting a service was conducted in the chapel by the Rev. George Ward, the sermon being delivered by the Rev. Gertrud Von Petzold, M.A. (the minister of Waverley-road Church, Small Heath, Birmingham). A collection was taken on behalf of the funds of the Union. Tea was subsequently served in the club and schoolrooms, when a large number sat down. This was followed by an organ recital by Mr. Stanton Gildersleeve (organist at Thurston). A musical soiree took place in the chapel in the evening, the Rev. George Ward presiding. The Rev. Gertrud Von Petzold gave an address dealing with her experiences in Germany, Switzerland, and the United States. An address on Sunday-school work was given by the Rev. H. C. Hawkins (Framlingham), secretary to the Eastern Sunday School Union. Mrs. Tempest presided at the piano. During the day Mr. W. A. Pawsey conducted the delegates on a tour of inspection of the principal places of interest in the town.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

THE Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire will meet at Southport on Wednesday, June 26. The religious service will be held in the Unitarian Church, Portland-street, at 11.30, the devotional part being conducted by the Rev. B. C. Constable and the sermon being preached by the Rev. A. W. Fox. Lunch will be provided at the Cambridge Hall, Lord-street, at 12.45, and the Business Meeting will be held in the Temperance Institute, London-street, at 2 p.m., when the President, the Rev. R. T. Herford, will take the chair. At 6 p.m. a meeting will be held in the Temperance Institute, Mr. Arthur S. Thew, in the chair, when addresses will be delivered by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, of Gee Cross, on "Public Worship"; Mr. Alfred Pilling, of Bolton, on "The Implications of Church Membership"; and the Rev. C. M. Wright, of Sale, on "Faith." The Mayor of Southport (Mr. Councillor F. T. Reynolds) has kindly consented to be present, and will welcome the Assembly to Southport.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Ballyhemlin.—The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson preached a special sermon on Sunday afternoon, June 16, at the N.S. Presbyterian Meeting House. There was a large attendance, Grey Abbey sending over a good contingent. Mr. Dowson made an appeal emphasising the necessity of public worship, and urged that it should be prepared for and encouraged in every way. The collection amounted to over £13.

Billingshurst: Mrs. Caroline Evershed.—By the death of Mrs. Caroline Evershed, at the age of 83, which took place at the Malt-house Villa, Billingshurst, on June 10, the chapel at Billingshurst has lost its oldest and most faithful supporter. From her earliest years she attended this venerable meeting-house, and her interest in it never flagged. In her youthful days, when the Sunday school was the only means of education in the village, she was a most energetic and helpful teacher, and her zeal and love for the cause have formed a very happy feature of her life. Nothing but the increasing weakness of old age ever prevented her from attending the services, which she looked upon as a great privilege. Lately the erection of a new organ, which she was destined never to hear, has been a source of pleasure to her. Her acts of kindness endeared Mrs. Evershed to many, and she will be missed and mourned by a large circle of friends. She was married in 1861 to the late Mr. William Evershed, of Tedfold, Billingshurst, by whose side she was laid to rest in the chapel-yard on Wednesday, June 19, the service being conducted by the minister, the Rev. D. Davis.

Bolton: Walmsley.—The anniversary sermons were preached on Sunday, June 9, by the Rev. A. W. Fox, M.A., of Todmorden, to crowded congregations, afternoon and evening. The address in the morning to teachers and scholars was given by Mr. Edward Davies, of Bolton. The choir, under the leadership of Mr. H. L. Haslam, sang the anthems "Teach me, O Lord," and "Oh, Worship the King," admirably, in the afternoon and evening respectively. A very pleasing feature of the services was the rendering of a special hymn at each service by the children. The collections amounted to £46 15s. The organ has lately been rebuilt by Messrs. Young, of Manchester, and the formal opening will take place towards the end of July.

Carlisle.—The trustees and congregation at Carlisle decided at a meeting held on June 17 to try and secure the services of a resident missionary minister, as an experiment, for one year, in the hope that the Unitarian Church may be reinvigorated. The proceeds of the sale of the buildings will be invested by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the income applied in providing a modest salary for the minister, and a small sum towards the expenses of hiring a suitable room for the services. It is hoped to make a beginning in the early autumn. The great difficulty will be to discover a capable missionary prepared to make the experiment. The Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association will be pleased to supply information to any minister who feels the call to engage in such an enterprise.

Cullompton.—Amongst the generous subscriptions received towards the erection of the new chapel and school at Cullompton is one from the Consistory of the French Church at Maastricht, in Holland, where the Rev. Dr. Landell is minister. Donations continue to be paid in, or promised; but a considerable amount must yet be raised before the architect's plan for the building can, without debt, be carried into effect.

Leeds: Mill Hill Chapel.—At the annual meeting of the congregation, held on the 17th inst., Mr. Grosvenor Talbot proposed a resolution, that the congregation, desiring to recognise the long and honourable service given by Mr. Hargrove to them, offered him the title of Minister Emeritus, to take effect at the close of his pastorate. The speaker said that the honour to the congregation would be greater than that to Mr. Hargrove, and that the latter deserved the honour, not only for what he had done for the chapel, but for his services to Unitarianism at large. The resolution was seconded by Mr. F. J. Kitson, and carried with acclamation. The honour is, we believe, unique in the history of the chapel.

London: Kentish Town.—On Friday, June 28, Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., will lecture in the schoolroom of the Free Christian Church, Clarence-road at 8.15 p.m., on "The Insurance Act." The lecture is free to members and friends of the church, and questions will be invited at the close.

London Sunday School Society.—One of the largest gatherings of recent years was present at Essex Hall on Sunday afternoon, June 16, when the annual aggregate service for elder scholars and teachers was held. Fully 400 young people, from about 15 of the London schools, listened with marked attention to Miss Amy Withall's address on the subject of "Earnestness of Purpose." Miss Withall chose for her text the words "Doing the will of God from the heart." Her apt illustrations and the sincerity with which she dealt with the problems of life facing a young man or young woman on entering into business life easily held the attention of her audience. The hymns were well chosen and heartily sung, and a couple of anthems were rendered by the choir of the Limehouse school. Mr. W. J. Noel very kindly presided at the organ.

Manchester: Chorlton-cum-Hardy.—On Saturday last, June 15, a garden sale of work was held, by kind permission of Mr. and Mrs. Hiller, at Oakholme, Wilbraham-road. The sale was opened by Mrs. John Harwood, of Bolton, who expressed sincere good wishes for the success of the sale, and her hope that the Circuit Churches would eventually work themselves out of their present difficulties into a satisfactory position. The attendance was unusually good, and the satisfactory sum of about £62 was realised as the net result of the sale. During the afternoon a play, "Gentlemen of the Road," was performed admirably by Miss Megson and other friends.

Mottram.—The first picnic in connection with the newly formed North Cheshire and District Union of Unitarian Men's Sunday School Classes took place at Mottram on Saturday last, when over 200 persons attended. Tea was partaken of at the Mottram Sunday school, and at a short meeting held afterwards, presided over by the Rev. H. Fisher Short, of Mossley, the first President of the Association, an address was delivered by Mr. H. J. Broadbent, president of the Manchester District Sunday School Association. Short addresses were also delivered by the chairman, Mr. W. Marcroft of Oldham (vice-president), Mr. Radcliffe Firth of Mossley, president of the North Cheshire Sunday School Union, and the Rev. C. W. Butler (Mottram). Thanks were tendered to the Mottram friends for the provision of tea, and for the use of the school premises. After a short ramble most of the party returned to the school, where a pleasant evening was spent. The first quarterly syllabus of the Union has just been issued, containing the programme of work for the next three months at the twelve classes which have joined the Union. The programme is creditable alike to all concerned, and the choice of subjects is very comprehensive. The Union commences under the most auspicious circumstances, and its work ought to prove of great benefit to the churches and Sunday schools. The membership embraces Ashton-under-Lyne, Boston Mills, Denton, Dukinfield, Failsworth, Flowery Field, Gee Cross, Mossley, Mottram, Oldham, Stalybridge, and Stockport. It is provided in the constitution of the Union that the President of the Manchester District Sunday School Association and the North Cheshire District Sunday School Union are ex-officio vice-presidents. Each class is entitled to an address from a member of one of the other schools once a month, and this stipulation has been taken advantage of in each instance. At the annual meeting it is intended that reports shall be tendered from each class showing how the work is progressing.

Newport, Mon.—The midsummer rally of members of the Unitarian Free Christian Church took place on Sunday, June 16, when the hall in Charles-street, was well filled. At the evening service after an address by the minister, the Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, B.A., on the function of the Church, brief speeches were made by Miss Powell in answer to the question "Why I left Orthodoxy?"; and by Mr. Sutherland, "Why we founded this Church?" The Minister then received into fellowship nine new adult members. The desire has been expressed to have the Lord's Supper introduced. Is there a congregation not using its Communion Plate which will kindly lend it to the friends at Newport until they can afford to procure some for themselves?

Preston.—On Thursday evening, June 14, the first of a series of special services was held in the Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, Preston, in connection with extensive additions and improvements to the chapel. The old apse, which was built in 1882, has been pulled down, and a larger one has been built according to the designs of the architect, Mr. E. J. Andrew. In the centre of the apse a fine organ has been placed, and semi-circular choir stalls to seat about 30 persons have been erected. The apse has been adorned by two beautiful stained glass windows, one, "The Good Shepherd," having been given by the children of the late Mr. James Buck, and the other, "Christ blessing little children," having been given by the nephews and nieces of the late Mr. Sam Lee, J.P. Other alterations have been made, and the result should be of great benefit to the religious life of the congregation. The service was conducted by the pastor, the Rev. Charles Travers, during whose ministry of eight years the church has made very substantial progress in every direction, including the increase of the premises by the building of a new vestry, large classrooms, an assembly hall, and the purchase of an adjoining house as a residence for the caretaker. The chapel was well filled. After prayer, Mr. Travers unveiled the two windows, concluding his address by saying that it was fitting that in a building set apart for the worship of God the memories of those who had lived a life larger than their own religious fellowship, whose convictions had shown themselves, in one way or another, for the redemption and good of humanity, should be signalled. The organ and apse were then dedicated. In dedicating the apse Mr. Travers concluded a short and interesting historical account of the rise of that, the first Protestant dissenting place of worship in Preston, by saying: "We have received this building as an inheritance from faithful men and women. It is not ours; it belongs to something more enduring than earthly men—to principles and ideals in which we are supposed to believe, for which we are called upon to labour, to which the dead call on us to be true. The building is a mere means whereby high religious aspirations are kept alive, giving to those of kindred sympathies an opportunity of meeting together for worship, whereby the mental, moral, and spiritual life is nourished. We cherish what our fathers gave us; we thank them for the liberty they won for us at the sacrifice of money, comfort, and ease. We hold it to pass it on to our children's children unstained by our faithlessness and sanctified by our zeal." A musical programme, arranged by Mr. W. Haslam, J.P. (who trained the augmented choir), and Mr. H. Weedall, the choirmaster, was ably rendered. The services were continued on Saturday, when an organ recital was given by Mr. Walter Wild, of Bury, succeeded by a tea at 5 o'clock, at which from 150 to 180 persons were present. At 6 o'clock a service was conducted by the Rev. Fred Hall, of Blackburn, the preacher being the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. Members of various North Lancashire and Westmorland congregations were present, over twenty coming from Blackburn, and the chapel was well filled. On Sunday morning the service was conducted by the Rev. H. McLachlan, of Manchester, there being a very good attendance. In the afternoon a scholars' service was held, taken by the superintendent, Mr. T. J. Miller, an address being given by Mrs. Halstead, of Ansdell. The evening service was conducted by the Rev. Charles Travers, the sermon being preached by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, to a crowded congregation. This brought the series of services to a successful termination. The presence of the Rev. W. C. Bowie at each of the four services on Saturday and Sunday was very much appreciated.

Swinton: The late Mr. and Mrs. John Evans.—The congregation at the Unitarian Chapel, Swinton, have lately suffered loss by the death of two of the oldest members of the chapel. Mrs. Evans passed away on June 3, after a long illness, in her 78th year. She had been connected with the chapel from early childhood, and had watched its growth with great interest. The old School was very dear to her. When the chapel was erected in 1857-8 she was the first to be married in it just a year after it was opened, and many will cherish her memory for her real devotion and faithfulness to the cause in Swinton. Husband and wife were not separated long, for Mr. John Evans passed away on the day following the death of Mrs. Evans, June 4, in his 83rd year. Mr. Evans rendered useful service to the chapel in many ways. For years he was one of the chapel stewards and a member of the Committee. He was one of those silent workers who do their best in quiet ways, not seeking for praise. Advancing years told upon him, but his interest never abated until the end came suddenly closing a long and useful life. They were buried together, the service being conducted by a former minister, the Rev. John Moore. The first resident minister, the Rev. William Harrison, was also present, but owing to ill health could not take part in the service. The services the following Sunday were also conducted by the Rev. John Moore, who made special reference to the loss sustained by the congregation.

The Unitarian Van Mission.—The seventh season of the Van Mission has been most successfully inaugurated. Four vans are again at work in districts which, with one exception, are familiar. In the Potteries and the Midlands it is possible to forecast large meetings. Wales is sure to do well. London in most centres will prove satisfactory. The new route is through parts of Yorkshire that are thinly populated, except for a few large towns, and great meetings will not be possible as a rule. The London mission opened at Ilford, and the friends there threw themselves into the work with commendable and characteristic energy, and found, we believe, that the chapel benefited through the joint effort. At Woolwich great meetings were held, both at night and at midday. Organised opposition was encountered, but the van drew the audience away from its opponents who had to suspend their meeting for two hours until the missionaries had had their say. But ill-fortune befel the mission shortly afterwards, for as it came to Erith the place was engrossed in the dockyard troubles, and the people practically could not be induced to give their attention to any matter of less apparent importance. Unfortunately too, the influence of the strike is likely to be felt for some time longer and in other places that are on the van programme. The friends at Southend are looking forward to the arrival of the van there on July 1, their protest against the omission of that town having been successful. The Rev. F. Summers and T. F. M. Brockway have conducted many of the meetings, and assistance has also been rendered by the Revs. A. H. Biggs, W. G. Tarrant, J. A. Pearson, and W. W. C. Pope. The chair has been occupied by members of the congregations at Ilford and Woolwich (Messrs. Fyson, Kinsman, Coate and Field), and in both places the friends most loyally supported the Mission. The Potteries district (giving the term a pretty wide scope) has always yielded a harvest for the Mission, and this season the visitors have been delighted with their reception at Crewe, at Stoke and at Hanley. The Revs. Dr. Griffiths, W. McMullan, and H. D. Roberts were the missionaries at the respective places, and all of them were pleased with their experience. The Rev. G. Pegler, who has just settled at Crewe, the Rev. W. A. Weatherall, and the Rev. H. Hawkes have also taken part. The van that is now in Wales spent a week in Stockton-on-Tees before leaving the district where it has worked during the last two seasons. The Rev. E. T. Russell conducted great meetings, and with him in the chair on several occasions was the Rev. W. H. Lambelle. On the transference to South Wales, meetings were held at Pontypridd, with the Rev. Simon Jones as missionary, and the Rev. J. Park Davies, and Mr. John Lewis, chairmen. In Yorkshire the season opened with small meetings in the Holbeck, Hunslet, and Woodhouse Moor districts of Leeds. The Revs. Dr. Thackray, W. R. Shanks, T. Anderson, and H. R. Tavenor conducted the meetings in the first fortnight and the Rev. A. Scruton in the last week, when a more favourable site was available. Many of the meetings have suffered from the inclement weather of the last fortnight, and no less than ten have been abandoned. The remaining 69 meetings have had attendances numbering 21,565 and giving the high average of 312. That this would have been even more satisfactory will be judged when the analysis is seen to yield only 116 per meeting for Yorkshire. DETAILS.—No. 1 Van, Stockton and Pontypridd, 13 meetings, attendance 5,200, average 400. No. 2 Van, Crewe, Stoke and Hanley, 18 meetings, attendance 7,725, average 429. No. 3 Van, Ilford, Woolwich and Erith, 22 meetings, attendance 6,775, average 308. No. 4 Van, Holbeck, Hunslet and Woodhouse Moor, 16 meetings, attendance 1,865, average 116. All communications respecting the work and offers of assistance should be addressed to the Missionary Agent, the Rev. Thos. P. Spedding, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A NEGLECTED AUTHOR.

We have recently received an interesting pamphlet by Mr. F. H. Evans on James John Garth Wilkinson, a friend of Henry James, senior (price 1s.), reprinted from the Homœopathic World. Those who may have forgotten all about this remarkable writer (if indeed they ever heard his name) are reminded that he was the author of some twenty-five books, many of which deserve to be studied anew in the light of recent philosophical discoveries, if we may judge from some passages which are quoted. To him we owe, apart from his own works, the first type-printed edition of Blake's "Songs of Innocence and Experience," which he had published at his own cost in 1839 when but twenty-seven years of age, prefacing it with an essay on Blake's art and poetry. This preface, at once noble in thought and dignified in expression, was unsigned; so, too, was the "Introduction" to Swedenborg's "Economy of the Animal Kingdom," written for the new and revised edition of Clissold's translation, which he edited seven years later. Perhaps we may attribute to his modesty no less than to the fact that he was much influenced by Swedenborg's message, which was also studied by Blake "with altering estimations at different periods of his life," some of the neglect which has overtaken him.

At the conclusion of the preface to the "Songs of Innocence," which has in many respects more significance for our own time than when it was written over seventy years ago, Garth Wilkinson says: "If this volume gives one impulse to the new spiritualism which is now dawning on the world, if it leads one reader to think that all reality for him, in the long run, lies out of the limits of space and time, and that the spirits and not bodies, and still less garments, are men; it will have done its work in its little day, and we shall be abundantly satisfied with having undertaken to perpetuate it, for a few years, by the present publication." "Garth Wilkinson calls it a re-publication," says Mr. Evans, "though he, of course, knew that the only previous publication, if it could be called so, was in the home-engraved and coloured copies prepared entirely by Blake's and his wife's hands, and sold privately to patrons; the issue under notice was therefore practically the first public edition." The pamphlet gives a sympathetic analysis of some of the mystical ideas expressed by this well-nigh forgotten author in his own peculiarly vivid and original way. They appear to be based upon a profound realisation of the value of the Golden Rule as the "mainspring of a beautiful life" in touch with the divine.

EARLY MEMORIES OF SIR FRANCIS CHANNING.

We are reminded by the Manchester Guardian that some interesting allusions to Sir Francis Channing, who has just been raised to the peerage, occur in Julian Hawthorne's "Hawthorne and his Circle," published in 1903. It was, we are told, his career at Oxford, where he was "overpowered by the subtle attractions of English culture," that corrupted the American patriotism of "Frank Channing," and turned him into an Englishman, both outwardly and inwardly.

When Nathaniel Hawthorne was American Consul at Liverpool, the Rev. William Henry Channing was pastor of a Unitarian church in that city. The two families became acquainted, and Julian Hawthorne and Frank Channing—according to the former's reminiscences—were soon inseparable companions. Young Channing was devoted to ornithology, had a strong proclivity to art, and was wonderfully clever in all kinds of fine handiwork. "All intellectual operations came easy to him." He exercised a remarkable fascination over his fellow-exile, especially when "he proved to me by a mathematical demonstration, which I accepted without in the least understanding it, that in fifty years New York would be larger and more populous than London at the end of the same period." For in those days they were both "fanatically patriotic."

PORTUGUESE SLAVERY AND BRITISH RESPONSIBILITY.

A public meeting to consider Portuguese Slavery and British Responsibility will be held by the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society in the Westminster Palace Hotel on June 25 at 4 p.m. Lord George Hamilton will preside, and the speakers include Mr. J. St. Loe Strachey, Mr. W. A. Cadbury, Mr. T. E. Harvey, M.P., and the Rev. J. H. and Mrs. Harris. The meeting is supported by Lord Courtney, Lord Weardale and Lord Peckover, Sir T. Fowell Buxton, Sir H. H. Johnston, Sir A. Pease, Messrs. Joseph Rowntree, Roderick Fry, Eugen Sandow, and many members of Parliament, including :—Sir A. Spicer, Bart., Sir J. Jardine, the Right. Hon. Thomas Burt, Right Hon. J. W. Wilson, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, and Mr. Arnold Rowntree.

SIR WILLIAM CROOKES AT THE AGE OF EIGHTY.

Sir William Crookes expressed to a representative of the Daily News and Leader the other day a fervent hope that no law would be passed limiting him to eight hours' work a day! He had just completed his eightieth year, and is still extraordinarily alert and active, his mind being busy at present with the problem—which he appears to have solved—of saving posterity from famine when the fertility of the wheat-growing lands throughout the world are exhausted. "I consider," he said, "that a good deal of my success in science is due to having lived so long. Supposing I had started when I did, and had gone on with scientific work for twenty or forty years—and then died. I should have done nothing like so much. Every ten years has given some addition to my knowledge."

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE,

Summerville, Victoria Park, Manchester.

THE ANNUAL PUBLIC EXAMINATION OF THE STUDENTS will be held on TUESDAY, JULY 2, 1912, commencing at 10.30 a.m.

The Visitor's Address will be delivered by the Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A., of Wandsworth, at 5 o'clock. Subject: "Student Ministers."

On the Evening of the same day, the Valedictory Service will be held in Cross-street Chapel at 7.30, and will be conducted by the Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A., of Dean-row and Stylal.

Music by the Choir of the Longsight Free Christian Church. Organist: Mr. O. H. HEYS.

The attendance of all friends of the College is earnestly invited.

For the Committee,

P. J. WINSER, } Hon.
G. A. PAYNE, } Secs.
Knutsford.

NEWBURY.

Sale of Work and Garden Party on the Lawn at 121, Bartholomew Street

(By the kind consent of Dr. and Mrs. Hickman), at 3 o'clock on Wednesday, June 26.

Opened by Mrs. WALTER BAILY, of London.
The MAYOR OF NEWBURY (S. Knight, Esq.) will preside.

Convenient trains from Paddington and elsewhere, G.W.Ry.

MINISTERS' PENSION & INSURANCE FUND.

In the absence of the Secretary abroad, all communications with respect to the above Fund should be addressed to the Treasurer, Mr. H. CHATFIELD CLARKE, 102, Bishopsgate, London, E.C.

STAND UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL.

104th ANNIVERSARY SERMONS

will be preached on Sunday, June 30, by Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A. (of Gee Cross). Services at 10.45 a.m. and 6.30 p.m.

Scholars' Service in the afternoon, conducted by Rev. OTTWELL BINNS (of 'Ainsworth').

Collections at each service in aid of Sunday School Funds.

Tea will be provided after afternoon service for convenience of friends from a distance.

UNIVERSITY HALL,

Gordon Square, W.C.

(Between Russell Square and Euston Square.)

Services at 11.15 and 7.

PREACHERS (both Services):

June 23.—Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A. (of Leeds).

„ 30.—Rev. RUDOLPH DAVIS, B.A. (of Gloucester).

July 7.—Rev. Dr. ESTLIN CARPENTER (Principal of Manchester College, Oxford).

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
Miss ORME. HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

The Inquirer.

Among recent articles are the following :—

The Church and the Living God. By Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, D.D. June 15.

This Generation. By Rev. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D. June 8.

Uniformity and Nonconformity. By Rev. J. E. ODGERS, M.A. June 1.

George Dawson and the Coming Church. By GERTRUD VON PETZOLD. May 18 and 25.

Any of the above issues to be obtained from THE PUBLISHER, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. Post free 1½d.

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCs.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z., INQUIRER OFFICE, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, AYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

SURREY.—Home offered Child or Invalid Lady; experienced care, bracing air, good garden. Medical and other recommendations.—M. B., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming Irish Linen Summer Costume Fabric, "Flaxzella." Washable. Wide range of fascinating designs. Beautiful shades, durable, looks smart for years.—Write, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

REMNANT BARGAIN!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen. Big pieces suitable for making Teacloths, Traycloths, D'oyleys, &c., 2s. 6d. per bundle. Postage 4d. Irish Linen Catalogue FREE.—Write, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by Christian Scientists.

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, June 22, 1912.

* Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3653.
NEW SERIES, No. 757.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 29, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.]

The International Visits Association

Founded for the Purpose of Studying the Customs and Institutions of Other Countries.

THE SEVENTH VISIT TO DENMARK.

August 13-23, 1912.

The arrangements include visits to Frederiksborg High School for the Danish People, Kørshave Agricultural School for Cottagers and Cottagers' Wives, a Co-operative Dairy, an Agricultural Museum, the Open-air Museum at Lyngby, a Home for Old Age Pensioners, a Labour Bureau, a Co-operative Bakery, the Training School for Domestic Servants, the Finsen Light Institute.

THE THIRD VISIT TO HOLLAND.

July 23-August 2, 1912.

The arrangements include visits to Rotterdam, Amsterdam, and the Hague, a Cheese Factory, an Automatic Auction, Small Market Gardens, "Polders," the Club of the Diamond Workers' Union, &c.

All particulars may be had from the Hon. Sec., Miss F. M. BUTLIN, Old Headington, Oxford.

The inclusive cost will not exceed Eight Guineas for the visit to Denmark, and Six Guineas for the visit to Holland.

WHITE STAR TOURING CLUB.

(President, Mr. William Carter, Parkstone.)

July 5. Montreux, 16 days, £8.

Hon. Conductor, Councillor ROYSTON.

August 2. Lugano, 16 days, £9 9s.

Hon. Conductor, Mr. W. CARTER.

August 2. Montreux, 16 days, £8.

Hon. Conductor, Rev. T. P. SPEDDING.

August 30. Lugano, 16 days, £9 9s.

Hon. Conductor, Councillor ROYSTON.

August 30. Interlaken, 16 days, £8 12s. 6d.

Hon. Conductor, Rev. R. B. MORRISON.

NO EXTRAS.

The above prices include full programme of Excursions.

Particulars from the White Star Touring Club, 27, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

SWISS-TYROL-ITALIAN borders.—Mr. LUMMIS' party will leave on August 1 (fortnight, 14 guineas; month, 19 guineas, cheap tickets to the Grisons also arranged).—15, Green-street, Cambridge.

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.

BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 135, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

NEW BOOKS NOW READY

Crown 8vo, 140 pp., with Portrait.
1s. 6d. net, postage 3d.

COMMUNINGS WITH THE FATHER.

Collects and Prayers.

By JAMES C. STREET.

Introduction by CHRISTOPHER J. STREET, M.A.

Fcap. 8vo, 130 pp., with Portrait. 1s. net, postage 2d.

MAN'S CHIEF END,

and other Sermons.

By R. B. DRUMMOND, B.A., T.C.D.

Fcap. 8vo, 128 pp. 1s. net, postage 2d.

HOW A MODERN ATHEIST FOUND GOD.

By G. A. FERGUSON.

Crown 8vo, 272 pp. 2s. 6d. net. Postage 3d.

THE CHURCH OF TO-MORROW.

By JOSEPH H. CROOKER, D.D.

Crown 8vo, 164 pp. Photogravure Portrait. 2s. 6d. net. Postage 4d.

THOUGHTS FOR DAILY LIVING.

From the Spoken and Written Words of

ROBERT COLLYER, Litt.D.

The Lindsey Press, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

The Inquirer.

Among recent articles are the following:—

The Church and the Living God. By Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, D.D. June 15.

This Generation. By Rev. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D. June 8.

Uniformity and Nonconformity. By Rev. J. E. ODGERS, M.A. June 1.

Love among the Ruins. By Professor G. DAWES HICKS. June 22.

A Plea for Miracle. By Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS. June 22.

Church Life in Scotland. By Rev. R. NICOL CROSS. June 22.

Any of the above issues to be obtained from THE PUBLISHER, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. Post free 1½d.

FRIAR GATE CHAPEL, DERBY.

The Officers announce that the re-decoration of the Chapel and restoration of the Organ have been completed, and desire to thank all subscribers for their support.

An Ideal Holiday

can be spent at the Vegetarian Society's Summer School at Arncliffe, Westmoreland, from July 27 to August 31.

Illustrated Prospectus free on application to Dept. A.257, Deansgate, Manchester.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:

REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL,

AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

TIAN-Y-BRYN, LLANDUDNO.—PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

Sound Education under best conditions of health.

For Prospectus and information apply to C. J. MONTGOMERY, M.A., Head Master.

LEITCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.

—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad. Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon). Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

FRENCH YOUNG LADY wishes for Situation au pair for three months, from beginning of July, in respectable English family. — For information apply to Mrs. GAYTE, 43 rue de Boulainvilliers, Paris 16^e.

PEARL

ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000

Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, Managing
G. SHRUBSALL, Directors.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, June 30.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN, M.A.
 Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.
 Child's Hill, All Souls', Weech-road, Finchley-road, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. E. DAPLYN.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D., Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11 and 7, Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11 and 6.30, Mr. C. A. WING.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Rev. JOHN ELLIS; 6.30, Mr. S. P. PENWARDEN.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11 and 7, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, M.A.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. H. Gow, B.A.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. T. DAVENPORT BACON, of Salem, U.S.A.
 Ilford, High-road, 11 and 7, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Rev. Dr. TUDOR JONES.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11 and 6.30, Rev. STEPHEN GYORFI, Hungarian Student of Manchester College, Oxford.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 and 7, Rev. C. ROPER, B.A.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. GORDON COOPER.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. W. ROBSON, B.D.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. F. W. G. FOAT, Litt.D., M.A.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLOR.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Mr. W. H. SANDS; 6.30, Rev. JOHN ELLIS.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C., 11.15 and 7, Rev. RUDOLF DAVIS.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. W. G. TARRANT.
 Wimbledon, 27B, Merton-road, 7, Mr. WM. LEE, B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11, Rev. JOSEPH WILSON.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Angelsea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. FRED. BROCKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30. Supply.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. WOOD.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. W. AUSTIN, M.A.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. BODELL SMITH.
 BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45, Scholars' Service; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.
 BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. V. D. DAVIS.
 BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, M.A.
 BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11 and 7, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BECKH.
 { DEAN ROW, 10.45 and 6.30, Annual Sermons, Mr. LAURENCE REDFERN, B.A.
 { STYAL, Closed.

DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. H. PICKERING.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS and Rev. H. W. KING.
 HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. HARGROVE, M.A.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. I. FRIPP.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. C. CRADDOCK.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. D. ROBERTS.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. R. RUSSELL.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. ALEXANDER FARQUHARSON.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. JOHN MOORE.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, Rusholme, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WHITAKER.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. ALFRED HALL, M.A.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. Dr. ODGERS.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVERS.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. JAMES HARWOOD, B.A.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Unity Hall Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. B. STALLWORTHY.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hoat-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

PULPIT SUPPLY.

Mr. LUMMIS has a few dates vacant in the Long Vacation.

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY."—Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda. Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 1½d.—1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to EDITOR, 36, Burlington-road, South Shore, Blackpool.

BIRTH.

BIGGS.—On June 24, at 37, Coventry-road, Ilford, the wife of Rev. A. H. Biggs, of a daughter.

NOTICE.

Mrs. ATTACK and family wish to thank all friends for the kind sympathy shown in their sad loss.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

ADVERTISER seeks post as Nurse-Companion or Companion-Help. Experienced in nursing, domesticated; Unitarian references.—Biss, 5, Darlington-road, Bath.

YOUNG GERMAN LADY (speaks English), trained nurse, desires situation with delicate lady, or one child. Would travel; small salary.—Mrs. ROGERS, John Pounds House, Southsea.

MOTHER'S HELP wanted at once to assist with three children, needlework, and light household duties.—Apply, stating age, experience and requirements, to FURNIVAL JONES, 26, Bedford-avenue, Barnet.

TYPEWRITING.

SERMONS, ARTICLES, and MS. of every description accurately typed. 1s. per thousand words. Price List on application.—Miss KENNEDY, 21, Cheverton-road, Hornsey-lane, N.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	8	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	435	BOOKS AND REVIEWS :—		Willaston School	444
THE BICENTENARY OF JEAN JACQUES		The Religious Situation in France	440	Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church of
ROUSSEAU	436	Nonconformist Questions	441	Ireland	445
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS :—		Publications Received	441	The Social Movement	445
Church Life in Scotland.—II.	437	FOR THE CHILDREN	442	Appeals	446
Types of English Piety	438	MEMORIAL NOTICE :—		Announcements	446
At Church in New York	439	Mr. Howard Samuel Smith	442	NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	446
CORRESPONDENCE :—		MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES :—		NOTES AND JOTTINGS	447
The Land Hunger	440	Manchester College, Oxford	443

 All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IN the case of the Welsh Church Bill the really important issue of Disestablishment is in some danger of being obscured by the discussion on disendowment. In addressing a deputation from the Conciliation Conference, organised by Sir Henry Lunn, and representative of the moderate opinions of a few distinguished names, the Prime Minister spoke as follows :—

“ Our desire is that this measure, which we believe to be called for by considerations of high policy, and which is in strict accordance with democratic principles, should be carried out with the minimum of hardship and without any injustice to the existing interests, and, above all, to the spiritual interests of the Church. There is no one more sincerely desirous than I am that the operation shall be carried through on those lines and in this spirit.”

* * *

WE doubt, however, whether any policy of compromise or concession on the question of disendowment is likely to prepare the way for peace with honour, unless there is a genuine attempt to understand the Welsh Nonconformist position and a refusal once for all to attribute it to narrow and unworthy motives. It is unfortunate that a man of such judicial mind as Canon Sanday should write to the Times in order to appeal from “ the old narrow and jealous Nonconformity ” to the “ newer Nonconformity,” which “ is casting away the spirit of jealousy and thinking only how best the work of God can be carried on.” It is time for the fiction of Nonconformist jealousy to disappear from all honourable controversy. There is nothing paltry or mean in a genuine desire for religious equality.

* * *

WE hope most earnestly that a great deal of public attention will be devoted to the discussion of the Criminal Law Amendment Bill by the Standing Committee of the House of Commons. So far as the Bill strikes an effective blow at the White Slave Traffic it can hardly be too stringent in its provisions. In view of recent revelations of the extent of the evil and the impunity with which it is carried on, the hands of the police must be greatly strengthened in spite of some doctrinaire objections on the ground of possible mistakes and risks to personal freedom. There are, however, other clauses in the Bill, dealing with large and intricate questions of police administration, which will require the most careful and dispassionate consideration. In our zeal for regulation or suppression we must never lose sight of the fact that fundamentally it is a question not of law but of morals. The police may be effective guardians of public order, but clean hands and a pure heart are in the keeping of religion.

* * *

A WELL-ATTENDED meeting was held in the Queen’s Hall on Wednesday night to commemorate the work of Mr. W. T. Stead, and to urge the passage of the Criminal Law Amendment Bill during the present session of Parliament as his best memorial. Dr. Horton, who presided, paid a fine tribute to Mr. Stead’s character and achievements. He was, he said, in a great and true sense a Christian man, who found his Christianity in the Church Militant. He was never content unless he was working and suffering for the ideals he had at heart. He was a man of courage, who seemed almost to rejoice in the howls of execration which he sometimes aroused. He was a Congregationalist, but, like most Congregationalists, he said nothing about it. Accordingly, he contributed little outwardly to Congregationalism, but Congregationalism and his spiritual ancestry contributed a great deal to him. He lived for the security and honour of womanhood, and especially of the young and unprotected girlhood of our country.

* * *

EXCEPT among a small band of High Church extremists there will be general satisfaction that the House of Lords has dismissed the appeal in the Banister case. The decision that it is not competent for a clergyman of the Church of England to treat a man who has married his deceased wife’s sister as an “ open and notorious evil liver,” and to deny him the Holy Communion on that ground, must now be held to be good law. The pith of the judgment is contained in the blunt words of Lord Halsbury. “ It was absolutely ludicrous,” he said, “ to apply the words open and notorious evil livers to persons the validity of whose marriage had been established by Act of Parliament.”

* * *

THE plainness of this language, with its uncompromising appeal to the action of Parliament, has caused some consternation in High Church circles, and called forth a diplomatic letter from the Archbishop of Canterbury, which appeared in The Times on Wednesday. The Primate makes a great deal of the fact that the decision of the Court of Arches has been upheld on appeal, but in view of the fact that the appeal was to the ordinary civil court, and that its decision would be binding in any case, whether it agreed with the Court of Arches or not, it seems rather futile to insist "that nothing has really been done which impairs the Church's right through her own authorities and tribunals to interpret her own rubrics, and to regulate her own terms of Communion." We doubt whether the keen High Churchman, who is continually chafing under the limits imposed upon his action in a State Church, will find much solace in these words in face of a severe legal rebuff to his claims to spiritual autonomy.

* * *

In so far as this decision causes spiritual distress to earnest and conscientious men, we regret it. The dark shadow of the law can never be welcome to the freedom of the religious spirit. At the same time it may be salutary, when it brings back the ecclesiastical dreamer to the plain realities of life, and forces him to distinguish between the conscientiousness of mere partizanship and essential points of conscience. The attempt to rehabilitate respect for canon law in the Church of England and to claim supreme authority for ecclesiastical courts is never likely to arouse much interest among the laity; but it is not without its menace, for it helps to stiffen the energies of the Church into an inert mediævalism and to alienate many of the clergy from the living issues of religion. For such people the recent decision, with its timely common-sense, may well be a blessing in disguise.

* * *

THE Interdenominational Conference of Social Service Unions has held its first summer meeting at Swanwick in Derbyshire during the past week. It has been successful beyond the early dreams of its promoters. Common interest in social work has been a real bond of union among men and women, who have known little hitherto of one another's activities. The concentration of numerous groups from different parts of the country upon the same subject of study, and the friendly interchange of thought and experience will add enormously to their practical effectiveness. The bonds of sympathy and mutual understanding have also been strengthened in such a way as to suggest the possibility of new avenues of spiritual approach. It is through the discovery of common interests and purposes and not by the conscious elimination of differences that men enter into the unity of the Spirit.

THE BICENTENARY OF JEAN JACQUES ROUSSEAU.

ON June 28, 1712, Jean Jacques Rousseau was born at Geneva. He died in 1778. He is regarded as the prophet, the inspiring herald of the French Revolution. He had no reasoned-out, systematic scheme of life for the individual, for the nation, least of all for himself. Like the little child, who uses words beyond his own control, Rousseau, irresponsible himself, burst out into expressions with regard to life, breathing the sense of a responsibility for human political, social, and educational action, which recall the old dictator of Geneva, the same irresistibility of speech, the necessity of utterance—of a message to mankind—but with a personality so different that it is difficult on first thoughts to realise that the spirit of the same city could have held them both within its sphere of influence. Calvin was inflexible in self-control, merciless to others and to himself in declaring the law of God to the Genevans, a champion of intolerance, but a moral disciplinarian, who dragooned willing troops into the service of the temple. And from that service came the marvellous fulfilment of the pronouncement, not only to Geneva but to Calvinised Europe, "Thy service is perfect freedom." The aim of Calvin was, implicitly and finally, the freedom of the sons of God. Rousseau was without self-control, the slave of his emotions, a sentimentalist, who rendered himself liable to all the rigour of George Meredith's adverse criticism of sentimentalism as "the attempt to taste experience without incurring responsibility." Added to this sickly emotionalism, he was subject to weakness of body, showing itself in physical suffering, and no less to mental weakness, at times more than verging upon insanity. As M. Jules Lemaître epitomises his personal characteristics, he was not one, but many persons; and chameleon-like, he changed his colour from time to time and stage to stage: "Genevise soul, Catholic soul, soul of a vagrant and of a rebel, soul of a would-be lover, soul of a simulator through desire for emotion, soul of a dreamer and almost of a fakir, soul of an invalid." What a contrast to Calvin, the despotic administrator, the Pope-like vicegerent of a theocracy! Yet if Mark Pattison is right in the assertion of the paradox with regard to Calvin that in "the suppression of the liberties of Geneva was born the seed of liberty in Europe," it may be stated as an equal paradox, that out of the unbalanced, ill-trained, ill-controlled "babe and suckling" Rousseau, came guidance and light in the expression of political and educational principles, which, if they did not act as the prophetic fire, kindling the forces of the greatest revolution in history, at least have become the recognised formulae for its justification, and the watchwords of political and social advance, even to the present day.

Into the question of the psychological aspects of Rousseau's antecedents, development, or rather lack of it, and the relation between his environment and personality, I cannot enter. The problem is one of acute difficulty, and the monuments of its discussion would almost call for a bibliography to itself. But, at this moment of the bicentenary of his birth, it seems fitting that we should recall to ourselves the central principles which he enunciated. For these have had a world-wide influence imparted to them. They were uttered just before the Declaration of Independence of the United States of America, and before the establishment of the first French Republic. I am not suggesting that Rousseau's views are absolutely original. I am not wishing to give the impression that they were a leading cause of those great critical events in the history of the world. But Rousseau gave literary expression to the underlying ideas of his age, and rose to the crest of the wave of the transforming thought of his time at a formative period of the world's history. The French recognise him as a master of style. He made political and educational literature popular, because he made it thrill with ideas in the consciousness of those who felt that all was ill with the world, but that all could be made right. "God was in His Heaven!"

What are the principles of Rousseau? They are the principles of revolt for which the world yearned, embodied in formulae, and yet expressed in the most positive form. In other words, they are principles of reconstruction which worked as vitally for an ideal of optimistic hopefulness as they worked drastically for revolt against the old order of things. The "Social Contract," the great political and social treatise of Rousseau, begins: "Man is born free, and everywhere he is in chains." And, again, he begins his "Emile" with the conjoint declaration: "Everything is good as it comes from the hands of the Author of Nature; but everything degenerates in the hands of man." Calvin had preached the natural depravity of man. Rousseau proclaimed man's natural goodness. Without attempting a critical inquiry into the actual grounds for the acceptance, or otherwise, of either of these extremes, it is worth while to notice that Rousseau's dictum (Rousseau's pronouncements of principles are all dicta) is the one which inspires self-respect in the human being on whom it dawns as a truth, or at least as a portion of the truth. It was accepted, we may say from a critical point of view, too readily as an axiom. As Lord Morley puts it so excellently: "People ceased to see one another as guilty victims cowering under a divine curse. They stood erect in consciousness of mankind." This was the clarion-cry of Rousseau, the demand to think the best of man and life, the absorption in optimism as a creed. It is the reaction from the older creeds of theological Calvinism, of political absolute monarchy, of aristocratic oppression and insouciance, that made Rousseau's appeal to the essential goodness of all men, especially to the down-trodden and the despised, a gospel. The nobility of the ancient classical world, with ideals of simplicity of character of a Cincinnatus, and still earlier the simplicity of the archaic heroes of Homer and the old time before them, was acknowledged by every educated man, who had entered into the educational traditions of classicism. But Rousseau, by a master-stroke of insight, threw himself further back than the classicists, and conceived the still more ancient (if reputation is to be reckoned by antiquity) glory of the predecessors of the Romans and the Greeks, viz., the original man—savage-man, if you like the term, for he was in the happy state of Nature, in whose keeping and control all is good. This was the golden age, and, like Plato of old, Rousseau invented a myth which the eighteenth century gladly accepted almost without a breath of inquiry, viz., the Social Contract, which was entered into by these primitive people. Rousseau imagines, for it is quite untenable as an account of what historically occurred, that a contract was arrived at to secure that the general will of the community should be invested with power superior to the will of any particular will.* This suggestion, put with the picturesqueness which quickly visualised the political doctrine to the people, was the most effective criticism on the despotism, say, of Louis XIV. But the vitality of Rousseau's conceptions was not limited to the exigencies of the day. The phrases to which he gave life—"the sovereignty of the people," and the expression of "the general will of the people," and the pride of "citizenship"—have brought Rousseau along with them, into a world of futurity, of the conditions of which he never dreamed. For the sense of individualism, of liberty, such, for instance, as Mr. John Stuart Mill or Auberon Herbert sketched, is clearly traceable in the development of an Emile, whose individuality is so precious, that for the period of education Rousseau isolates him from his kind, as if he were a Robinson Crusoe on an island, along with a tutor instead of the Man Friday. On the other hand, the collectivist view, that of socialism, and of the solidarity of the community, is vividly present in the idea of the Social Contract itself. An analysis of Rousseau's general principle of optimism shows first his "enthusiasm for humanity," and secondly, the proposal of the watchword "Back to Nature" as a cure for all the evils of civilisation. And yet, to quote Lord Morley, "Rousseau traces his conclusions from words, and develops his system from the interior germs of phrases."

Modern democracy owes much, therefore, to Rousseau, in political expression.

* Rousseau states that the Social Contract solved the problem: "Find a form of association which defends and protects by means of the common force the person and goods of each member, and by which each, uniting for the weal of all, shall yet obey only himself, and remain as free as he was before."

Education of what is termed the "rational" kind traces back its most telling presentment even yet to him. Everywhere he is full of fire for liberty, though he would often reach forward to it by dictating despotically his own wise precepts. He has not learned, with George Eliot, to "tolerate the intolerant." His love of Nature has permeated the whole world of literature, and he himself has been called "priest of nature." The influence he exerted on other writers is marvellous. Our own Wordsworth and the Nature-school of poets; in Germany, on Goethe, Schiller, and the philosophers. Nor is it too much to say that Tolstoi in spirit is a literary descendant of Rousseau.

Rousseau's joy in the charms of nature, his desire of retreat from overcrowded cities to the sweetness and beauty of the country, make him a pioneer in the popularity of "the simple life." He has the characteristic of genius, viz., to dethrone conventions and to see into the real values of things. He is no philosopher, but, as a French critic says, his "unreason, his total subordination of judgment to emotion, give him a unique place in literature." And were his title to high rank in politics and in literature to be overshadowed, his work in education would be unforgettable. Rousseau says: "Nature wills that children should be children before they are men. If we seek to prevent this order we shall produce forward fruits without ripeness or flavour, and though not ripe, soon rotten; we shall have young savants and old children. Childhood has ways of seeing, thinking, feeling, peculiar to itself; nothing is more absurd than to wish to substitute ours in their place." Rousseau may not be a systematic philosopher, or even a systematic educationist, but in his educational romance of "Emile," he offered for the service of children what has been called a Magna Carta of the child's "rights."

FOSTER WATSON.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

CHURCH LIFE IN SCOTLAND.

II.

"MAN's chief end is to glorify God and enjoy Him for ever"; such is the statement of Scotland's greatest Calvinistic document—the Shorter Catechism. But Dr. Dibelius' analysis in his recent book, "Das Kirchliche Leben Schottlands," of Scotch piety and church-going, elicits a good deal of the motive of glorifying God, but extremely little of the enjoyment of Him.

The Scotchman attends church whether the sermons be good, bad, or indifferent, whether his own minister occupy the pulpit or a stranger be preaching, because he feels he has done his religious duty—he has revered God. He boycotts the electric car—not for the driver's and conductor's sake—but for God's sake; he won't take a walk or listen to music, because it is the "Lord's Day." It reminds us of the story of the old Presbyterian servant-woman in a noble English family. Her mistress, one Sunday, took her in the carriage to a fine Episcopal High Church service, with a good deal of organ and music in it. On returning, the mistress quizzically asked her what she thought of it. "Ou, it's verra bonny, verra bonny; but, oh, my lady, it's an awfu' way of spending the Sabbath!" Similarly with foreign missions, which are a great feature of Presbyterian activity, but which (let it not be told in Gath) perhaps draw more for their missionaries on the zeal of stickit' than of successful ministers, they too are run to extend God's Kingdom rather than to save and bless the heathen themselves.

Dr. Dibelius puts it epigrammatically when he says a Scotch Calvinist has no religious needs, he has only religious duties. And he cites an experience at a wedding in Alexandra Hotel, Glasgow—the Mecca of brides and bridegrooms—where the bridegroom's speech to the guests at breakfast was: "I shall try to do my duty, and I hope she will also do hers." Scotch Calvinism differs in this respect from German Lutheranism. The former has the character of an impersonal, objective system, whereas the latter is more subjective, spiritual and mystical, emphasising not so much God's Majesty as his Grace and Love. Scotland has produced no mystic brotherhoods as Germany had.

It must, however, be stated that if the foregoing be taken as anything more than a filmy generalisation, it will lead to grave misapprehension. As a generalisation it is brilliant, and we believe it to be true; but evangelical experience has been by no means absent from the history of the Scotch people in later times, and to-day it is a living fact in the professoriate and ministry of the Presbyterian Churches.

To-day, whether as a result of the influence of German Biblical criticism and the growing emphasis on the personality of Christ in its transcendently spiritual and mystical characteristics, evangelicalism is, we believe, coming into a new day of power within the realm of Scottish Ecclesiasticism.

The land is overwhelmingly—almost solidly—Presbyterian. The Church of Scotland and the U.F. Church can total up 1,250,000 communicants, while Congregationalists count 36,000, Baptists 21,000, Methodists about 12,000. Methodism, first, introduced by Whitefield and Wesley before the middle of the eighteenth century, seems, lately, to be growing, but only among the heterogeneous lower-class workpeople; while the Unitarians, who are not considered worth mentioning in Dibelius' statistics, and who can only number about a thousand in active connection with their churches, keep their ground with difficulty.

Carlyle once, in a letter to Emerson, spoke of Unitarianism as the "half-way house to Atheism," and the remark illustrates the attitude of even the educated and liberal. If Carlyle himself was anything nameable he was a Unitarian. He might quarrel with the Emersonian "moonshine" in the interest of sober historical facts, but I don't think he would have quarrelled with Dr. Martineau or even with Theodore Parker. Still, Unitarianism is taken to be a flourish for Atheism! That is Scotland all over! And to get over Scotland, to drive any effective wedge into this ancient, wooden Presbyterianism, Unitarianism will have to come not as the cold iron, but iron red-hot and burning, from an evangelical, spiritual fire.

The impression which Scotch people seem usually to get, if they ever enter a Unitarian chapel, not only in Scotland but in England also, was put into rhyme by Burns, while once in a different church :

"As caul a wind as ever blew,
As caul a kirk, and in't but few,
As caul a minister as ere spak
Ye'se aw be het ere I come back."

Let it be said that in many cases that is only surface contact ; as cold as earth on the top, the globe may have fire enough below ! For Scotland, however, Unitarianism can only be said to have heroically, or less heroically, failed.

Presbyterianism has always been, and is now, conservative ; conservative in church life and conservative in church theology. Theology has been the peculiar temper or, if you like, distemper of Scotch religion. In the old days, Dean Ramsay tells us, it did not much matter what a minister's text was, the sermon always went along its via dolorosa—from the Fall of Adam and man's guilty state thereby, lingering upon his restoration through the Atonement of Christ, and at length reaching justification by Faith and the terms of the New Covenant ; after which, of course, one might expect the application, the exhortation, and, in the preacher's good time, the conclusion. It was all a question of right doctrine. When poor David Hume, the sceptic, once fell into a swamp and could not get out, he begged an old Scotch woman passing to help him, reminding her that Christian charity bids us to do good to all, even atheists. "Christian charity here, or Christian charity there," replied the old worthy, "I'll do naething for you till ye turn Christian—ye maun repeat the Lord's Prayer and the Creed ; or faith, I'll let ye grafel (grovel) there as I fand ye !" And Hume, in terror of his life, had to do it.

And yet, with all this interest in theology, Scotland has produced no theologian of any consequence. It can't move forward freely, being laden like a poor ass with the heavy burden of its creeds. Freedom of thought and inquiry are not appreciated or wanted in the Church. Dr. Dibelius has rightly noted that in Scotch theological colleges theology is prosecuted not as a science, but as the handmaid of the Church's life—slave would be the better word.

He points out that all the professors are taken from the ranks of the active practical ministry—a gain to the church as such, but an irreparable loss to the subject taught, as a science. That also, we may add, accounts for the fact that the theological professors are so painfully obsessed with the thought of "the weaker brethren." Chair and pulpit alike have always this idea of the Church looming in the back of their minds ; they are anchored to it, and it keeps them from going forward as they should. They hang back for the sake of the weaker brethren. The men who count in the modern thought of young Scotland are the men who got their light and leading from Germany, Edward and John Caird and Flint, the last to a much less degree, we imagine. And when the essence of Kant and Hegel is abstracted from the Cairds, what is left, as far as original thought is concerned ?

There was one man who had it in him to make some contribution to European thought, in connection with Biblical Criticism : that was Robertson Smith. In 1870, while he was a young professor at the Free Kirk College in Aberdeen—so brilliant that he had stepped from the student's desk into the professor's chair—appeared his contributions to the ninth edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," contributions which made the ancient lethargic orthodoxy shake its venerable bald head in dismay, and in righteous anger kick for its life. On May 26, 1881, Robertson Smith was deprived of his chair in Aberdeen. What Scotland rejected Cambridge took in. That was prophetic. Any real furthering contributions to Biblical Criticism in this country have come from England. And recently the most brilliant of young Scotch critics has passed out of Scotland to Oxford, and its freer atmosphere. Here and there a voice for Freedom rises from the grave, but it finds a poor and meagre echo ; the most advanced are far behind. "Of theological liberalism in the proper sense of the word Scotland to this hour knows nothing." That is approximately fact. True, the door of liberty is being very slowly and cautiously opened, but few there be that go in thereat.

In the march of progress Scotland falls out of reckoning. She is too paralysed by fear to utter a voice. Sir William Ramsay and George Adam Smith may be read beyond the borders of their own church, but what has either of them to contribute to theological advance ? One may burrow in deserted cities, the other write fine prose, but neither has the philosophy nor the insight that can lead the present or open up the future. Sad to any son of his country who would gladly see her as once she was, the seat of leading thinkers in these British Isles ; sad, but just the summing up of Dr. Dibelius in this book, which is a masterpiece of painstaking, thorough, and illuminated work :—

"As always hitherto, the general attitude of the Scotch churches in the matter of 'Confessions' is wholly conservative. Not only that the leading circles have no mind to grant a right in the church to those positions which are advocated by the so-called liberal theology in Germany ; but among the ministers themselves there is a total lack of such as would be ready to fight for them. Again and again, it must be emphasised that in Scotland the theoretical cause falls behind the practical."

Since the time of Robertson Smith all that has been learnt is, that only in the gravest circumstances need one proceed against minister or teacher on the score of his theological views, and hope to succeed. That is surely little, when at the same time you are told that not here but on German soil must the great battle of doctrinal and religious progress be fought. There, not here, is the scene where the real drama is being played out.

R. NICOL CROSS.

TYPES OF ENGLISH PIETY.

It does not seem as if the modern world, in the west, has much room for Piety. The word has an old-world flavour about it. In some strange fashion—perhaps some far-off association—it suggests to me lavender and an old garden. It is out of place amid the dominant mechanism of modern life. It belongs to quieter and simpler times. It is like a wayside flower smothered and choked by the dust-trail of the motor car. It cannot live in the same world with the lust of speed and the love of hustle ; and this is largely our modern world.

William Law defined Piety as "the earnest application of the soul to God, as the only cause and fountain of happiness." Mr. R. H. Coats* defines it as "the effort of man's entire personality to adjust itself to the totality of his spiritual environment, and come to terms of harmony with the supreme over-arching and underlying Power, in whom we live and move and have our being." The latter puts in cosmic terms what the former says in simpler anthropomorphic language ; but the thing is the same. You will have to get into the by-ways of modern life, even of modern religious life, to find it. It is not a common flower in our church gardens. For our churches are largely over-run with the business element. The ark is the treasury-chest. The sanctuary has almost been lost. We do not take the shoes from off our feet. Social problems intrude ; the strifes of the dusty highway echo in the shrines. Many are able to discuss the psychology of prayer, but few pray. We have a New Theology and a New Thought, but our religious husbandry, scientific and up-to-date as it is, does not seem able to grow the old fragrant plant in the modern soil. We know too much to be pious. We are too much concerned about the doing of things to be pious. We have strayed from the simplicity of the child-heart. We are blasé in point of wonder. We are the victims of our achievements. We are strangers to that humility which lies at the root of both greatness and goodness.

When Mr. Coats wants examples illustrative of his three different types of Piety, he has to go a long way back for them. Lancelot Andrewes, George Herbert, John Keble, John Bunyan, William Cowper, Henry Vaughan, Samuel Taylor Coleridge—your average church-goer would be hard put to it to secure half marks, or even one-third marks, in answering the question as to who these were, when they lived, what they wrote. They belong to another world than that of the things he is mainly interested in. He is interested in the elaboration of organisation, in the popular preacher, in the relation of scientific discoveries to the facts of his faith ; he has probably long abandoned the habit of prayer, he regards the devotional portion of public worship either frankly as a bore, or as a necessary performance, or as a preliminary ; he measures success by results, and, while he is by no means innocent of "good works," whether personal or by proxy through the subscription list, he is not conscious, in his own private life, of the need of meditation, communion, or any of the real exercises of the religious life. The men whose names have just been mentioned were not strange phenomena unrelated to their time; they were possible only because of a certain quality of atmosphere and energy and consciousness characteristic of the religious life of their day; our world does not produce such men because the modern religious community has different characteristics. The consequence of this is that in reading Mr. Coats' book one feels almost as if one were passing through an ancient armoury, or studying the costumes of a hundred years ago.

* "Types of English Piety." By R. H. Coats, Edinburgh, T. & T. Clark. 4s. net.

Why is it that there are types of Piety? It is a fact familiar to the student of psychology that ideas arise in the mind not singly but in systems. Each prominent idea comes up with an associated system of fringe-ideas. These fringe-ideas are very important. The idea of God, for example, in the mind of Jesus, and in the mind of a typical Pharisee, is associated with a different system of fringe-ideas; hence a differing religious attitude and method. The idea of Nature, again, in the mind of Haeckel, and in the mind of Wordsworth, is associated with a different set of fringe-ideas; hence a differing outlook and reaction upon Nature. A good deal of the difference in mental quality and life-spirit which lies between man and man may be expressed in terms of the different "fringes" associated with the dominant ideas in the mind.

Piety is one thing all the world over. We have already had it defined. If a man has any visual image corresponding to the feeling of Piety—and most men have—it will be the image of a son in the presence of a father with love lying warm and free between them. That which causes it to happen that there are various types of Piety is that this focal idea, or image, is associated in the minds of different men with differing systems of fringe-ideas. It is this fringe which determines very largely the warmth, and colour, so to speak, of the focal idea; also the quality of action that flows from it. The fringes themselves are determined by a man's temperament, tradition, education, and environment, by the kind of ideas which, whether by instruction or by intuition, have come to be associated for him with the notion of God as the idea-system has gradually formed in his mind.

Mr. Coats has written an essay always delightful, fascinating, stimulating, and not unseldom brilliant alike in sympathetic insight and critical acumen. He marks three principle types of Piety in the religious life of England—the sacerdotal, the evangelical, the mystical. If our theory of fringes is sound, he himself cannot well belong to all three; possibly he belongs to none of the three, but to a fourth type at which he only hints, namely, that which characterises the advocates of liberal Christianity; yet it is amazing to find with what vividness, enthusiasm, sureness of touch, warmth of genuine feeling, the suggestion almost of actual personal experience, he deals with each in turn. The rare gift of a sympathetic imagination dwells in double portion with him; he projects himself into the various types with a completeness of self-identification, and yet never leaves his critical faculty behind him.

Is it possible that a new type of Piety is arising in these modern days? I think that it is very likely. It would seem at any rate that the way is being prepared for it. There is a gathering revolt against mechanism; the cult of the simple life, the practice of mental culture, and such like, seem to be the heralds of something; the man of the world writes them down as the fads of mere cranks, but he is not the best judge of the inwardness of a movement. The Church, moreover, whose central energies have been as much dissipated as expressed in such public works as the education of the children of the people and the care of the sick and the poor—vicariously taking upon herself the common burden at her own cost—is now being largely relieved of such labours by the recognition of community-responsibility. She is becoming free to get back to her proper function. The rehabilitation of immanentist theology, coupled with the results of psychological investigation into the nature of personality, has given a new significance to the worth of the individual and its relation to the spiritual organism. The limitations of the intellect are more clearly marked—as, for example, in the writings of Bergson—and the sense is growing that man has other and better faculties for the apprehension of reality. Thus, while it is not possible altogether to rationalise prayer and devotion, these things begin to find a reasonable place in the whole round of a man's self-expression. There is an increasing number of people who are definitely setting themselves to the simplification of their lives, and the development of the profounder functions of personality. There are many who find that they can work better in the world, and for the world, if their souls are at home with God.

These are among the signs of the times. They seem to foreshadow a revival, perhaps rather a new up-thrust, of the religious consciousness. If this can establish itself—and this is largely a question of our readiness to receive it—some of us who stand here shall not taste of death before we see the Kingdom come in power. For this deepening of personal life necessarily involves the re-discovery of the human unity; and this, in its turn, involves the doing away with those divisive things, those "works of the Devil," which, whether in the form of creeds or of long-established social iniquities, keep men apart and at strife.

E. W. LEWIS.

AT CHURCH IN NEW YORK.

THE opportunity of worshipping once more with Robert Collyer was not to be missed.

So evidently thought President Taft, who in the middle of his strenuous political campaign in New Jersey, found time to attend the service at Thirty-fourth-street, New York, on the last Sunday in May. On the previous day he had covered 125 miles in his automobile, and had addressed twelve meetings. On Sunday morning very scantily attended, he walked into Church, showing his companions into the pew before him. A strong, honourable, high-minded man, but possibly not strong enough to rid himself of the incubus of the party political machine.

But my interest was not in President Taft, but in Robert Collyer. Years ago (was it forty) I had heard him speak, standing on the slope of the Dingle, in Liverpool, with the vessel that was to take him back to America lying in the Mersey in full view of where he stood. Since then I had heard him on Decoration Day in his New York Church, thirty years ago. I remember his story to the crowded congregation of men of the comrade who told him, as life passed away from him, that he had seven very good reasons for not coming to the War—a wife and six children. Again, I had listened to him in Liverpool and elsewhere. Now once again, the well-known voice, strong and clear, if not quite so distinct, invited us to sing, "From all that dwell below the skies, let the Creator's praise arise." Later on, he added to his announcement of the hymn, "Everybody sing," and everybody did sing. A welcome change from thirty years ago, when I remember the same invitation was not very generally responded to. The lesson was read by the Rev. John Haynes Holmes, Mr. Collyer's assistant minister.

It was our venerable father in God who invited us to the "old sweet errand of coming to our Father." The keynote of the service was struck at once, as he gave expression to the faith that "Thy dear Son was present with us, helping us now and evermore." His sermon was directed to the thought of Christ. "Is not this the Carpenter?" It was full of all the homely illustrations, the apt personal reminiscences, the pithy and expressive phrases with which many of the readers of THE INQUIRER are familiar. The sermon, read throughout, showed no falling off in this from any previous deliverances of Robert Collyer that I can remember.

He ventured the supposition that Joseph had upon one occasion promised Jesus that one day he would take him to the temple, where the Rabbis would be able to answer the earnest questions Jesus put to him, his simple old father. "The old father probably forgot the promise, but not so the boy." Clement writes of him as a carpenter and builder with his father, a maker of ox goads and ploughs. So it was a wise master builder who told the story of the house built upon the sand and upon the rock. The very limitations of his knowledge, of his reading and of his race, helped to make Jesus what he was, a true Son of Man. "So human, therefore so Divine." He learned as he went along, and it was after his talk with the Samaritan woman that he told the story of the Good Samaritan. Why should we trouble ourselves with these limitations? "All he knew he told us. All that could be done he did for us." He was a true Son of Man because he reached downward to the lowest. He seemed to say to the sinning one "God help thee, there must have been something wrong that you have come to be where you are." He wept by the graveside, he shrank from the shadows. It was in his humanity that he was most divine.

It is the measure of our own manhood, if we are loyal to Him, to be a Son of God, we must be a true Son of Man.

Jesus, Mr. Collyer declared to be the most exalted religious genius God had ever sent to the world.

Where lay his secret?

It was because he rested utterly and without debate, not only on the Fatherhood of God, but also in the Motherhood of God.

Though once he seemed to think that God had forsaken him, never for a moment did he think that he could forsake God. Still he was a carpenter, a man of the field, a democrat, one who hated the tyrants and the tyrannies, the bigotries and the bigots.

He saw right into the heart of Heaven through his own heart. He was the sacred seer of the eternal life.

"I want him to be the Captain of my Salvation."

"I rest in him."

"May we realise what he has been to the ages, and what he is still to us." So he closed.

In one hearer's mind one question remained.

What is his secret—the secret of Jesus? How comes it that all the finest, the holiest, the purest souls that have lived since his time have one and all acknowledged their loyalty to the great Captain of their Salvation?

The leaders of past ages and the leaders of our own are one in their glad and profound allegiance. Added knowledge, wider experience, the light from other faiths and other traditions does not diminish, but seems to increase the testimonies of the best of men to one greater than themselves.

When we are most truly human, said Mr. Collyer, then are we most truly divine!

Has humanity become so perfect in him that it has seemed Divine in very deed and truth?

One phrase, and one phrase only of the aged preacher, called up a protest in my mind.

He spoke of Jesus as not looking down upon us from the awful influence of the Godhead. Does not the Godhead whom Jesus has revealed to us become the tender father speaking to his children? For is it not his voice, the voice of his Father, and our Father, that we hear when we listen to our Master, and in His face we see, not indeed, "the awful influence of the Godhead," but the Father?

R. R.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

THE LAND HUNGER.

SIR,—Eight years ago we wrote an open letter to the Press, inviting readers to send letters and documents describing their memories and experiences of life in rural England under Protection. We received a large and remarkable response from the whole country, with the result that the volume now known as "The Hungry Forties," was prepared and published. This volume was made up almost entirely of information voluntarily supplied by men and women who knew the difficulty of living in a time when Protection (Tariff Reform) and the Corn Tax still robbed the people.

We have always felt that in England Free Trade has not had a fair opportunity of being a complete success, whilst the land on which the people live, and from which the food of the country might be obtained, is still in bondage. To-day we need Free Land to give Free Trade its full scope. Richard Cobden, in his last speech at Rochdale on November 23, 1864, said:—

"If I were five-and-twenty or thirty, instead of, unhappily, twice that number of years, I would take Adam Smith in hand—I would not go beyond him, I would have no politics in it—I would take Adam Smith in hand, and I would have a League for Free Trade in Land, just as we had a League for Free Trade in Corn."

Holding these views, we should be glad if readers of this letter would correspond with us and communicate their experiences of land renting and land buying, especially in connection with small holdings and allotments, rack renting, land going out of cultivation, arbitrary ejections with no compensation—or inadequate compensation. Illustrations of what could be done even now to cultivate the common and waste lands of their district, or to restore to cultivation lands that have gone out of use, might be given.

In connection with this subject is the burning one of cottage accommodation; here perhaps some readers will add information in regard to cottages in their neighbourhood; the tied house system, the difficulty of obtaining houses, and the high rents paid in many places; cottages with inadequate accommodation for families, and therefore insanitary and leading to immorality. Information also might be given in regard to the difficulties in the way of marriage of young people from lack of house room, with the result of emigration to foreign countries or to the towns.

Other subjects and points will suggest themselves, and the experiences of the past and of the present will all be of interest and value, and of service in bringing these great questions before the country. As we promised in connection with "The Hungry Forties" so we now promise correspondents that a book will be prepared and published as a result of this inquiry. Any documents addressed to our care will be copied and returned if desired.

(Signed)

T. FISHER UNWIN.
JANE COBDEN UNWIN.

Oatcroft, Heyshott, Midhurst, Sussex.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE RELIGIOUS SITUATION IN FRANCE.

L'Orientation Religieuse de la France Actuelle. Par Paul Sabatier. Paris: Armand Colin.

THE title of a book is often but a more or less arbitrary label, a convenient rather than intimate designation of its individuality. Sometimes, however, a title succeeds in being the compression of the whole spirit of a book into a phrase. M. Sabatier's title has this happy quality of significance. It reveals at once what is to him essential in religion. The life of religion is rooted in the past, but it is wholly directed towards the future. Where its gaze is turned consistently backwards, it dies down into an imitation which is not merely non-religious but is in danger of becoming irreligious.

It is from this point of view that M. Sabatier seeks to describe the actual religious situation in his own country. Historically France belongs almost exclusively to the Catholic Church. The administrative acts of 1685 secured for that country religious unity, though at a great cost. French Protestantism is a historical memory, not an actual religious force. It is true that the adherents of that creed exercise an influence upon the national life out of all proportion to their numbers. They are respected, they are trusted. Even their religion, as a social fact, is invested with a certain measure of cold and distant respect. But as a religion it makes no sort of appeal to the French character. And since the Separation Law of 1905 the possibilities of its religious influence have, if that were possible, been still further reduced. Up to 1905, French Protestantism was represented by two churches, the Reformed Church of France, Calvinist in organisation and doctrine, and the Lutheran Church of Alsace-Lorraine. Since 1905 the Reformed Church has split up into three sections, the National Union of Reformed Evangelical Churches, representing an uncompromising Biblical orthodoxy, the United Reformed Churches, embracing the small group of religious Liberals, and the Union of Jarnac founded for the purpose of mediating between the orthodox and the Liberals, but finally compelled by the difficulties of the situation to become itself an independent and rival organisation. It is perhaps not wonderful that a church so divided has lost such influence as it might once have hoped to exercise, has indeed lost all hope or purpose of exercising it.

There remains the Catholic Church. Here the situation is, in M. Sabatier's view, much more complicated. It is indeed so complicated that a superficial reading of M. Sabatier's book may well produce upon the mind of the reader an impression of utter confusion. It needs sympathetic attention to recover his hope from the midst of the desperate situation he so vividly pictures. Materially the Roman Catholic Church in France has since 1905 been struggling for bare existence. In many dioceses, perhaps in most, it is already financially insolvent. Its seminaries are rapidly emptying. In the diocese of Paris, comprising three million souls, there were in the year 1910 only sixteen ordinations. Last year only eleven. This year there will be fewer still. Of nine seminarists called from the Roman Seminary in 1910 to fulfil their legal term of military service only two returned. It seems as though the Church were rapidly sinking into bankruptcy both of men and means. In a few years it may be that the Church in France will be manned almost entirely by members of religious orders and of orders which cannot legally maintain congregations upon French soil. The Church will have become a wholly alien institution.

This material bankruptcy is naturally the index to its moral bankruptcy, to its utter lack of influence upon the national life. And the moral bankruptcy of the Church is all the more hopeless because it is by no means the result of a depression of moral tone among the clergy. Never, indeed, was the moral standard of clerical life on a higher level. The priest is almost universally respected for the simplicity, the earnestness of self-sacrificing devotion, which almost invariably characterises his life. The system which he represents is the one thing about him in which the great masses of the people are not interested. In so far indeed as religion is the consecration of certain moments in the life of the individual which have a social interest and significance, it is still treated with at least formal respect. Its ministration in this kind are both expected and demanded. But its modern specialised devotion, its obstinate insistence on the archaic ecclesiastical discipline, and especially perhaps its reactionary political attitude, have separated it by an impassable gulf from the life of the people. It can no longer recognise and encourage what is best in that life, as it has also lost the power of effectually reproving what is worst in it.

The official Church can only helplessly wring its hands over the religious apostasy of France. M. Sabatier's thesis is that there is no need for such an attitude, that France is deeply stirred by a renewal of the religious spirit, that that spirit will in the end succeed in renovating the actual religious tradition of the nation. There are, he insists, two Catholicisms in France, the official Catholicism which is dying and the Catholicism which is being born out of the decay of traditional fame. The latter, he believes, will enter into the full inheritance of the former. It is too generous a hope to be lightly set aside by anyone who believes in the universal human need of religion, and the unlimited power of religion to renew itself. That hope will not be rebuked even by the formidable power of resistance of an ancient religious organisation, forced by every threat to its continued dominance to become more blindly obstinate in the assertion of its most disputable claims. It is still possible to conceive of even such a resistance being overcome. But assuredly there is needed to overcome it an immense fervour and vigour of religious certainty concentrated into a sustained purpose and effort of renewal. If one is compelled to hesitate about subscribing to M. Sabatier's generous faith in the future of French religion, it is only because the religious forces which he so lucidly analyses seem as yet too vague and consciously unrelated to effect the revolution which is necessary. Yet he would probably reply that life is a slow process but a sure one, that the factors of religious change, which as a historian he indicates, must in time converge to the necessary consciousness and intensity of purpose. That raises the further question whether a great religious change can ever be the product of a gradual evolution, or must perforce involve a conscious and revolutionary breach with the past. In the sphere of religion at least, that is a problem which must be left to the future to decide. The history of the past affords us no precedent here.

A. L. LILLEY.

NONCONFORMIST QUESTIONS.

Nonconformity, its Origin and Progress. By W. B. Selbie, M.A., D.D., Principal of Mansfield College, Williams & Norgate. 1s. net. (Home University Library.)

EVERY time a fresh and sincere attempt is made to review Nonconformist history, and to place it among the living tendencies of our day, there inevitably arises the question, Can Nonconformity as such continue to have a raison d'être? With the growing certainty of changes now at last arriving in the "Establishment of Religion" in these kingdoms, must there not come also a change of aims and attitudes among great numbers of people whose Nonconformity had strong historical roots in the situation, "State Church versus Voluntaryism"? Principal Selbie, in his careful and comprehensive sketch, thinks that "after the Church is disestablished" Nonconformists will find their raison d'être in that "more democratic ideal of Church government and fellowship" for which they stand in striking contrast to the Church of England. Does not this, however, too much assume that "after disestablishment," other things will remain entirely as they now are, e.g., that the "freed" Church of England would in the anticipated circumstances, not effect a measure of democratisation; or that the increasing appreciation of beautiful Catholic forms of ritual would not change the face of much "freed" Dissent—"freed" in this case from ancient antagonism to noble usages of which its enemy has had the monopoly? The great probability seems to be that the all-changing Time-spirit, while overturning so many of the ancient landmarks, is not going to leave untouched the not very stable forms in which the religious unrest of the last three centuries happens to have clothed itself.

It is only just to say that Principal Selbie writes with a full consciousness of the impending changes in religion and social life that are now all about us. He frankly states that the great masses of the wage-earning population are altogether alienated from the Churches, whether Nonconformist or Anglican. The reasons for this, he says, are predominantly social, and he looks to a quickened social conscience and deeper study to remedy the matter. The comment may be ventured, with regard to this, that while it is a true answer so far as it goes, it is scarcely relevant to the subject.

No doubt there must be more study. But all the Churches, and all men, must study. The question is, What, if any, is the specific contribution of Nonconformity to the problem of religious decline under social stress? And if such specific contribution is out of the question, then will not Nonconformity, more and more, be out of the question?

It is much more to the point when Principal Selbie roundly affirms that we have now reached a period of religious reaction, an ebb-tide in spiritual things. It is good and heartening to find that, in such a crisis, he puts his faith in a wider theological outlook and an untrammelled exercise of the intellect. He admits that "men still cling pathetically to the old formularies, and regard every suggestion to alter them as a profanation of the ark of God. Even among the larger Free Churches, there is not a little intolerance. . . . It is impossible to put back the hands of the clock, and the Churches must be able to speak to the men of to-day in the terms of the current intellectual life." How delightful, if we may look to the Principal of Mansfield to be the leader in the great approaching Transition. That the omens are favourable, we are convinced from what he says, in weighty and balanced language, almost in the closing words of the book. He is speaking of Unitarians. "Their aims and methods naturally keep them apart from the Evangelical Free Churches, but as changes are taking place on both sides it is to be hoped that better relations may be established in the not very distant future. . . . The hard dogmatic attitude which has characterised both sides alike is found to be no longer possible. And as it comes gradually to be understood that belief in the Divinity of Christ depends not so much on philosophical interpretations of His Person and place in the Godhead, as on the Christian's personal faith in and devotion to Himself, the old Unitarian controversy loses much of its point and meaning."

He goes on to define the evangelical position as being that Jesus Christ has the religious value of God. This was the position Dr. Selbie took up in his recent Deansgate Lecture, and it is a position that can be held by Unitarians without contradicting their fundamental prepossessions. Truly the omens are favourable.

The historical part of the book, needless to say, is very thorough, considering the amount of space at command. The writer tells a plain story, without unnecessary varnishing, and gives an immense amount of information.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

MESSRS. GEORGE ALLEN & CO.:—Stories for Young Hearts and Minds: F. J. Gould. 2s. 6d. net.

THE CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS:—Scripture Teaching in Secondary Schools.

MESSRS. P. S. KING & SON:—Taxation of Land Values: John Orr, M.A. 1s. net.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN:—The Lower Depths: Maxim Gorky. 2s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Review of Theology and Philosophy, The Quest, Sunday School Quarterly.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

BABES IN THE WOOD.

BABES in the wood? Yes, dozens—scores of them for those who have the desire to find and the tireless patience needed for successful looking and listening. Bird babies not only in the wood, but in the lane where the wild rose is flinging pink and green sprays far down the hedge bank, in the green pastures beside still waters where sleek cows lie peacefully chewing the cud, on the fell-side where the lambs are playing, among the sedges of the marsh, and—tantalising though it be—deep down in the hay grass now ripe for mowing and not to be trampled.

More British wild birds build nests in May than in any other month; therefore, from late in May to well on in June we may expect to see the greatest number of young broods. During the first week of this month few of the nests visited by me contained eggs; but there were little families in all stages of growth, and some nests from which the birds had already flown. Come with me to a small wood which I know well, where you shall certainly see some young birds.

This wood is composed chiefly of young firs with a few silver birches and other young trees scattered among them. Here and there we shall find a full-grown oak, and close at hand is another wood full of oaks. The presence of these oaks is probably one reason why so many birds choose to build in the small wood; instinct teaches them that green caterpillars will be in very great demand in June and July, and that oaks supply these in great numbers. We shall find our wood difficult to get about in, for draining trenches are cut all across it; and when the young trees were thinned out in February or March they were left just where they were cut down, and now lie half hidden among the yard-high bracken. Where there is no bracken there are nettles growing in tangles of bramble. Thus this wood gives just the shelter which a large number of small birds seek for their nests. We must thread our difficult way as quietly as we can, for we depend partly on the birds themselves to unconsciously betray their nests; if we startle them away in advance we may lose valuable clues.

That little heap of loose sticks with nettles growing through it is a likely place for a whitethroat's nest. You know that "nettlecreeper" is one of the names of this bird. No, you need not go up to the spot; fling this bit of dead wood in that direction, and if a bird is there she will rise. No movement; pass on, and be all ears as well as eyes. "Chuck-uck-uck." Do you hear that? Softly now—we must not terrify that little brown bird which we hear scolding us because we are near her nest. "Chuck-uck-uck." There she is, in that tiny birch. How restlessly she flits about. If we follow she will not fly up and away, but will skulk about within a few yards of her treasure. No nest is to be seen, but there certainly is one. I know it by the bird's behaviour. We will go away for awhile and will visit the nest of a pair of bullfinches which I know of and have visited a few times. Stay, we must make landmarks or we shall not find the place again. We will place these two whitish stones at the foot of this young horse chestnut, the only one anywhere near.

Now follow me to Mrs. Bullfinch's home. It is built of birch twigs, and lined with dry grass and hair. When I found it she had five bluish-green eggs blotched and streaked with dark red and purplish-brown. During the early days of sitting she would fly off very silently if the little tree was touched; but as the hatching advanced she sat tighter, and from the time she had two eggs hatched out she sat, as the bullfinch always does, very closely. Books tell us that this bird will allow herself to be stroked on the nest. One day, when I very gently raised the branch which conceals the nest, she crept to the edge of it and lay motionless for a few seconds before she stole away. Two of her eggs had not hatched out when I paid my fourth and last visit six days ago and twenty-one days from the date of my first visit. If they are still in the nest we will remove them, for they will not hatch out and will only be in the way.

Here is the tree. No, not the birch; bullfinches do not build in deciduous trees, that is, trees which shed their leaves in winter, but in firs or other evergreens. The nest is about three feet from the ground. Walk round the little tree. You can see nothing? See, I raise this bough. Ah, now you have it. Yes, it is a pretty nest and uncommon-looking. No parent bird on it. Surely the birds are away seeking food for these two fine fledglings. There are no eggs to be seen, and where can the third fledgling be? I will gently move this bird and look below. See here is a dead bird not more than a third the size of the others, so it must have died some days ago. Its tiny body is decaying. Why did not the parents throw it out? Perhaps it is too heavy for them. I will very carefully draw it out. There, birdies, we have done you a good service by dragging the poor wee corpse from under you. Notice the atoms of pale reddish fluff on the throats and breasts of these young birds; they are to have salmon red feathers there when they are grown up. Mark also the beginnings of white feathers round the roots of their buds of tails. One of the distinguishing marks of a bullfinch is the white rump, seen most clearly when it flies. I am pleased to see this mark at so early a stage, for it means that if ever I see a young bullfinch that has just left its nest I shall have little difficulty in recognising it as a bullfinch.

Now we will go back to our two white stones. How thick the undergrowth is on this slope! It is hot work pushing through it in this blazing sunshine, and the brambles grip one's clothing unmercifully. Now down on hands and knees to crawl under these close-growing young larches; it will prove the easiest plan on such an incline as this. There we are through, hot and panting, but it is all in the day's work, and well worth while to the real bird lover. We are close to the white stones, so keep a good lookout. There, a bird flew out of this young fir. Ah, you have the nest! It is crammed full of babies. How comically skinny! Five of them, probably two days old. Why do I think this? Because they lift their heads steadily, and have already clearly-defined traces of fluffly down on their heads and bodies. If they were much older you would see faint signs of the quills out of which the feathers are to grow. This must be the nest of our skulking whitethroat, for the cup is deep, far deeper than that of the bullfinch, and flimsily woven of dry grass and lined with finer grass and horsehair. No feathers. Whitethroats do not use them. There comes a parent bird with a bill crammed with insects. Let us hurry away and leave the babies in peace.

A bird rose just on your left. It came from the ground; let us look about; tread cautiously or you may trample it. I heard a willow wren's song as we came near here, so look for a domed nest made chiefly of hay and much more closely woven than our last. It will be lined with such things as moss and wool, and above all these there will be feathers in plenty. Here it is. Yes, a willow wren's family of four young and three eggs. The parents are in that big oak; that "tewy, tewy" so anxiously uttered is their alarm note. Here again we must not linger or the eggs may chill. We will come to-morrow and hope to find the nests of some warblers, or a blackcap or wren. All such birds are likely to favour a wood like this.

EMILY NEWLING.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MR. HOWARD SAMUEL SMITH.

BIRMINGHAM has lost one of its prominent citizens, and the liberal religious movement in the Midlands one of its staunchest supporters in the death of Mr. Howard Samuel Smith, which occurred on Saturday, June 15, at his residence, Oakfield, Woodbourne-road, Edgbaston. Born in 1842, Mr. Howard Smith was the fourth son of the late Mr. Brooks Smith, who for many years in the Town Council and in other capacities was prominently identified with the public life of Birmingham. His mother was a daughter of the late Mr. James Ryland. His professional career as a chartered accountant was one of great enterprise and success. In reviewing its course, the Birmingham Daily Post writes:—"Many years ago Mr. Smith became a member and afterwards a Fellow of the Society of Actuaries, and he was a Fellow of the Actuaries' Institute of Scotland, and of the Royal Statistical Society. . . . He took a prominent part in the movement which resulted in the incorporation of accountants by charter, and he not only occupied an important position in the councils of the society, but he filled the office of President, and also held the presidency of the local branch. Busy man though he was professionally, he was keenly active in many movements of social and public importance. For a number of years he was a member of the Birmingham Board of Guardians, and he took a lively interest in the administration of the Poor Law, as well as in the work devolving upon the Board of Overseers, of which body he was at one time chairman. In 1868 he was the local secretary of the Social Science Congress, which, in that year, held its meetings in Birmingham; he kept the accounts of the Education League, established in 1869; he was a Governor of King Edward's School; and he was the secretary for several years of the Nursing Institution and the Birmingham and Midland Counties Sanatorium. In 1873 he was also the hon. secretary of the Birmingham Musical Festival. In politics, a Liberal, Mr. Smith followed the late Mr. Gladstone on the question of Home Rule, and when the fortunes of the party were at a low ebb in Birmingham, he did a great amount of good work as an active member of the executive committee of the Liberal Association to promote the principles of Liberalism, in opposition to the strength of Unionism which prevailed in every division of the city. He was a magistrate for the county of Warwick, and discharged his duties as a member of the Aston bench."

As a Unitarian Mr. Howard Smith was a regular worshipper at the Church of the Messiah, with which his family has been connected for several generations. His familiar presence there, his ever ready counsel, sympathy and generous support of the work of the church and its institutions, all will be sadly missed. From 1881 to 1887 he was the treasurer of the church, and at his death he had been a trustee for forty-four years. Further, he always took a deep interest in the Hurst-street Domestic Mission, and was president of its committee. Mr. Howard Smith was married in 1872 to Miss Ellen Follett Osler, daughter of the late Mr. Clarkson Osler. He leaves also four children—two sons and two daughters. One daughter is the wife of Mr. Cecil Crosskey, the other of Mr. P. J. Worsley, jun. Mr. Howard Smith was a brother of Mr. Priestley Smith, the oculist.

At the Church of the Messiah, on the ensuing Sunday, Mr. Austin spoke of him as one honoured and loved by all who knew him. He referred to him particularly as illustrating the progressive spirit, which spirit, "descending from father to child continually, bears continually its rich fruits in private life, in the life of the community and in Church life."

The funeral took place on Tuesday, June 18, at Quinton, near Birmingham, and was attended by a large number of mourners and friends and representatives of many societies. His last resting place, Quinton Cemetery, fittingly overlooks a wide tract of beautiful country dear to Mr. Howard Smith's heart, and associated with many of his happy leisure hours.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD. CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

On Thursday and Friday, June 20 and 21, the proceedings in connection with the close of the summer term at Manchester

College, Oxford, took place. On Thursday papers and essays were read by the students. A sermon was preached by the Rev. C. E. Reed, of Ringwood, who has been spending a year at the College, and by Mr. Györfi and Mr. Holden, who are leaving the College on the completion of their course. An interesting address was delivered by Dr. Mellone, Principal of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester. Mr. Wicksteed also gave a short address, expressing his feeling of the unusually high standard reached by the students in their examination work. In the evening a soirée was held in library, and an address was given by Dr. Carpenter on the work of the College. The Trustees' meeting took place on Friday, at 12 o'clock, when, in the absence of the President, Sir John Brunner, the Rev. H. E. Dowson, chairman of committee, occupied the chair. A cordial vote of thanks to the Principal and members of the teaching staff was moved by Mr. Wicksteed and seconded by Mr. Monks. The Principal, in his reply, referred to the great ability of the present students and the very satisfactory diligence they had shown in their work. Amongst the juniors who received prizes, the work of Mr. Sydney Spencer and of Mr. C. P. Scott, son of the Rev. Lawrence Scott, was especially commended. The Rev. D. C. Simpson, lecturer in Old Testament and Hebrew, who has been acting as Dean over the Residence in the absence of Mr. Jacks in America, was thanked for his wise and careful management. The address of the Committee was adopted, officers were elected, and a vote of thanks to Mr. Dowson concluded the meeting.

In the afternoon the Valedictory Service was held in the chapel, at which a farewell was spoken by Dr. Carpenter to the three retiring students, Mr. Holden, Mr. Györfi, and the Rev. C. E. Reed. Mr. Dowson delivered the address welcoming them into the ministry.

Dr. Mellone's Address.

Dr. Mellone, in addressing the students, based his remarks mainly on a number of the essays on "Bergson's Theory of Matter and Spirit," which had been written for Mr. Jacks during the past session, and which he (the speaker) had recently read. After commenting on the high order of the work shown, and making some critical comments, Dr. Mellone indicated the general conclusion set forth with varying degrees of distinctness in the essays. For Bergson, Matter and Spirit differ not in kind but in degree. Bergson's detailed statements were, however, by no means free from difficulty or inconsistency. He sometimes suggests a difference in degree so great as to be equivalent to a difference in kind.

We must ask, for example, how does "matter" originate? Bergson discerns in the human mind a double movement towards a spontaneity and a freedom which involve the perpetual creation of what is new, and also towards a mechanism and automatism which involve a mere repetition of what is old. This contrast is applied to the interpretation of reality in general. The fundamental creative process involves an upward and a downward movement, the latter tending towards the increase of the merely "homogeneous" and mechanical aspects of what we call "matter." The downward movement arises from a relaxation (détente) of the creative process itself, producing within itself a form of existence which limits it, and which it has to overcome.

After commenting critically on Bergson's use of the terms "intellect" and "intuition," Dr. Mellone referred in conclusion to the great value of Bergson's philosophy to the religious thinker. He sets us free from every conception of a universe where we are "cribb'd, cabin'd, and confin'd." The human mind is attracted by all that gives the sense of "beyond and behind," all that continually opens up into fresh channels and reveals new possibilities, passing knowledge in the limited meaning of the word, broad and deep and high, ever expanding into new ranges of light. In this twentieth century, more than ever before, we need to have our human achievements touched with the sense of the Eternal.

The greatest danger facing all genuine religion arises from man's increasing discovery of the fact that he himself is creative. Things that used to be regarded as the sole prerogative of the Deity are now regarded as within the power of man. Excessive confidence may be shocked by terrible disasters; but the conviction remains and is true—in the end, no limit can be set to man's power of mastering and moulding Nature to his will. And this is in direct conflict with that sense of dependence and sense of need which are always vital elements in the spiritual life. Bergson has done and will do much to put this human sense of creative power into its true setting. In his thought, it is overshadowed with the power of the Highest and filled with the sense of the Eternal.

"There is in Wordsworth's country," says Dr. Horton, "a waterfall which is the type of Wordsworth himself. You approach it from a barren lake shore by a bare and treeless valley. When you are near, you see only a thin streak of water on the wall of hill. You might pass it, and go up the valley without further notice, if you had not expressly come to see it. But you enter the ravine—the fall is really withdrawn in a deep recess of the mountain side—and you find yourself in a rustic hall of musical sound. The narrow cleft, clothed with ferns and mountain ash, is lit with the white gleam, filled with the flying spray, and loud with the gentle roar of the fall, which plunges over the ledge and leaps a hundred feet to reach the stream." Thus do all the chambers of mystery and revelation lie beyond the beaten tracks of life—the tracks marked out by what Bergson calls "the intellect," and yet from the beaten tracks they may ever be approached; and then we hear the deep, penetrating music of those eternal and ever creative harmonies whereon the universe is built.

The Committee's Annual Address.

In the course of their address the Committee refer with much regret to the resignation of Sir Henry Jones, who has been Hibbert Lecturer in Metaphysics for the last six years at the College. He finds that his work at Glasgow claims him more and more, and for the present he has come to the conclusion that he must confine himself to that work. The Committee wish to express their warm appreciation of the inspiring influence and teaching of Sir Henry Jones. He has won the affection of students and staff, and his lectures have aroused great interest in Oxford and have drawn large audiences to the College. In his final course on "Spiritual Realism," he expounded his views of the fundamental conceptions of the philosophy of religion. The Committee hope that the materials accumulated in his Oxford teaching may be incorporated in some permanent form. The Committee are now in negotiation with Professor Royce, of Harvard, who, it is hoped, will be able to reside in Oxford and take up the work of Sir Henry Jones next session.

Mr. Speight, who was appointed Daniel Jones Fellow two years ago, has asked to be allowed to vacate his Fellowship, which was given for three years. He has been invited to become junior minister under the Rev. F. K. Freeston at Essex Church, Kensington, and wishes to accept the invitation. The Committee have agreed to his request, and they express to him their hearty good wishes for his success in the new sphere of labour to which he has been called; and they feel that under Mr. Freeston he will have the best possible introduction to the work of the Liberal Christian ministry. He has been an earnest student, and has helped Dr. Carpenter by reading the New Testament with the junior students of the College.

The Committee report with much satisfaction that through the kindness of the Arlosh Trustees and the generosity of private friends the long felt need of a college hall is now to be supplied. There is no room large enough at present in the College to accommodate all those who come to hear the distinguished lecturers whom the College rejoices to have from time to time within its walls. A college hall is only less necessary than a college chapel. The Committee and staff have long desired and hoped for it, and they are filled with joy at the near realisation of their hopes. Land and houses adjoining the College premises have been bought from Merton College at the cost of £12,500, and the Committee are now considering plans for a hall with Mr. Percy Worthington, son of the architect of the College, Mr. Thomas Worthington. The Arlosh Trustees have undertaken to pay the cost of erecting the hall and have contributed £5,600 towards the purchase of the land. The President, Sir John Brunner, has also given £5,000, and Mrs. George Holt and Miss Holt £1,000 each towards the purchase of the land. The College is most fortunate in possessing such generous friends, who once again have come forward in response to its need. The Committee express their heartfelt gratitude for these splendid gifts. The land bought will allow also for the erection of residences for the students and a house for the Principal or a tutor. The houses in Holywell at present used for this purpose are old and unsuitable. When the College has a hall and residence such as is proposed, the Committee feel that they will have buildings in all ways worthy of the traditions of the past, of the teaching staff that they possess, and of the great work which the College is called upon to do.

The Treasurer's accounts are satisfactory, and show a small credit balance, but the Committee, in face of their splendid equipment, have once again to confess, "the one great need of the College is for more students for the ministry."

It was announced at the Trustees' Meeting that the Rev. L. P. Jacks has received the honorary degree of D.D. from Harvard University. Mr. Jacks studied at Harvard as a Hibbert scholar 25 years ago, and it is accordingly specially fitting that he should now be enrolled among her distinguished graduates.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

SPEECH DAY.

SPEECH DAY at Willaston was held on Wednesday, June 19. The official proceedings of the day began at 2.15 p.m., when the visitors were received at the West Front by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A. (Chairman of the Governors), Mr. H. Lang Jones, M.A. (headmaster), and Mrs. Lang Jones. At 2.45 o'clock, the Speech Day Meeting was held in the gymnasium, and the events of the school year were then reviewed.

The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A., occupied the chair, and spoke of the aims and aspirations which characterised the school. Scholarship, he said, was a thing greatly to be desired, but there were other things required besides scholarship in the building up of character, which was their highest aim. And in no better way could those "other things" be provided than in such a school as Willaston. Character was not made so much in the class-room as on the playing-fields, where jealousy was unknown. The spirit of emulation which the various games aroused in the players acted and reacted on every single boy, and the healthy rivalry evoked brought out the very best that was in the boyish nature. He wanted Willaston to turn out, above all else, men of character. It was good—and he urged them—to win scholarships and exhibitions, and to produce men of trained intellect, but, more than all, he wanted Willaston to send out into the world men of character whose lives would be an honour to the school. He rejoiced that they had with them that day Mr. J. S. Phillpotts, M.A., formerly headmaster of the Bedford Grammar School. If any man ever made a school, Mr. Phillpotts had made Bedford School, and if he would only teach them how to make a second Bedford School at Willaston, they would all owe him a deep debt of gratitude.

Speech by Mr. J. S. Phillpott.

Mr. J. S. Phillpott, M.A., said that after his forty years in the teaching profession, he had special means of finding out something about any school in England or elsewhere. He had learned, on independent authority, much about Willaston School. He had heard that the school, though at present on a small scale, was first rate in quality. He had heard that the teaching was on the very best modern lines, and by good men, and that the headmaster was an inspiring force in the school. Finally, he had heard that the tone was excellent. He was also delighted to know that the religious instruction was in the hands of the headmaster, and was on simple lines. He had always endeavoured, so far as he could, to keep boys in the faith of their fathers; at the same time, he had tried to give them a wider outlook, because a narrow outlook only led to disputes, and that was not the way in which they should do their duty to the world. He understood that that was the spirit of the Willaston School, and a very good spirit it was, too. He was delighted to see, in the curriculum, that drawing and manual work were school subjects taken by all the boys. Handicrafts were most important, especially carpentry. On physiological grounds they were told by the best authorities that the nerve centres which controlled the muscles of the hands only developed until fifteen years of age, and, if they did not train those nerves to act on the hands before the age of fifteen was reached, their fingers became thumbs through life, and they were clumsy. Handicraft was also useful in making them handy in all their professions. It put them in touch with their environment, and helped in the practical work of life. If all boys in public schools were trained to use their hands, they would have more sympathy with the working men, and would have a better idea of the dignity of labour. It was important to remember this, on account of the chasm which was opening between the professional classes and the employers on the one side, and the working man who worked with his hands on the other. The real menace to our country, he said, was a moral menace. The people were lost in money-making, luxury, and games, and the verdict of history had ever been that the people who would not sow were those who went down before nations more virile. He rejoiced, therefore, that at that school the training which the boys received was such as would equip them in the very best sense for their duty in life.

Headmaster's Report.

Mr. H. Lang Jones, M.A. (headmaster), in his report, said the past year, compared with the preceding twelve months, was uneventful, but there was not a little on which they could look back with satisfaction to justify the claim that they had had a successful year. Two boys entered for matriculation last summer—one at Manchester and the other at London. A well-deserved success was scored in the latter by B. K. Hunter, but confident expectations in the other case were not realised. E. Taylor passed the Oxford and Cambridge Joint Board's examination. For the lower certificate seven boys were entered, and five passed. D. P. Hirsch and J. A. Ruck passed in eight subjects (the minimum was five), S. H. Brooks and F. M. Coventry in seven each, and T. M. Fripp in six. The examiners' report was, in the main, satisfactory, and particularly gratifying was the testimony borne by no less a person than Professor Verity, of Cambridge, to the excellence of the work done in English literature. "The boys," he said, "appeared not only to understand English books they had read, but to appreciate them"—which examinations usually did their best to prevent. Having given an exhaustive report on the various branches of the school work, Mr. Jones said the conclusion to be formed was that they had had a good year, and that the school was in a flourishing condition. That it was so was due, first and foremost, to the zeal of those it was his good fortune to possess as colleagues. The late Mr. Philip Barker's bequest was that they should have religious instruction of an unsectarian character. They were trying to produce, as all schools were trying to produce, a complete schoolboy, who would grow into a complete English gentleman. This was not a faddists' school. They tried to keep abreast of the times when the times were worth keeping abreast of. They did not compete with other schools. The school was founded to meet a definite need, yet people did not seem to take advantage of it. He asked the company present to use their power and influence to bring people to visit the school, because if parents with male children ever visited it, they almost invariably sent their children there. They did not compete with other schools to their detriment and Willaston's advantage. He only wanted fifteen to twenty towns to send half-a-dozen boys each. The school was not a financial venture; if it had been, it would have been closed long ago.

Referring, in conclusion, to the boys, Mr. Jones said:—"I have said that the school may claim to be in a flourishing condition. I hope, with hope verging on belief, that it is in a healthy condition, too. If this is so, it is due, in the last resort, to the boys themselves. The spirit of cheerful, unswerving attention to duty which prevails among the monitors and pro-monitors must command the highest admiration. . . . The senior boys—and by these I mean not only those in authority, but also those next them on the roll, on whom the shadow of the prophet's mantle already rests—are, as it were, the hinges of the school, that link the swinging portal with its Janus face to the permanence of authority and right. If the hinges are rusty the door will creak and not answer readily to the touch; if the hinges are weak the door may fall. The burden of responsibility is heavy, even for the least of us; ten times as heavy for each one as it would be if he were in a school ten times our size; but it can and must be borne, and our senior boys know that their first duty is to see that every member of the school, when he enters it, must be made to realise that he is expected to be 'keen and clean—clean and keen' (the one involves the other), and must be made to feel that if he is not prepared thus to live up to the spirit of the school he is not fit to wear the school colours, nor, when he leaves, write after his name the letters 'O.W.' which should be a patent of nobility. The burden, I say, is heavy, and the result, numerically, may be small. But we do not regret our efforts; rather do we feel humbly grateful that we have been permitted to do so much. We may not pay so much attention as some schools do to preparing boys for the possible contingency of having to die for their country; but when our Old Boys come down to see us, as they often do, we dare to believe that we teach them to live for their country. And that carries with it the readiness to die also if the call should come."

An excellent programme of music and recitations was then rendered by the boys, and the visitors were afterwards entertained to tea in the dining hall.

NON-SUBSCRIBING PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF IRELAND.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland was held in the First Presbyterian Church, Rosemary-st., Belfast, on Wednesday, June 19, the Rev. T. Dunkerley (Moderator) presiding. In the course of his address, the Moderator referred to the Rev. William Napier and the Rev. W. S. Smith, two of their oldest and most highly respected ministers who had died during the year. The great work of the year had been that of raising a Sustentation Fund, and they had been fortunate in the Convener of the Committee who had charge of that fund. They had good reason to congratulate themselves on the measure of success that had been attained in the scheme, but the work was still incomplete, the goal was not yet reached, and in the year before them they must continue their efforts in that matter. Concluding, Mr. Dunkerley moved that the Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A., be the Moderator for the ensuing year.

Mr. Gordon having declined nomination on the ground that circumstances would render it impossible for him to discharge the duties adequately, Mr. Dunkerley was reappointed. Subsequently, the Rev. G. J. Slipper was elected clerk in succession to the Rev. J. J. Magill, who had resigned owing to ill-health, and the Rev. J. A. Kelly was reappointed treasurer.

The report of the Sustentation Fund Committee contained the following:—"At the beginning of May of this year about 600 members of the Church had either promised or given donations amounting in all to £7,000. A considerable sum still remains to be raised, however. The Committee appeal to all the members of the Church who have not yet contributed to the fund to do so as generously as possible. About £5,000 of the above sum has been received by the Treasurer (Mr. J. R. Rankin), who has handed this amount to the trustees for investment. The trustees report that £3,500 has been invested, and arrangements will be made for the investment of the remainder as soon as possible. The committee believe they will be able to meet all the initial expenses connected with the fund, including the collecting of the money and the legal expenses of the trust deed, out of the income from the capital sum before the scheme is brought into operation in 1914, and they hope therefore to be able to apply practically the whole of the income of 1914 to the purposes of the fund. No portion of the capital sum will be used for expenses. The committee feel they would like to put on record their appreciation of the services of Dr. John Campbell, Mr. J. M. Andrews, Mr. Harold Thomas, Mr. W. J. Baxter, and Mr. Eustace Gordon, all of whom gave their assistance in advocating the need and advantages of the fund, and to whose labours much of the success of the fund is due. They also record their appreciation of the labours of local secretaries and committees."

The Rev. Joseph Worthington, in moving the adoption of the report, said the fund stood to-day at £8,000. Nearly one thousand members of the Church had promised or given a donation, and they had secured under the scheme annual contributions from congregations equivalent to a capital sum of £5,000, so that as a result of their first year's effort they had succeeded in raising practically £13,000 for the benefit of their ministers and churches generally. He thought, however, their generosity was not yet expended, and that many of their people would see their way to contribute. If they kept up their enthusiasm as they had been doing next year they would be able to record a very substantial increase to the fund.

Mr. J. M. Andrews, in seconding, said the success had been due to the united effort of the people belonging to their Church. Independent of the good resulting from the fund itself it was an important element that their churches had been brought together in such a satisfactory way. He thought in everything England was anxious to help them, and if an application was made by influential men, no doubt many generous and able Unitarians would be glad to come to the assistance of their poorer brethren in Ireland.

In the evening the annual dinner was held. The Moderator again presided, and there was a good attendance.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

THE INTER-DENOMINATIONAL CONFERENCE.

The Conference at Swanwick, in which all the religious bodies who have social service unions are taking part, has more than justified the expectations of those responsible for its inception. During the progress of the Summer School, arranged by the National Conference Union for Social Service at Manchester College, Oxford, in the summer of 1909, it was felt that inasmuch as the other social service unions had most cordially responded to the invitation to send official representatives, it ought to be possible to carry conference, and even co-operation, farther. When a formal attempt was made to strengthen and continue this impulse in the right direction, it soon became clear that social service offered one way in which the churches, unfortunately so sadly divided, might reinforce each other in a common war against evil. It is the barest justice to say that the Bishop of Oxford, President of the Conference, which has now been securely established, though avowing himself a strong Denominationalist, has been the cement that has bound together the participating unions. In these words he has explained the aim which he, and those whose privilege it has been to co-operate with him, have steadily kept in view. "If we must organise ourselves apart in social unions, as, unhappily, our communions are separated, and we cannot at present bridge the gulfs, yet when we come to the study of social questions, and to action for social reform, we can come together. If we are to set our unions year by year to study some department of the social problem in theory and in fact, we can choose the same subject, and in part come together to study it, and we can combine our forces to make our weight felt for practical reform in the municipal or political sphere."

* * *

The fact that the members of the Swanwick School are able to meet together in one place, to dwell under one roof, to have common meals, and abundant opportunities for recreation and exchange of views between the more formal parts of the programme, has had a wonderful effect in increasing the general interest of the proceedings, and in showing all those who took part how great is the measure of their agreements and how small and petty their differences. Moreover, the intense interest of the audience reacted on the speakers, all of whom were at their best. A fuller impression of the meetings by one who has attended all of them will appear in our columns next week.

* * *

An interesting visit will be paid to this country from July 8 to 17 by a band of American social students, under the leadership of Dr. Edward Ewing Pratt, of New York City. The aim of the tour is to provide a first hand laboratory study of social problems in Europe, with European methods of endeavouring to solve them. London and the great industrial centres of England, with Stratford, Oxford, and Letchworth thrown in, Amsterdam, Brussels, Antwerp, Düsseldorf, Essen, Dresden, Munich, Ulm, Berlin, Frankfurt, Zürich and Paris, are on the itinerary which has been prepared by an advisory board consisting of representatives of universities and social institutions from New York to Los Angeles. Though neither Mr. Roosevelt nor Mr. Taft has heard of it, there is at present in the States an immense and growing number of disinterested students of social questions, who have discovered that, broadly speaking, the problems which they have to face are fundamentally the same as those in the industrial countries of Europe. Notwithstanding the colossal aggregate wealth of the States, there as here an enormous proportion of manual workers are not in receipt of a living wage, and though, as with us, the rate of wages has on the whole tended to increase during the last four or five decades, in recent years, where there has been an increase, it has been more than counterbalanced by the increased cost of living.

APPEALS.

Mr. R. Asquith Wooding, Treasurer of the London Sunday School Society Country Holiday Fund, writes from 25, Engayne-gardens, Upminster:—"I am venturing to call the attention of your readers to our country holiday movement in the hope that some of them will be kind enough to send me a contribution towards this year's fund. Fully £135 will be required this summer, of which over £25 have still to be collected. The fund will be distributed about the middle of July, and any help which your readers can give before then will be very welcome. We expect to be asked to assist at least 400 scholars from the London schools this summer towards a short country holiday, and great indeed will be the disappointment if the fund is insufficient to meet all the calls upon it."

The Rev. Gordon Cooper writes from The Parsonage, Mansford-street, Bethnal Green, E.:—"Once more I ask you to allow me to appeal to your readers for subscriptions to our Country Holiday, Excursion, and Convalescent Fund at the Mansford-street Mission. I have already made arrangements to send a number of people away this summer, and I am relying again on the generosity of the friends of the Mission to help me raise the necessary funds."

The Rev. F. Summers writes from Dingley-place (lately called George's-row) Domestic Mission, St. Luke's, E.C.:—"Will you allow me to appeal to friends for help for our Sunday-school excursion to Theydon Bois, of which we are in need? Donations may be sent to me at 4, Durley-road, Stamford Hill, N."

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

THE annual public examination of the students of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, will be held on Tuesday, July 2, commencing at 10.30 a.m. At 5 o'clock the Visitor's address will be delivered by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, whose subject will be, "Student Ministers," and the valedictory service will be held at 7.30 on the same day in Cross-street Chapel, and conducted by the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas.

On Wednesday evening, July 10, there will be a welcome home meeting to the Rev. W. Wooding and Mrs. Wooding at Essex Hall, when Mr. and Mrs. Wooding will speak of their recent visit to Australia and New Zealand. Mr. Charles Hawksley, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, will occupy the chair. Friends are invited, and tickets are not required. The meeting will begin at 8 p.m.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Balle, Co. Down.—On June 23 services were conducted by the Rev. H. McLachlan, M.A., B.D., of Manchester Home Missionary College, and sermons appropriate to the re-opening of the renovated church were preached to large congregations. The building has been thoroughly overhauled, new high-pressure heating apparatus set up, and a fine organ built in solid oak by Dalladay, of Hastings, has been erected. The old graveyard has been mapped and numbered, and gravelled paths laid out. The tinted glass windows, set in Castlewella granite jambs, are especially noticeable for their reposeful simplicity and strength. The grand old timbered roof, which was raised at the first renovation of the church, in 1773, is unique, and showed out beautifully in the favourable light of the summer day. The old rough-hewn flagged floor has been replaced by a patterned maple wood block floor, which adds to the quiet neatness aimed at by the promoters of the scheme. The musical part of the service was rendered by an augmented choir of voluntary helpers. The beautiful instrument was ably handled by the honorary organist, Mr. R. McCullen, C.E. There was a generous response to the appeal for funds, nearly a hundred pounds being realised by the services. An outstanding feature of the day was the fact that two neighbouring rectors of the Episcopal Church held no services, thus leaving their people free to attend these services at Balle Unitarian Church. The Rev. J. H. Bibby returned thanks at both services for the many gracious acts of a memorable day. The work, which gives universal satisfaction, was wholly carried out by members of families belonging to Balle Non-subscribing Church. The new manse, which is still waiting completion, was much admired, within and without, by the numerous visitors of the day.

Bolton: Bank-street Sunday School.—The sermons on Sunday, June 23, morning and evening, were preached by the Rev. E. Savell Hicks, M.A., formerly an assistant minister at Bank-street, and now of Stephen's Green, Dublin. In the afternoon, the Rev. W. J. Cleal, of Claremont Baptist Chapel, addressed the scholars. The attendance was well up to the average, the evening service being very well attended. The collections amounted to £81. It is expected that further donations may bring it up to £100. The singing of the young scholars was, as usual, a feature of the morning and evening services.

Dunedin: New Zealand.—The Rev. W. F. Kennedy reports:—"I began a series of Sunday evening lectures here yesterday evening, May 12, my first subject being 'Liberal Religious Ideas of To-day.' The attendance was close on eighty, most of those present being thoughtful inquirers. Much interest was taken in the proceedings, and many promised to come again. The way has been prepared somewhat by the visits of Mr. Hargrove and Dr. Tudor-Jones, and there is some desire for the establishment of a church. We hope for good results, and will meantime labour on. The community is very Scotch, and the majority of the people are staunch to their own kirk. Outsiders, of course, there are in good numbers, and we want to get these with us."

Exeter.—The annual meeting of the Exeter Assembly was held on June 19 at George's Chapel. The Rev. S. W. Wright, of Devonport, was elected Moderator for the year. In the evening the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor gave a lecture on "Robert Browning."

London Lay Preachers' Union.—At their meeting on June 24 the Union had the pleasure of the company of the Rev. T. D. Bacon, of Salem, U.S.A., who has for some weeks been taking the services at Highgate. After conducting a short devotional service, Mr. Bacon gave a most interesting and stimulating address on a question which had on a previous occasion been discussed at the Union, viz., "The Aim of Preaching." He prefaced his remarks by saying that, to the best of his knowledge, lay preachers were absolutely unknown among the American Unitarian churches; and it appeared, from questions which were subsequently put to and answered by Mr. Bacon, that if a church cannot afford the full services of a minister it is practically compelled to "close down." The proper function of the church, Mr. Bacon continued, was to be "a power house of the Spirit"; and, of course, it was not sufficient to develop the power simply. The problem was to connect the power with the machinery which would make it practically effective; and thus it was that the greatest preachers were not necessarily the greatest logicians or the most learned theologians, but rather those who, by the force of their convictions, were best able to awaken in men their "sixth sense"—the sense of life in the invisible or spiritual world. We must beware of merely negative preaching. It was not our business to start the day with the intention of "persuading men to disbelieve as many things as possible before breakfast"; but to make it clear to those to whom many of the old dogmas were impossible, that the religious life did not consist in such dogmas. We are glad that we can worship without superstition, although it is a fact that even these served to give to many a sense of the Presence of God. Religion was never opposed to reason, but we must never forget that it transcended reason. The Secretary of the Union (Mr. W. T. Colyer) briefly expressed the members' sense of obligation to Mr. Bacon for his kindness in coming to speak to them during his holiday in England; and the feeling which Mr. Bacon's presence gave them of union with the fellow-workers across the Atlantic, whom they were not likely ever to see. A general discussion followed, in which Miss Amy Withall, the Revs. W. H. Drummond and J. Arthur Pearson, and Messrs. A. D. Beckwith and J. Kinsman took part.

Manchester: Oldham-road.—On Saturday, June 22, the passing of the old school building in Varley-street (which has been sold to an adjacent business firm) was marked by a well-attended gathering of old and present-day scholars. The building, which served as a school-chapel prior to the erection of the church on Oldham-road, was opened in 1863. A new building, on land adjoining the church, is to replace it. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. E. Jones (senior superintendent), who was supported on the platform by Messrs. W. Burton, H. Eardley, H. Fairbrother, J. C. Horsfield, and J. H. Swann. Short speeches were made by the Chairman, and Messrs. Burton, Eardley, and Swann. The speakers generally took a hopeful view of the school's future. Now that the project of a school building close to the church, so long entertained, is to be realised, it is satisfactory to note the confident spirit of those who are carrying on the work of the school.

Sheffield: Attercliffe.—The Sunday-school anniversary took place on Sunday last, June 23, the services being conducted by the minister in charge, the Rev. J. Walter Cock. The children had been trained by Mr. H. Bailey. A small string band added very much to the effect. On the Monday evening the prizes gained in 1911 were distributed by Mrs. Sinclair to the winning scholars. The meeting was presided over by Mr. Sinclair, and short speeches were given by Mrs. Bailey, the Revs. A. H. Dolphin, J. W. Cock, Mr. H. Fishburn, and also the chairman. Mr. Vickers, the secretary of the school, read a very favourable report of the work done, which showed a good increase in scholars and teachers.

Tunbridge Wells.—We have received the following resolution for publication:—"That the majority of the Unitarian community at Tunbridge Wells, worshipping at the Dudley Institute, desire to express their hearty approval of the Bill now before Parliament for the Disestablishment and partial Disendowment of the Established Church in Wales. They approve the principle of the Bill as essentially just, its provisions as liberal, and the measure itself as long overdue, in view of the facts of Welsh religious history, and of the strongly-expressed desire of the great majority of the Welsh people. They believe that the comparative absence of demonstration in its favour amongst the Nonconformists of England does not result from indifference, but is due to a widespread feeling of confidence in the intention and ability of the Government to carry the Bill into law, and to a ripened conviction that, far from any damage resulting to the interests of religion, nothing but good can be the issue of a measure so reasonable and right, and so ardently desired by a succession of men whose best energies have been given to the establishment of religious liberty and national well-being."

West Bromwich: Lodge-road Unitarian Church.—On Tuesday, June 25, a presentation was made at Lodge-road Church to Mr. John Jackson, who is leaving the town, by the minister, the Rev. F. A. Homer. In handing the gift to Mr. Jackson, Mr. Homer expressed the great regret of his friends and fellow-worshippers that they were about to lose him, and referred to his long and honourable connection with the congregation. Messrs. J. J. Bowater, Jas. Padley, H. Reeves, R. J. Powis and others also spoke, and Mr. Jackson earnestly thanked the members of the congregation for this token of their goodwill.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

DR. HUNTER ON THE TREATMENT OF ANIMALS.

A correspondent in the Humanitarian gives an account of a humanitarian sermon which was preached by Dr. John Hunter a few weeks ago at Trinity Church, Glasgow, to a large congregation. The preacher dealt at some length with the over-emphasis of the idea of Nature's mercilessness which is fostered by scientists and hyper-sensitive writers, who largely ignore the joyful element in animal life. Passing on to man's dealings with animals, Dr. Hunter quoted Burns' "To a Mouse," as indicating the ideal "dominion" of the strong over the weak. The pathetic confidence of certain animals in man is akin to that passionate faith in his Creator that made a man cry: "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him." The suffering inflicted on animals in man's interests, and the way in which they are sacrificed for his use, make it hard not to believe that compensation awaits them in another life. Among the worst wrongs perpetrated by the human on the sub-human races are the barbarities of "sport" and the massacre of birds for millinery. For the practices of the vivisector, even were it proved that knowledge can be gained in this way, we may pay too dearly in the inevitable coarsening and degradation of human nature.

A GARDEN CITY SUMMER SCHOOL.

Letchworth (Garden City) is to have a Summer School this year to discuss the deeper aspects of citizenship. It will be held at Letchworth from Friday, July 26, to August 6 inclusive, and the promoters claim that while the subjects that are to be dealt with are very diverse, there is a unity underlying the whole course, the chief object being to bring before the men and women of the present day a practical ideal of citizenship viewed from as many aspects as possible in the hope of meeting with a general response. The President is Mr. Ebenezer Howard, and among the items on the very varied and interesting programme as at present arranged are the following:—Mr. Raymond Unwin, "Housing"; Miss Margaret Macmillan, "School Clinics"; Dr. Saleeby, "Eugenics"; Mr. F. E. Benson, "Dramatic Art"; Mrs. Despard, "The Child"; Mrs. Annie Besant, "The Citizenship of the Coloured Races throughout the Empire"; Mr. Norman Angell, "International Relations"; Mr. G. André, "Restoration of the Criminal"; and Lord Robert Cecil, "Co-Partnership." Some interesting excursions are being arranged, and there will be many opportunities for social intercourse and entertainment. This summer school promises to be one of the most important ever held in this country, and should draw a large number of people to the Garden City.

BEQUEST TO HARVARD.

We learn from the Times that the splendid collection of books inherited by Harvard University as the result of the Titanic disaster, which numbered their owner, Mr. H. Elkins Widener, among its victims, is said to be in some respects unrivalled in America. It includes some fine copies of the four folio Shakespeares, and many "association books," as they are called in the United States—that is, books which have the marks of former owners, such as the copy of the Countess of Pembroke's "Arcadia," which was the Countess's own copy. The Dickens collection is a large one, and the Rossetti and Shelley books and tracts include many of exceptional rarity and fine condition. The Stevenson section is practically complete, and numbers the MS. of his autobiography on 22 pages, written at San Francisco in January, 1880. Both William Blake and Coleridge are well represented, the former by his own copy of Walpole's "Noble Authors," with his autograph and an original drawing by him for "America: A Prophecy," and by two original drawings for "The Grave." The Coleridge items include the rare "Lay Sermon," 1817, with a long article in his autograph written in the copy. Boswell's "Life of Johnson" is the first edition with an autograph presentation note, "J. Reynolds from the Author." The Brontë collection is also extensive, and comprises a copy of the "Poems" by the three sisters, which was withdrawn from circulation after a few examples had been issued.

AN ANECDOTE OF H. M. STANLEY.

Sir Henry Lucy, who is continuing his reminiscences in the Cornhill Magazine, tells us that although Stanley, the explorer, was disappointed in his Parliamentary career, for which he was scarcely fitted, he was a man who, outside of Parliament, and when deeply moved by his subject, "could rise to heights of simple eloquence." A remarkable speech which he made at a banquet given in his honour by the Turners' Company is recalled.

"He told me a curious thing with respect to this speech. He had been hard at work revising the proofs of his book, and with other engagements was so beset that he was not able to carry out the custom adopted by him since his return of preparing his speech in manuscript. He had not a scrap of notes with him, nor had even thought of what he should say. He anticipated a breakdown, not being accustomed to extemporaneous speech, and through the dinner somewhat gloomily faced the prospect. Seeing the people all about him bountifully feeding, there came back to his mind an episode of his journey when he and his men had not for six weeks eaten a bit of meat, nor for ten days seen a banana or a handful of grain, and for whom (130 of them) he made broth with a pound of butter and a tin of condensed milk. Then he thought he would just tell this simple story, and was surprised to find how profoundly it interested the company. At first he spoke in low voice with hesitating manner. As he went on before the intently listening audience he became master of himself and spoke splendidly."

A VEGETARIAN SUMMER SCHOOL.

Of summer schools there is apparently no end, but it is not to be expected that the food reformer will consent to be left out altogether when so many pleasant gatherings are being planned for mutual enjoyment and edification. The Vegetarian Society is holding its summer school this year at Arnside, near Carnforth, a quiet and pretty village in one of the most bracing parts of the North of England within easy reach of Grange-over-Sands, Cartmel, with its fine Priory Church, Levens Hall, Furness Abbey, and Kendal, which is twelve miles distant and connected with Arnside by the railway. "Inglemere," where the students will reside, is a girls' school splendidly equipped for comfort and health, surrounded by grounds covering 11 acres and commanding fine views of sea and mountain. Non-vegetarians are heartily welcomed, and it may be added for their benefit that they need not anticipate much preaching on vegetarianism. The food supplied is considered the best arguments in its favour, and for the rest the summer school is intended to be a place where a pleasant holiday may be spent, while a knowledge of facts relating to hygiene and humanitarian principles may be acquired at the same time. All details can be obtained from the Vegetarian Society, 257, Deansgate, Manchester.

UNIVERSITY HALL,

Gordon Square, W.C.

(Between Russell Square and Euston Square.)

Services at 11.15 and 7.

PREACHERS (both Services):

June 30.—Rev. RUDOLPH DAVIS, B.A. (of Gloucester).

July 7.—Rev. Dr. ALEXANDER CARPENTER (Principal of Manchester College, Oxford).

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
Miss O. . . . HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

NOW READY FOR JULY.

The Sunday School Quarterly.

Edited by J. ARTHUR PEARSON.

CONTENTS.

The Power of Suggestion. Edgar Thackray, [M.A., Ph.D.]

A Bygone Village. Emma C. Drummond.

A School in Madagascar. T. F. M. Brockway.

Reading for Children. Charles Roper, B.A.

Gotama Buddha. George Burnett Stallworthy.

The Song of the Sea. Manley B. Townsend.

The Theory and Practice of Sunday School Teaching

—II. A. Stephen Noel.

Man or Priest. Rupert Holloway.

The Use of the Bible. Florence Mawson, B.A.

Notes for Teachers.—XVI.—XXX.

Arthur Brooke.

Bertram Lister, M.A.

T. M. Falconer, B.Litt.

F. J. Gould.

H. V. Mills.

Heroes of Faith.—Joseph Priestley. Albert Thornhill.

Training. Alma Attwell. [M.A.]

Baptismal Hymn. R. Nicol Cross, M.A.

By the Way.—Teachers' Reference Library.

Threepence net, Postage 1d.

London:

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION,
Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by
Christian Scientists.

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

Board and Residence, &c.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—"Crantock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCs.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z., INQUIRER OFFICE, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, AYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

SURREY.—Home offered Child or Invalid Lady; experienced care, bracing air, good garden. Medical and other recommendations.—M. B., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex street, Strand, W.C.

LISCARD, near New Brighton.—To be Let, furnished, for six or twelve months, comfortable, well-furnished house; good garden. Three minutes from shops and Unitarian church. Penny train to beach and all ferries for Liverpool.—F. R., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming Irish Linen Summer Costume Fabric, "Flaxzella," Washable. Wide range of fascinating designs. Beautiful shades, durable, looks smart for years.—Write, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

REMNANT BARGAIN!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen. Big pieces suitable for making Teacloths, Traycloths, D'oyleys, &c., 2s. 6d. per bundle. Postage 4d. Irish Linen Catalogue FREE.—Write, HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH.—We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing.—WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, June 29, 1912.

*. Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

Library of the
PACIFIC UNITARIAN SCHOOL
FOR THE MINISTRY
Berkeley, California

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3654.
NEW SERIES, No. 758.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 6, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.]

A UNIQUE SUMMER HOLIDAY AT St. Michael's Hall, Hove.

A Mansion approached by Lodge entrance and carriage drive through avenue of trees. House and lawns entirely secluded in beautiful wooded grounds near sea.

Five Tennis Courts for use of guests. Bathing, Fishing, Boating unequalled. Easy access to lovely Sussex Downs, Golf Links, etc.

Lectures, Concerts, Excursions.

Prospectus from SECRETARY, Benares House, Food Reform Boarding Establishment, Norfolk Terrace, Brighton.

WHITE STAR TOURING CLUB.

(President, Mr. William Carter, Parkstone.)

July 5. Montreux, 16 days, £8.
Hon. Conductor, Councillor ROYSTON.

August 2. Lugano, 16 days, £9 9s.
Hon. Conductor, Mr. W. CARTER.

August 2. Montreux, 16 days, £8.
Hon. Conductor, Rev. T. P. SPEDDING.

August 30. Lugano, 16 days, £9 9s.
Hon. Conductor, Councillor ROYSTON.

August 30. Interlaken, 16 days, £8 12s. 6d.
Hon. Conductor, Rev. E. B. MORRISON.
NO EXTRAS.

The above prices include full programme of Excursions.

Particulars from the White Star Touring Club, 27, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

SWISS-TYROL-ITALIAN borders.—Mr. LUMMIS' party will leave on August 1 (fortnight, 14 guineas; month, 19 guineas, cheap tickets to the Grisons also arranged).—15, Green-street, Cambridge.

Southern Unitarian Association.

ANNUAL MEETING

AT RINGWOOD,

WEDNESDAY, JULY 17.

BUSINESS MEETING, 2.30. SERVICE AT 6.

Preacher: Rev. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D.

LUNCH at 1 (1s. 6d.). Tea, 4.45 (6d.).

BRIXTON UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

THE Rev. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D., will preach at the Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, Brixton, on the evening of Sunday, July 14, 1912. Service at 7 p.m.

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.

Second-Hand at Half Prices.

Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.

BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.

W. & G. FOYLE, 135, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

SUMMER SCHOOL FOR RELIGIOUS STUDY

AT Woodbrooke, Selly Oak,
near BIRMINGHAM,

AUGUST 17—26, 1912.

Under the care of the Woodbrooke Extension Committee of the Society of Friends.

General Subject:

"Christian Faith and Modern Thought."

Devotional Meeting and Lectures each morning; afternoon Recreation; informal Conferences and Discussions. Attendance limited to 100.

Lecturers:

Miss M. CARTA STURGE ("Philosophy and Religion"); LEONARD DONCASTER, M.A. ("Science and Religion"); HERBERT G. WOOD, M.A. ("The Jesus of History"); G. CURRIE MARTIN, M.A. ("Influence of Jesus on Human History"); EDWARD GRUBB, M.A. ("Prayer, Miracle, and the Reign of Law").

Inclusive charge (for lodging, board, and lectures) £1 17s. 6d., with reduction of 2s. 6d. if a bedroom is shared. Apply, enclosing 10s. deposit, to

WILFRED E. LITTLEBOY,
44, Waterloo Street, Birmingham.

JOHN POUNDS HOUSE, SOUTH-SEA.—The Annual Public Meeting and Pound Day to be held at the Home on Saturday, July 13, at 3.30. Subscribers and friends warmly welcomed, also POUNDS of useful things.

FRIAR GATE CHAPEL, DERBY.

The Officers announce that the re-decoration of the Chapel and restoration of the Organ have been completed, and desire to thank all subscribers for their support.

PEARL ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000

Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000

Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHRUBSALL, } Directors.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:
REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.

Headmaster:

H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.

Next Entrance Examination on July 19.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.—An Open Scholarship of £20 is offered for Competition. Candidates must be under 14 years of age. The Examination for this Scholarship will be held on July 19.—Apply to the HEAD MASTER.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

CHANNING HOUSE SCHOOL, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. A Scholarship, value £15 per annum for two years, will be awarded on the result of an examination to be held at the School on Wednesday, July 24. Candidates must be under 14 on the day of examination. For particulars apply to the Head Mistress.

TAN - Y - BRYN, LLANDUDNO.— PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

Sound Education under best conditions of health.

For Prospectus and information apply to
C. J. MONTGOMERY, M.A., Head Master.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS.—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad.

Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon). Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

BAD KREUZNACH, near Wiesbaden. HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.—Domestic and scientific training. Special attention to English pupils. Excellent pronunciation. North German Head Mistresses. Highest references from pupils' parents. For prospectus and details apply to the Principals, T. KEMPER and M. A. KUNTZE, 9, Königstrasse, Bad Kreuznach. Winter term commences September 15. School fees, £60 per annum. References kindly permitted: Mrs. BLAKE, "Yeabridge," South Petherton, Somerset; Mr. W. F. PRICE, "Overdale," Letchworth-road, Leicester.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, July 7.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. A. C. HOLDEN, M.A.
 Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 and 7, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.
 Child's Hill, All Souls', Weech-road, Finchley-road, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. E. DAPLYN.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D., Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, 11, Communion, Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON; 7, Rev. R. K. DAVIS, B.A.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11 and 6.30, Mr. C. A. WING.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11 and 6.30.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11 and 7, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, M.A.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. H. GOW, B.A.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. T. DAVENPORT BACON, of Salem, U.S.A.
 Ilford, High-road, 11 and 7, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11, Rev. J. A. PEARSON; 7, Rev. Dr. TUDOR JONES.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., Anniversary Services, 11, Rev. Dr. TUDOR JONES; 6.30, Mr. ION PRITCHARD.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 and 7, Rev. C. ROFER, B.A.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. GORDON COOPER.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. W. ROBSON, B.D.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. F. W. G. FOAT, Litt.D., M.A.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLOR.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Rev. JOHN ELLIS; 6.30, Mr. J. KINSMAN.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C., 11.15 and 7, Rev. Dr. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. W. G. TARRANT.
 Wimbledon, 27B, Merton-road, 7, Mr. WM. LEE, B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11, Rev. JOSEPH WILSON.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. FRED. BROCKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30. Supply.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. Wood.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. W. AUSTIN, M.A.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. BODELL SMITH.
 BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45, Scholars' Service; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.
 BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. V. D. DAVIS.
 BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, M.A.
 BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BECKH.
 (DEAN ROW, 10.45, and
 STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS.
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. H. PICKERING.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS and Rev. H. W. KING.
 HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. E. S. LEMARE, B.A.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. I. FRIPP.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. C. CRADDOCK.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. D. ROBERTS.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. STANLEY RUSSELL.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. ALEXANDER FARQUHARSON.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. HENRY DAWTREY, B.A.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, Rusholme, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. WHITAKER.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCAID, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. OTTWEIL BINNS.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. Dr. ODGERS.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVERS.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. W. COCK.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Unity Hall Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. B. STALLWORTHY.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hoac-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFORTH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

PULPIT SUPPLY.

Mr. LUMMIS has a few dates vacant in the Long Vacation.

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY."—Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda. Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 1d.—1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to EDITOR, 36, Burlington-road, South Shore, Blackpool.

BIRTH.

ODGERS.—On June 22, at 17, Elsee-road, Rugby, the wife of F. W. Odgers, M.A., of a daughter.

MARRIAGES.

HICKS—KELLY.—On June 26, at Rademon Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church, by the father of the bride, assisted by the Rev. Alex. Gordon, M.A., Henry Charles, youngest son of the late Henry Hicks, of Erindale, Belfast, to Mabel Hester Malet, only daughter of the Rev. J. A. Kelly, Minister of the First Presbyterian Church, Dunmurry, Belfast, and grand-daughter of the late Rev. J. A. Malet, D.D., Senior Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin.

MELLOR—THOMSON.—On July 4, at the Church of Our Father, Rotherham, by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., D.Litt., and the Rev. W. Mellor, father of the bridegroom, Dr. Stanley A. Mellor, son of Rev. W. and Mrs. Mellor, of Huddersfield, to Anita, eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Thomson, Stoneleigh, Rotherham. At home, 31, Wilson Patten-street, Warrington, September 4 and 5.

DEATH.

HARRISON.—On June 27, at Tulse Hill, S.W., in his 71st year, John Thomas, second son of the late Rev. Dr. Harrison, of Chowbent and Brixton.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

ADVERTISER seeks post as Nurse-Companion or Companion-Help. Experienced in nursing, domesticated; Unitarian references.—BISS, 5, Darlington-road, Bath.

YOUNG GERMAN LADY (speaks English), trained nurse, desires situation with delicate lady, or one child. Would travel; small salary.—Mrs. ROGERS, John Pounds House, Southsea.

WANTED.—As Lady Housekeeper to Gentleman, or Companion-Housekeeper to Lady. Thoroughly capable manager, domesticated. Excellent needlewoman, knowledge of nursing. Highest references.—Miss FOUNTAINE, 5, South Park-rd., Wimbledon, S.W.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	451	Oxford Summer School for Sunday School Teachers	455	MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES :—
THE CHURCH AND HUMAN LIFE	452	FOR THE CHILDREN	456	Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire	459
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS :—		MEMORIAL NOTICE :—		Presbyterian College, Carmarthen	461
The Inter-Denominational Conference of Social Service Unions	454	Mr. John Harrison	457	NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	461
				NOTES AND JOTTINGS	462

 * All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE striking address which Lord Morley delivered to members of the University of Manchester last week was a powerful plea for thoughtfulness, sound historical judgment, and the accurate use of language over the whole field of political and social activity. He laid stress upon the importance for practical affairs of speculations as to the State and its various relations to the individual, and suggested that the University ought to have a chair of politics, "a chair that would set an example of accurate use of terms in great national affairs and relations; of a systematical inquiry into historical origins of contemporary cases; of the commonplace, but neglected, truth that it does not follow that if only people enough hold an opinion, it must therefore be both true and apt; of coherence and classification in our survey and treatment of political problems." It would be hard to find a more splendid justification of the place of intellectual virtue in all the serious interests of life, and not least in religion.

* * *

THE Congress of Universities, at which 52 universities of the British Empire have been represented, has been in session in London this week. There has been a remarkable display of stimulating oratory by Lord Rosebery, Lord Curzon, Mr. Balfour, and other speakers, and many polite compliments have been paid. There has been also a brisk interchange of ideas alike on internal organisation and the method and scope of university education. It is unlikely that there will be any practical results immediately. Universities are among the most conservative of institutions, and it requires whole battalions of ideas and a long siege to make any breach in their walls.

* * *

IN the discussions at the Congress certain lines of advance and mutual co-operation were laid down. It is clear that the older universities need much greater elasticity of mind in their attitude towards students who come to them from other centres of learning. Intellectual hospitality is not one of their conspicuous virtues. Some adaptation of the German plan which enables a student to migrate from one university to another during his undergraduate course would be of value, and might easily be arranged; especially among the newer universities. We need also to be less conventional in the value we attach to different types of education. The colonies may be our benefactors as well as recipients of our intellectual bounty, and the time may not be far distant when it will be desirable to send young men from the motherland to study at colonial universities. Lastly, the assumption that it is a good thing to graft Western education upon the Oriental mind, and that in denationalising Indian students at English universities we are conferring a benefit upon them, needs to be re-examined in the light of the disillusionment of experience.

* * *

CANDOUR is one of the characteristics of the Bishop of Oxford. On one side of his mind he is the most modern of men, on the other he is the mediæval ecclesiastic, and there is no attempt to soften the antagonism. In his Diocesan Maga- zine for July he advises his clergy to abide by Church law as against statute law, and to refuse Communion to those who have contracted marriage with a deceased wife's sister. He thinks they ought to do this as a matter of principle, without violent language or intemperate action, and by their courage, simplicity, and wisdom commend the principle of their action to the common religious conscience of the nation. If many of the clergy take his advice we may have to admire their consistency in face of a hostile public opinion, and the risk of legal penalties; but we wonder whether Dr. Gore really believes that it is possible to teach the conscience of the nation to regard such marriages with moral abhorrence. Does he believe that in some deep interior sense they are wrong, or merely that they are a breach of ecclesiastical obedience? We fear that there is often a good deal of confusion between these two things.

* * *

IN the Commonwealth for July Canon Scott Holland does well to recall the clergy from the belated controversies over the Insurance Act to the practical task of helping people to use it to the best advantage. He describes it as a measure of vital importance to the poorer workers, which expresses the ideal of our corporate responsibility for one another. "It aims at giving that touch of security and stability to life which alone can make it human and moral and precious. It is an heroic effort to cover the whole field of our working people's anxiety and distress. It dreams of lifting the world of labour out of the morass on to a new level of hope. . . The clergy are the first people who ought to be ready to set it in action, and to explain its obligation and its methods."

THE CHURCH AND HUMAN LIFE.*

BY PROFESSOR G. DAWES HICKS.

THIS is an eventful moment for those of you who are bidding farewell to our little society, and are about to take your share in the work for which the time spent in these class-rooms has constituted the Lehrjahre—the years of preparation. You are seeking to serve your fellow men through the ministry of religion, through the agency of the church, and I would fain, if one may hope so much, be the bearer of some helpful message that shall confirm your assurance of the high importance of the tasks awaiting you, and of its being worth while to expend upon them the strength, the energy, and the resources of a life. The great institution, for which it will be your privilege to labour, has met in these days, like almost every other institution, with a vast amount of hostile and unsparing criticism, and it will be part of your mission to make men realise that the things for which the church stands are still precious, still vital, still essential, both to the individual and to the community. The first requisite of success in this respect will be, at all events, that you yourselves should believe with earnest, genuine, and downright sincerity in the enduring value for mankind of the aims the church has to further and the ideals it has to cherish. However it may be with other occupations, here, at any rate, intense conviction is the indispensable condition of fruitful industry; whole-hearted loyalty and allegiance an absolutely necessary passport to peace and contentment of mind. I suppose a lawyer can passionately plead for a client whilst being himself fully persuaded of the latter's guilt, but a prophet who has lost his faith in his prophecy had certainly better retrace his steps ere it be yet too late. In these days of giddy tastes and hesitating beliefs you are going forth to represent a cause which must be as dear to you as life itself, if it is to prosper in your hands.

The cause of the church we will call it. I am informed that the word "church" cannot be uttered in certain assemblies without a whole host of images of cardinals, bishops, priests, and monks, all arrayed in the insignia of their office, arising in the minds of the auditors. I need hardly protest that I have not come to Wales to suggest visions of that kind. "The Church," said a distinguished Scotch divine, "is neither more nor less than a spiritual corporation for putting down sin and making men good." I do not say that I regard this definition as exhaustive. The church, I take it, is much more than an institution for the culture of the moral life, but whatever else it is, most certainly it is primarily and distinctively that, and in strenuously insisting upon the moral basis of religion we touch, I believe, the ultimate point of unquestionable certainty. But the term "spiritual corporation" will carry our thoughts further. I like to picture Plato's ideal state as becoming gradually realised in the Christian church, although on a broader and more extensive scale than Plato conceived to be possible. For the Platonic ideal was essentially that of a community within which there would be, as its nucleus, so to speak, a spiritual corporation, the members of which would be occupied with the best and highest things—the things which are lovable and precious for their own sake. The soul would be carried out of the sea which encrusts it with the "shells and stones and tangle" of the earthly appetites into communion with "the divine, the immortal, the eternal," to which it is akin, and, awakening from the dream-life in which men wrangle about the shadows of power and grasp at phantoms of good, it would be in touch with reality in its own essence, and recognise that whatever is true and right and beautiful in the whole world is due thereto. Beyond all question, we have here one of the greatest and most tremendous conceptions ever reached by the mind of man—the conception, namely, that in this universe of endless multiplicity and change, the intrinsically valuable, the intrinsically worthy, is alone the ultimately real, the ultimately true—that for the sake of which all other things are, and which the mere mechanism of nature, vast and huge though it be, is as impotent to create as it is powerless to destroy. To know and to live in the light of this reality was, in Plato's view, the highest form of human existence, and he who did so would make the space around him as a citizen, pure and fair and noble. How far we, in modern times, have descended from the height of the Greek ideal is, alas, only too obvious. Emerson contrives, in his genial way, to bring home to us our little care for moral and spiritual blessings for their own sake by pointing, for example, to the fact that we bluntly ask for our sovereign "grant him in health and wealth long to live," whilst in the diary of the excellent Samuel Pepys, the most pious petition contained is that the new coach which he had just acquired might, by the grace of God, be continued to him. But, notwithstanding, the Christian church does aspire to be the spiritual corporation of which its head and founder would have approved—a society of persons who are seeking to escape from the narrow and fretful region of self into the larger and serener world where Christ taught us to find the fitting environment of the soul. Plato's conception lives again in the ideal of a fellowship of minds, knit together as disciples of one who pleaded with men to be faithful to their own deepest experiences, to trust their own noblest loves, and to revere the gracious beneficence and wisdom discernible by the understanding eye and felt by the responsive heart. It has been said of Emerson that "his life was one long conversation with the invisible divine, expressing itself through individuals," and certainly no man is ever at his best or highest except when he is in touch with ultimate issues. And it is because in the region of the spirit the fellowship of mind with mind means the strengthening and the enrichment of each, because it is universally felt that in the sublimest reaches of the soul's attainment, the individual is led beyond the merely personal self into closest intimacy with the inner being of others, that religious communion has been throughout its history one of the main functions of the church to encourage and foster. Accordingly, the church has become, so to speak, the syndicate of those who in the sympathies of a common want and a common trust would seek the consecration of heaven upon their earthly work and the sustenance which that consecration alone can give to the life of conscientious labour and of self-sacrificing service. Taking over a vast heritage from the past, religious fellowship secures no less innumerable subtle influences from the present, and humanity would be infinitely the poorer were men ever to cease contemplating together the sacred realities above them and yet within them and around.

Expressed very briefly that is what I take to be the function of the true church of Christ. It is delineated more adequately and with fine Celtic enthusiasm in a delightful little work* of an able Welsh preacher—Mr. Lloyd Thomas, of Nottingham—a copy of which I trust each of you about to enter the ministry will carry away with you. So conceived, the church is, of course, an institution vastly more comprehensive in its scope than the select community of choice spirits Plato would have banded together for the pursuit of the highest ends. The latter was to be the monopoly of the cultured few. Christianity, with its great principle of the infinite worth of each individual soul, has been enabled so to widen the spiritual fraternity as to include the hewers of wood and drawers of water, who, according to the Greek ideal, would have been left outside. "Down in Judæa" they may not have known everything, but they knew a few things it would have been well even for the cultured intellectuals of Athens to have recognised. They knew that the spiritual well-being of mankind is intimately wrapped up with the tillage of the field, the pasture of the flocks, the customs of the market, the habits of the home, and the whole bent of modern progress has been to substantiate and to confirm this assurance of theirs. So that the old Roman motto "extra ecclesiam nulla salus," although in one sense harsh and exclusive, turns out in another and deeper sense to be profoundly true. If by salvation be meant the realisation of

* Annual Address to the Students of the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, delivered on Wednesday, June 26, 1912.

* "A Free Catholic Church." London: Williams & Norgate, 1912.

the soul's best, then that end is not to be attained except through the medium of spiritual fellowship. I am not, of course, oblivious of the frightful mangling and mutilation the institution of the church has undergone in the rough base usage of the world. Christian communities have been reproached with narrowing down the number of the elect to themselves, and then proceeding to damn 99 per cent. of their own diminished numbers, and it cannot be said that the reproach has been altogether ill-deserved. Repeatedly the life of a "sect" has been substituted for the life of a "church," and men have failed to grasp the enormous difference between the temporary concurrence in theological opinions that constitutes the one and the sameness of spiritual relationship that furnishes the basis of the other. Not alone from Rome, but from many another centre of ecclesiastical jurisdiction the attempt has been made to satisfy man's religious needs by prescribing the tenets of his faith, and by authoritatively demanding of him to believe only what it declared to be true and to do only what it declared to be right. No great ideal is ever realised without suffering some deterioration in the process, and perhaps Plato would have predicted the deterioration just mentioned as the penalty of widening the range of communion. But the human soul cannot be permanently fettered, and all down the Christian centuries there have never been wanting sincere and earnest men who have been faithful to the ideal in its pristine purity, and who have insisted that not correctness of dogma, but the consciousness of spiritual need, the sense of filial dependence upon God, is the only condition Christ would impose for membership in his church. And in these days more than ever it is coming to be seen that fidelity of the church to her great head consists not in straining at every gnat of so-called heresy, but rather in contriving to embrace within her circle the largest number of associates who, with whatever diversities of thought and temperament, are on the way to heaven. "Do not tell me," exclaimed Channing, "that I surrender myself to a fiction of imagination, when I say that distant Christians, that all Christians and myself, form one body, one church, just as far as a common love and piety possess our hearts. Nothing is more real than this spiritual union. There is one grand all-comprehending church; and, if I am a Christian, I belong to it, and no man can shut me out of it. You may exclude me from your Roman Church, your Episcopal Church, and your Calvinistic Church, on account of supposed defects in my creed or my sect, and I am content to be excluded. But I will not be severed from the great body of Christ." And he goes on to declare that no ecclesiastical combinations on earth shall sunder him from such men as Fénelon and Pascal, from Archbishop Leighton, Jeremy Taylor, and John Howard. Their spirit, flowing out through their lives and writings, penetrates his soul and forms a portion of his own being, so that but for them he would have been a different man from what he is.

No careful observer of the tendencies of the present time can entertain a moment's doubt that Christian men and women of all denominations are coming more and more to recognise that in so speaking Channing was interpreting with strict accuracy the catholicity that ought to characterise the spiritual communion we call "the church." They are coming to see the divergence between what Mr. Lloyd Thomas distinguishes—and I think rightly distinguishes—as doctrine and dogma. Each individual thinker must form his own intellectual opinions and conclusions concerning the great problems with which theology has to deal, and these conclusions and opinions will be doctrines that will seem to him, and are for him, valid and important. But dogma, as Mr. Thomas points out, is not doctrine merely—it is doctrine authoritatively decreed, doctrine externally enforced, by a sect or its ecclesiastical representatives. And it is this element of compulsion overriding the reason and conscience of man, and suppressing the right and duty of individual judgment which, as he says, "degrades a Church from a voluntary fellowship of the spirit into a legislative and judicial authority." The non-acceptance of, or disobedience to, a dogma thus becomes heresy, just as the violation of an Act of Parliament becomes a crime in law. The enforcement in this way of dogma is as detrimental to the successful pursuit of theological science on the one hand as it is destructive of the ideal of religious fellowship and common worship on the other. Theology, as a science, can only live when each of its devotees uses the gifts God has given him to solve his own intellectual difficulties; theology, as a science, can only live when students pursue their work subject to constant mutual criticism, and with readiness at a moment to readjust their conclusions in accordance with whatsoever fresh insight free unfettered inquiry may yield. So far as the church is concerned, it is precisely the vicious practice of stereotyping doctrines and of converting them into dogmas that has alienated thoughtful minds from religious congregations, and has led such minds to regard themselves as heretics. Even the poet who sang so sweetly over Wordsworth's grave, and who feels so sympathetically the beauty of Wordsworth's simple faith and piety, can discern in the Church of to-day nothing but a remnant or survival of decaying mediævalism and superstition—

"Outwardly splendid as of old,
Inwardly sparkless, void and cold;
Her force and fire all spent and gone,
Like the dead moon, she still shines on."

And he pictures the time when liberated from the incubus of sectarian prejudices and what he takes to be the intolerable pretensions of existing religious organisations, there will arise the possibility of that vision of divine realities towards which the noblest minds of our race have been unceasingly aspiring. "When," he says,

"When whelmed are altar, priest, and creed;
When all the faiths have passed;
Perhaps, from darkening incense freed,
God may emerge at last."

Is it not a sad and melancholy reflection that the institution of the Church which arose from the human, need of worshipping together the Father of us all as Love, and from the need of co-operating together for the service in love of our brother men, should present a spectacle like this to thousands of earnest truth-seekers, in consequence of which they are repelled from the fold of Christian discipleship? Let us not be under the delusion that these minds are antagonistic to religious aims and ideals, or that they are enemies to those objects for which the Church, when it is faithful to its own ideal, subsists to further. These minds know, as well as you can tell them, that the consciousness of a divine relationship brings to man a dignity that affects all he touches, and enables him to realise the greatness that underlies the apparent littleness of our ordinary existence, so that in the hour of humblest endeavour he becomes aware of standing in the midst of the eternities which God takes care of. They know, as well as you can tell them, that human life would be a grander, nobler, sublimer thing, if only we could contemplate it together as impregnated with a sacred trust, and as claiming from us the devotion of our best powers to the ends of righteousness and truth. Listen to the words of one who was not accustomed to speak well of orthodox dogmas, but who yet had no unkind syllable to utter concerning the essentials of religion:—"I can conceive," said Professor Huxley, "the existence of an Established Church which should be a blessing to the community—a Church, in which, week by week, services should be devoted, not to the iteration of abstract propositions in theology, but to the setting before men's minds of an ideal of true, just, and pure living; a place in which those who are weary of the burden of daily cares should find a moment's rest in the contemplation of the higher life which is possible for all, though attained by so few; a place in which the man of strife and of business should have time to think how small, after all, are the rewards he covets compared with peace and charity. Depend upon it, if such a Church existed no one would seek to disestablish it."

To the ministry of that truly Catholic Church—and whether it be "established" or not, in the legal sense, matters, I think, but little—I welcome you with all my heart to-day. Come to it with something of the imagination of the poet and the enthusiasm of the moral reformer. Come to it with the determination to make its members feel that there is a greatness and divineness in the soul of man, and in human society, in the city's roar, and in the quiet retreat of the home, no less than in the tremulous glory of the nightly heavens and in the splendour of the natural world which it is the privilege of us all to enjoy. I can imagine no epoch of human history when the ministrations of such a church are more imperatively called for than at the present time. The stress and strain of human life is increasing by leaps and bounds; the pressure of existence is being felt as it has never been felt before. The mad rush of modern employments, much of it wholly unnecessary, is becoming overwhelming; in office, shop and study, the demands upon our energy and activity are vastly more exacting and relentless than they have ever been before.

"What shelter to grow ripe is ours?
What leisure to grow wise?"

A well-known essayist complains, not without reason, that the feverish love of speed, the love of novelty and excitement, is depriving the modern citizen of the possibility of anything that can be called a large view of the world. This headlong curiosity, this devouring of distance, instead of adding to our sense of nature's greatness, makes, he insists, the world smaller and the mind smaller. The error of the motor car policy is, he urges, that "it never understands anything or anybody." "To it, Arabia may be a whirl of dust and China a flash of rice fields; and the sensation is doubtless glorious. But Arabia is not a whirl of dust, and China is not a flash of rice fields. These are things ancient and inscrutable, things with secret powers buried like treasure, things that can only be understood from the inside, things that can only be felt with the loyalty of children and with the great patience of poets." I stay not now to inquire into the justice of this sweeping indictment of the recent tendencies of our civilisation. But I do say that to whatever extent it represents the truth the more urgently the church is needed to bring us back to the large quiet things of life, to moderate and chasten the desires of men, and to repair the havoc wrought by the excessive anxiety and worry of our busy years. Men and women everywhere are yearning for the secure assurance of a Love whose nature it is to bestow peace, to assuage grief, to spread a watchful and delivering providence over the abodes of human kind. They are asking everywhere, consciously or unconsciously, to be shown the way to find that Comforter, that spirit of Truth, which Christ promised to those who communed with the Father in Heaven. It will be your high vocation not to appear in the pulpit week after week with a hastily concocted piece of talk, but to help those to whom you will minister to enter into the great spiritual inheritance which is theirs, and to take their share in doing Christ's work and in doing it in Christ's own way. And in entering upon that mission, you are latest in a procession of believers in the good and true which started forth in an immemorial past to save and redeem men and thus to build up a happier and sweeter human home on this ancient earth.

"The great hearts of the olden time
Are beating with you full and strong;
All holy memories and sublime
And glorious round you throng.

The truths ye urge are borne abroad
By every wind and tide;
The voice of Nature and of God
Speaks out upon your side.

The weapons which your hands have found
Are those which Heaven itself has wrought,
Light, Truth, and Love—your battleground,
The free, broad field of Thought."

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

THE INTER-DENOMINATIONAL CONFERENCE OF SOCIAL SERVICE UNIONS.

THE name of The Hayes brings back to all who were privileged to be there last week the remembrance of an ideal place for such a gathering as our Inter-Denominational Summer School. For though it is surrounded on nearly all sides by the coal-fields of Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire, the house and grounds are as secluded as heart could wish, and the view from the terrace extends past the lawn, with its two spreading oak trees, over a sloping field, with deep woods on the one side, and a peep of water and rhododendron beds on the other, to distant ridges of rock and moor, clothed in a grey haze or blending with the sky. The weather favoured us on the whole, as, though there were many showers and one heavy thunderstorm, no day was without its hours of sunshine when one could wander dry-shod over the close-cropped lawns and the asphalt paths of garden and shrubberies.

The number of guests was not quite so large as had been anticipated, and the camping-out facilities were therefore not required; but the house, and quad, and hostel were well filled, and more than 200 sat down to meals during the greater part of the time. The members came from all denominations and from none, and among them were eight Dutch friends who came over purposely for the week. Inquiry showed that of those who sent in their names as hoping to attend, 50 were Anglicans, 12 Roman Catholics, about 25 Friends, and a similar number of Congregationalists and Wesleyan Methodists, and 33 belonging to the National Conference Union, besides Primitive and United Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, members of the Church of Scotland, and a good many who did not fill up their papers as belonging to any denomination.

The Session opened on Saturday evening with an address on "Philosophy and the Prospects of the Social Problem," by Professor Muirhead, of Birmingham—a member, as he said, of no denomination, but of "The Church Invisible." His paper was a profoundly interesting presentation of philosophical thought as applied to industrial questions, and was followed by much discussion, formal and informal. Indeed, the interest of the various subjects treated was by no means confined to the Lecture Hall, but was carried on, sometimes in large groups, sometimes in small, wherever and whenever the members met.

On Sunday morning various services were held at the nearest places of worship, and in a sheltered nook on the lawn, by the earnest desire of Miss Knappert and her Dutch friends, Mr. Wicksteed read aloud the opening pages of "The Prelude." This was so highly appreciated by all those who heard it that each afternoon during the week it was continued from three to four in the Walnut room, a large panelled apartment requisitioned for sectional meetings and services at all times of the day.

On Sunday afternoon the members gathered in the Conference Hall to hear addresses from the Bishop of Oxford, who was in the chair, Monsignor Parkinson, head of Oscott College, Birmingham, and Dr. Scott Lidgett, who one and all were inspired by the uniqueness of the occasion to speak words worthy of the great cause in which we were gathered together, viz., the identity of the spirit of religion with the spirit of social reform.

On Monday morning began the programme proper, covering the large field of "The Life of the Industrial Worker." Mrs. Margaret Alden, M.D., dealt, as an expert, and in a wise and sympathetic way, with the environment of the child, and the Rev. Hume Campbell, in the evening, gave an exhaustive psychological review of the growth of a child's mind and character. The chairman on this occasion was Mr. Michael Sadler, Vice-Chancellor of the University of Leeds, and he followed the lecturer with a delightful historical sketch of the influence of Rousseau on education, leading to the interesting experimental work of Madame Montessori in Rome.

"Adolescence" was the subject of Mr. Chas. Russell on Tuesday morning, and "Youth and Industry" of Mr. R. A. Bray in the evening. Both lecturers dwelt on the importance of a sympathetic treatment of the problems concerned, and both gave practical suggestions of the utmost value.

On Wednesday the "Industrial and the Social Sides of the Life of the Man-Worker" were treated by Mr. Seeborn Rowntree and Mr. George Shann. The latter was particularly illuminating in his description of the forces now at work in the labour movement, and he warned the middle classes against supposing that they had the power to settle the affairs of the workers, for the latter were not only competent, but determined to do it for themselves, and for that purpose were welcoming the opportunities for education now afforded them in so many directions.

"The Problems of the Woman Worker" were discussed on Thursday, when Miss Constance Smith gave a terrible picture of the conditions due to the low wages which obtain in so many industries, and for which she believed the only remedy to be the organisation of women in Trade Unions. In the evening the no less difficult and pressing problem of the "Woman in the Home" was considered, and on Friday morning the Rev. Will Reason closed the series with a well thought out and extremely interesting paper on "The Non-Worker."

The concluding meeting was held on Friday evening, when Dr. Carlyle summed up the leading ideas of the week's discussions in his own genial and happy way, and emphasised especially the hopeful features which had emerged. In response to the earnest desire of the Conference, it was decided by the Committee that all these addresses should be printed and issued in the form of a report, which cannot fail to be a valuable contribution to the cause of social reform.

It may here be mentioned that in the choice of lecturers no question was raised as to the denomination to which they belonged; the only desire was to secure the ablest and best-known exponents of "the life of the industrial worker" in its various aspects. The denominations were represented by the chairmen of the different meetings, the chairman of the concluding meeting being the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed. It is impossible to convey in words the faintest sense of the impressiveness of his valedictory address. It must suffice to say that after impressing on his hearers the need for the utmost watchfulness of all experiments in the social and economic sphere, he referred to the lament of the Bishop that we could join in everything but prayer, and expressed his own conviction that this was not impossible, inviting us there and then to unite our hearts in reverence and gratitude to God "without the hindrance of human speech"; and in a few seconds came the sound of a piano, and we listened to the dropping chords of a lovely movement of Beethoven.

Thus, not for the first time, was it proved that the universal note can be struck only by one outside all creed-bound churches.

But the meetings arranged by the Committee for the study of these important questions were by no means all the meetings that took place. Every Social Union gathered its members together for the discussion of its own work, and our National Conference Union met on Wednesday afternoon under the chairmanship of Mr. Wicksteed. As one of the objects of the United Conference is to urge local co-operation wherever there are branches of the different unions, it would seem desirable that our unions should be in touch with the various societies in our churches which are already engaged in social work and social study, and the question of an organising secretary, raised in Birmingham, was again discussed. There was a strong feeling amongst the members that some arrangement of this kind was desirable, and that the necessary funds could easily be raised, but it was left to the Committee to formulate a definite plan. At all events, as Mr. Lloyd Thomas urged, it was highly desirable to retain our position in the united movement. As already mentioned, our numbers at the Summer School were second only to those of the Anglicans, and before the end of the week we had six fresh applications for membership from men and women who felt that our Union was the one with which they were most in sympathy. Our cumbersome name seemed to be no drawback, for particulars of each union were given in the Handbook, which arrived from the publishers in the middle of the week. In this the Unions are arranged alphabetically, each with a short history and description of its objects, with a preface by the President, the Bishop of Oxford. Copies may be had, price 2d., from the various secretaries. Impromptu meetings were held also on the Insurance Act, the Charity Organisation Society, and Women's Suffrage, besides many meetings of the Conference Committee.

It only remains to be said that the most complete cordiality reigned throughout; badges were worn with the names of the wearers, so that no formality of introduction was necessary; walks were taken in company, tennis was played, a few excursions arranged, and there was a kaleidoscopic change of neighbours at every meal time. It must be added that the wheels of the machine worked with admirable smoothness, thanks to the organising ability of Mr. Stark, the hon. secretary of the Sub-Committee for arranging the Summer School, and to the tact and wisdom of our kind, practical, humorous hostess, Miss Lucy Gardner, the hon. secretary of the whole Conference. It was decided, with great enthusiasm, to hold another session next year, and Miss Gardner's last announcement was that the next meeting of the Summer School at The Hayes would commence with five o'clock tea on Saturday, June 28, 1913.

CATHERINE GITTINS.

OXFORD SUMMER SCHOOL FOR SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHERS.

THE eighth Oxford Summer School for Sunday-school Teachers, convened by the Sunday School Association, is at present meeting at Manchester College. The proceedings began on Friday, June 28, and end on Saturday, July 6, so that the present account must necessarily be incomplete. As regards, however, the larger part of its work, already transacted, the present session must certainly be put down as a very successful one.

About sixty teachers, ministers, and other workers have this year joined the school—a smaller number than usual, owing to various circumstances. There is, however, no lessening of enthusiasm, and the very fact that fewer are here makes personal intercourse more possible and pleasant. The new plan has been adopted this year of providing members with badges indicating name and school, to be worn during the proceedings as a means of introducing one to another. This arrangement has put everyone delightfully at ease, and may be recommended for any other large gathering of the kind.

The arrangement of the session is in the main similar to that which has been previously followed. An opening service was conducted on the first morning by the Rev. J. J. Wright, ex-President of the Sunday School Association, who spoke upon the programme and spirit of our meetings here. The closing service is to be taken by the Rev. T. P. Spedding, now President of the Association. Each day begins with a short devotional service in the College chapel, followed by two lectures. The afternoons are given to recreation and the evenings to further lectures or discussion meetings. On the first evening (last Friday) the members were kindly and graciously received by Principal and Mrs. Carpenter in the Library. They have also been made welcome by Dr. Carpenter and Dr. Odgers at home, and they have again felt fully the kindness which throws open for their meetings this College with all its wealth of association and inspiration. A summer session in any other place than Manchester College would be a far different thing. The local arrangements are in the hands of Mr. H. W. Stephenson, and could not be better entrusted. To him and to all the College officials very great thanks are due for work most readily undertaken at every moment

The subjects treated and discussed have again covered a wide field of Sunday-school work. First in importance, as a special feature of this session, must be mentioned the three lectures delivered by Dr. Carpenter on "Religion in the Time of Jesus." The first of these dealt with the temple at Jerusalem, its buildings, services, and priests; the village synagogue and its worship; home piety, and the usages of the Sabbath. The second described the details of religious party developments, the Scribes or Guardians of the Law, and the Pharisees, in their more rigid and their more genial sections; and it concluded with a striking exposition of their fine spiritual teaching. The third lecture dealt with Jewish beliefs in "The Age to Come," influenced in turn by Persian domination and by the desire of compensation for suffering in this life. The apocalyptic literature of pre-Christian times was described, with a summary of its teaching on the passage from one "Age" to the other, the portents which would herald it, the resurrection and judgment, and the coming of a Messiah who should inaugurate a "kingdom of God." The whole course was delivered with great impressiveness and power, and listened to attentively by large audiences, who felt it a privilege to receive in such a way first-hand teaching from a master upon his own subject.

Two pairs of lectures have also been included in the programme, the Rev. F. K. Freeston speaking twice on "Lives of the Saints," and Rev. A. W. Fox on "The Growth of our Unitarian Faith." The latter lectures are, at the time of writing, still to come. Mr. Freeston dealt first with mediæval saints, with special reference to the "Golden Legend," and secondly with the modern saints of "the new calendar," illustrating his words this time by a magnificent collection of lantern slides representing monuments and memorials of great modern men and women. No lecture in our proceedings has been more enjoyed or more deeply stirred its audience. In addition to the lantern illustrations, Mr. Freeston had prepared cards with each a portrait of some "saint" of our race, and some striking testimonies to his or her sainthood. The hope was freely expressed that some permanent form might be given later to the work expended on this most valuable lecture.

The New Testament has been specially brought into prominence at this session, for, in addition to Dr. Carpenter's course, lectures have been given by the Rev. T. P. Spedding on "New Testament Lesson Values," and by Mr. Ion Pritchard, secretary of the Sunday School Association, on "The Life Story of Jesus," based upon Giran's "Jesus of Nazareth." Mr. Spedding dealt with two ways of treating the New Testament material—the method of detailed analysis of a book, and the "subject-method" which correlates various passages to bring out some particular moral lesson or fact of history. Mr. Pritchard's direct and vivid account of the life of the Master emphasised afresh the possibilities which that life-story contains for the Sunday-school teacher. The name of our secretary must not be mentioned without some word of the sincere affection and gratitude which every mem-

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL

Principal Contents of July
Number Now Ready.

- The Degeneration of Classes and Peoples. Dr. Max Nordau.
- The Significance of Jesus for His Own Age. C. G. Montefiore.
- Christ as "The Truth." R. Kennard Davies.
- The Church, the World, and the Kingdom. Right Rev. J. E. Mercer, D.D., Bishop of Tasmania.
- The Ungodly Organisation of Society. Rev. A. W. F. Blunt, M.A.
- Conformity and Veracity, 1662 and 1912. Rev. E. W. Lummis.
- The Vain Appeal of Dogma to Science. M. M. Pattison Muir, M.A.
- Logic—M. Bergson and Mr. H. G. Wells. Philip E. B. Jourdain.
- The Artistic Attitude in Conduct. E. F. Carritt.
- The Interpretation of Prophecy. Rev. G. E. French, B.D.
- The Sistine Madonna. Archibald A. Bowman.
- The Gods of Epicurus. A Plea for their Serious Consideration. B. A. G. Fuller.
- Social Service. No. 4. The Hardships of Seamen's Wives. Emma Mahler.
- Signed Reviews, Discussions, and Survey of Religious and Philosophical Literature.
- Super royal 8vo, 2s. 6d. net; 2s. 9d. post free.
Subscriptions, which may commence with any number, 10s. per annum, post free.

CROWN THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY.

NEW VOLUMES.

- Pharisaism: Its Aim and its Method. By Rev. R. TRAVERS HERFORD, Author of "Christianity in the Talmud," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, 5s. net.
- The Religious Experience of St. Paul. By Prof. PERCY GARDNER, D.Litt., Author of "Modernity and the Churches." Crown 8vo, Cloth, 5s. net.
- New Testament Studies. By Dr. ADOLF HARNACK. Translated by Rev. J. R. WILKINSON, M.A. Crown 8vo, Cloth, 5s. net per volume.
- Vol. I.—Luke the Physician.
Vol. II.—The Sayings of Jesus.
Vol. III.—The Acts of the Apostles.
Vol. IV.—The Date of the Acts and of the Synoptic Gospels.

THEOLOGICAL TRANSLATION LIBRARY.

THE TRUTH OF RELIGION.

By Dr. RUDOLF EUCKEN,
Professor of Philosophy in the University of Jena, and recently awarded a "Nobel Prize."

Now first translated into English from the second and revised edition, with a special preface by the author, by the Rev. W. TUDOR JONES (Ph.D.), Jena, for some years a student under Professor Eucken.

Demy 8vo. Cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
14, Henrietta Street,
Covent Garden, London, W.C.

ber of the session bears towards its organiser and real centre.

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant spoke to an enthusiastic audience on "Music in our Sunday Schools," dealing with the uses of this department, the materials at hand, and the methods in which they may be used. His address was full of practical points and suggestions, giving the testimony of long experience on a very important part of Sunday-school work. Miss Grace Mitchell gave a fine paper on "Citizenship: The Teacher's Responsibility," opening our eyes to many unnoticed wrongs in our social life, and (which is better) to ways in which the individual may help to set them right through the operations of local government. Miss Mitchell kindly provided literature for those who were further interested, and much useful discussion has arisen from this particular lecture. Perhaps this after-discussion is really the most important and vital part of all the Oxford proceedings.

The Rev. J. Tyssul Davis is giving two lectures on nature subjects, one illustrated by the lantern. The more immediate problems and methods of teaching have been several times brought forward. "Teachers in Council" meetings have been held on the preparation of lessons and the telling of stories, the latter subject introduced by the Rev. L. Clare, illustrated by actual story-telling on the part of several teachers. Another Council will follow on "Teachers' Difficulties," presided over by the Rev. J. J. Wright. A paper on "Infant Class Teaching: Its Influence and Place in the Sunday School," was read by Miss D. Tarrant, who dwelt specially on the importance of early training in habits of thought and conduct alike, the value of instilling a reverent faith in little children from the very first, and the genuine influence which the presence of an infant class may exert upon the whole school. The Rev. J. Arthur Pearson is to give the last lecture of the session upon "Lessons for Younger Classes." A most valuable lesson demonstration, to an actual class of boys and girls, was given by Mr. F. J. Gould, of the Moral Education League, who thus repeated the kindness which he showed us at the session of 1910.

On Sunday the George-street Mission School was transplanted to Manchester College and superintended by Mr. Walter Holmes. Excellent lessons, open to teachers to attend, were given to four classes by Miss Piper, Miss Effie Turner, Mr. Abbott, and Mr. Evans. The day was further rendered memorable by chapel service, conducted by Dr. J. E. Odgers, who preached from Daniel vi. upon the importance of faithfulness to religious and moral principle. A brief devotional service is held at the beginning of each day; these services are conducted by various ministers taking part in the proceedings. Prominent among these is the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, who is giving us no lecture, indeed, but the encouragement of his presence and counsel; and we welcome with him Mrs. Dowson, a former president of the Association.

The whole of our meetings here have been so far marked by an enthusiasm and a keen zeal for better work, which seem to augur well for the future of our schools. A large number of young teachers are present, and by them especially this opportunity of strengthening their hands for their own work amid such surroundings, and in a city of ancient piety and learning and of a charm beyond expressing, must be long remembered.

D. T.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

OLIVER CROMWELL.
1599-1658.

I.

"I will go forth in the strength of the Lord God. . . . Kings with their armies did flee and were discomfited."

ABOUT two months ago I told you the story of a great sailor; to-day I want to speak of a soldier—a very great soldier indeed, because as Joan of Arc fought for France, so he fought for England, believing that God had commanded him to do so. And it was harder for him than for Joan of Arc to see what he ought to do, since the men who were harming England were his own country-people, not foreigners, and he had to see very clearly that it was right before he could begin to fight battles against men who were as much Englishmen as he was himself. I want you to like Oliver Cromwell, for he is a man we should all be proud of—one of the very greatest in the history of any country.

Some years ago—between 40 and 50 years—children used to be taught in their history-books that Cromwell was a bad man who murdered the King, and only cared about "getting on" in life, and being put at the head of everything in the King's place. But then came a great Scotchman called Thomas Carlyle, who knew that Cromwell was very different from this, and that it was a shame that English people should not know the truth about him, and so Carlyle set to work to write a book—the Life of Cromwell—in which, with much trouble and poking about in museums and libraries, he collected all of Cromwell's letters, and his speeches in Parliament, and these letters and speeches show us that Cromwell was a good and honest and brave and religious man—not a hypocrite at all. If he had been a hypocrite he could not have lived such a brave life, for hypocrites are generally cowards as well, and it is strange that people should for so long have thought him one. But thanks to this book of Carlyle's (which I hope some of you will read for yourselves when you are older) we think differently now, and that is why I want you to remember what I am going to tell you about his life, and to notice especially that it was his religion which made him able to do all he did.

Cromwell's religion was not a thing which just lasted through Sunday, and then was put away for the rest of the week while he attended to his other business. No, he was thinking on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and every other day of how he could best serve God and make England a better country than he found it, and this gave him no easy time of it, as you will see. Until he was 43 years old, his life was a quiet one. He lived as a country farmer, and most likely never thought that he would some day be the most powerful man in England, ruling instead of the King. He was born in Huntingdon in 1599, four years after the death of Sir Francis Drake, while Queen Elizabeth was still reigning. She died in 1603, so that Cromwell was then four years old, and then James I. began to reign. He was the son of Mary Queen of Scots, and was the first Scotch king who reigned over England. He was not much beloved by his people, for England was growing more and more Protestant at this time, and King James wanted it to be Catholic; also he wanted to govern by himself without asking leave of Parliament to do the things he thought best, and this was a great fault in the eyes of the English people, who have always depended upon Parliament to prevent the King from having too much of his own way, as is the case in some other countries. However, James did not go nearly so far in this way as Charles I., who came after him, so that the country did not fight with him as it did with Charles. If it had, we should have heard of Cromwell sooner, for he, as you will see, was the great leader in this war against the King.

Well, as I have said, Cromwell was born at Huntingdon, a small town in one of the smallest counties of England, though one of the greatest men was to come out of it. He belonged to one of the old families in England (he was related to that Thomas Cromwell who was Lord Chancellor before Sir Thomas More) though his father, Robert Cromwell, had taken to brewing, and carried on this trade in Huntingdon. Oliver Cromwell was sent to the Grammar School, and afterwards went to Cambridge to study, then for a short time he was a lawyer in London. In 1620, when he was 21, he was married and went back to Huntingdon. Here for 22 years he lived quietly as a farmer, managing his estate, selling his cattle and sheep, bringing up his children well, and doing a great deal for his own country by helping to drain the Fens, that is to say, to bank in the River Ouse and prevent its flooding all the country, which is very flat and marshy to begin with, so that at the time of the great floods the farmers used to be worse off than before. The King, Charles I., was very unwilling to give money and help to this work, but Cromwell stood by the rest of his neighbours, and persuaded them to go on telling the King what they wanted, so that in the end it was done, and they were so grateful to Cromwell that they called him the "Lord of the Fens."

During this time the most important event in Cromwell's life—far more important to him than being put in the King's place—happened; he became a religious man. We hear of him in his own letters, having fits of great sadness as he walked about his fields at St. Ives (a place five miles off Huntingdon, where he had now taken a farm) and believing himself to be one of the wickedest men living; and he was always afraid that his death would come suddenly, before he had been able to find out how a man ought to live. He wanted to be religious, but although he read his Bible diligently he could not for a long time see what he ought to do. At last it suddenly became clear to him, and from that day till the end of his life he sought after nothing but how he could best serve God. This is a great day in any one's life, when they first feel sure that what they read of in the Bible—God in heaven and Jesus Christ, and the angels, and the wonderful words in which Christ tells us how we ought to live—are real and true, and that we are sent here on earth to live so as to please God, not to please ourselves. People call this a conversion—which comes from two Latin words meaning a "turning-round"; and a turning round it is, because it makes you see things from another side, so that what has before seemed hard and useless and disagreeable now seems right and useful, and even pleasant, because God wishes us to do it.

Well, after this "turning-round" of Cromwell's he began at first doing what he could for his country in Parliament. He spoke against a bishop who had been trying to make people Roman Catholics at St. Paul's Cross, for you must remember that Cromwell was a great Protestant. You will understand this if you will think of what I have just said, for you see Cromwell believed that one must love and serve God with one's whole heart, and try to keep a good conscience. Now the Catholics believed that their priests could forgive a man his sins, even though he had made no effort to be good. That is the difference; the Protestants believe that only God can forgive sins, and only if one is honestly sorry for them and trying to do better. The priests even tried to make people believe that by paying money to the Church their wrong-doing would be forgiven, and they would go sooner to Heaven. You see how bad this was, for rich people did not care how badly they lived when they could set their conscience at rest by paying a few pounds to the priest. Now the reason of the great quarrel which began about 1630 between the King and the Parliament was this: The King, although he dared not call himself a Roman Catholic, because the greatest part of the English people was now Protestant, wished to come as near to it as he could by giving a great deal of power to the bishops, and telling them to preach in a Roman Catholic way if they chose; he also wished, like his father James I., to settle many things without the Parliament. One of the worst of these things was the raising of a tax to add ships to the navy.

It is part of the law of England that no tax shall be raised without the consent of Parliament, but the King got a lawyer to hunt out some old papers in which it was found that one of the old kings had once commanded several of the towns on the coast to provide ships when there was a war, so he pretended that he had a right to tax all the country for ships. This tax was called ship money, and was a most unjust thing. A relation of Cromwell's in Parliament, John Hampden, also a great man for acting as he did, refused to pay it when it came to his own county of Buckingham. He owned a great deal of land there and was ordered to raise £4,500 from the people for this ship money. But he determined not to pay what he felt to be wrong, and so it came to a trial, and the lawyers, who were not honest men, decided it for the King. But that made no difference to the people of England, who knew that Hampden was right. This happened in 1636, and was one of the things which led to the war between Charles and his Parliament, which broke out six years later—in 1642. Cromwell, of course, thought Hampden was right, and would have done the same in his place. The poor foolish King went on angering the people and the Parliament more and more; first he got into a war with Scotland because he wanted them to have bishops over them, and they wanted to keep their own Church in their own way. Then in 1642 he tried to imprison five Members of Parliament, because they had resisted him in different ways. This was too much, and the Parliament decided to go to war. This Civil War, as it is called when the people of one country fight against each other, lasted six years, and next week I must tell you something about it. This was one of the saddest times in English history, for you can think how it was when sometimes two brothers of one family would be fighting against each other.

DOROTHEA HOLLINS.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MR. JOHN HARRISON.

It is with a sense of deep personal loss that we have to announce the death of Mr. John Harrison, which took place, after a long and trying illness, on Friday, June 27. Born on July 9, 1841, at Chowbent, Lancashire, John Thomas Harrison was the second son of the Rev. Dr. Harrison, at one time minister of Chowbent Chapel, and subsequently of the Unitarian Church, Effra-road, Brixton. Though he had lived in London since early boyhood he had reason to be proud of his Lancashire home and ancestry. His great-grandfather was the Rev. Ralph Harrison, for many years minister of Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, whose fame as a musician is preserved in the well-known hymn-tune "Warrington," called, no doubt, after the Warrington Academy where he was trained. Ralph Harrison traced his descent directly to Cuthbert Harrison, of Singleton, who, with his brother Joseph, was one of the ejected ministers in 1662. On his mother's side also Mr. Harrison inherited some of the noblest traditions of the Nonconformist ministry. No wonder that to a man of his quick sympathies and generous temper the care of all the churches, and helpful friendship with their ministers, were among the most congenial occupations of his life. He was a successful business man, whose success only prompted him to finer generosity. As a shipowner he did a great deal to develop English trade with Antwerp and Normandy, the port of Tréport being largely the creation of his organising skill. His eminent services were recognised by the French Government when he was created a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour. He was also presented with the Order of Leopold of Belgium, while the Emperor of Austria awarded him the Order of Francis Joseph for conspicuous services to poor Austrian subjects in London, who were often granted free homeward passages on his boats. The latter is only one instance of the prodigality of his kindness. A small part of his generosity appeared in subscription lists, but a great deal of it was unknown even to his most intimate friends.

Special reference is made to Mr. Harrison's religious work in the address by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie at the funeral, which we print below. He held practically every office which it was possible for a layman to fill. He was President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association 1908-10, and of the London and South-Eastern Counties Provincial Assembly in 1902. For several years he served on the Committee of the National Triennial Conference, Manchester College, Oxford, and the London District Unitarian Society. In all these positions he was conspicuous for his shrewdness and geniality. He was always the most chivalrous of opponents, and difference of opinion in thought or policy served only to emphasise the breadth of his humanity and the graciousness of his spirit. He combined this peaceable temper with strong and ardent convictions. Nowhere was it more conspicuous than in his deep interest in international peace, and especially in recent years in the movement for closer friendship with Germany.

Mr. Harrison was married in 1866 to Elizabeth, daughter of the late John Wallace Hammond, chief engineer of the Great Western Railway. Mrs. Harrison died a year ago and there are no children.

The funeral service at Effra-road Church, Brixton, on Tuesday, was conducted by the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie and Dr. Cressey. Among the large congregation were the Revs. H. E. Dowson, C. Hargrove, J. J. Wright, Mr. C. Hawksley, numerous London ministers, and many other friends who had been associated closely with Mr. Harrison in his business and public activities. The interment took place subsequently at Kensal Green.

At the time of his death Mr. Harrison was treasurer for the new fund which is being raised in order to secure a minimum salary to the poorer ministers among the churches to which he was so deeply attached. It was decided at the Birmingham Conference last April to appeal for £30,000; but even £40,000 would be all too little for the purpose. We can conceive of no more suitable memorial to Mr. Harrison, and none which he himself would have commended more heartily, than a strenuous and determined effort to raise the larger sum.

ADDRESS BY THE REV. W. COPELAND BOWIE.

At the funeral on Tuesday Mr. Bowie spoke as follows:—

There are many good and worthy men in the world whose character, intelligence, and work command our respect or call forth our admiration, but fail to kindle our affections. The keynote of Mr. John Harrison's life to those who knew him best was his loveliness. His kindness was not the mere impulsive expression of a highly sensitive and emotional nature; it formed an integral part of his reasoned life. To be helpful—to employ his talents and means for the good of others—was natural to him, and he cultivated and used his gift with earnest and sustained effort.

A man of affairs, immersed in difficult and often perplexing business concerns, himself an unflinching worker, no trouble was too great for him when the sufferings or needs of others made their appeal. Even those of us who knew him intimately for many years were, I believe, only acquainted with a very small part of his benevolence. The widow and the orphan, the distressed seaman from a foreign port stranded amid the loneliness of London, the Unitarian minister struck down by disease or struggling anxiously under the burden of poverty—these were types of the people assisted again and again by Mr. Harrison with a sympathy which brought not only material aid but joy to the life of the recipient.

The character of some men is so complex that it is difficult to make any statement in regard to them which might not be contradicted by relating different and contrary facts. The transparent directness and simplicity of Mr. Harrison's mind were obvious to all who came into personal contact with him. Nor was his loveliness the bubbling over of a kindly but weak nature. He possessed strong convictions to which he clung with resolute determination. Though invariably courteous towards those from whom he differed in opinion, nothing could divert him from the path which his own reason, conscience, and sense of duty marked out for him as true and right.

To enumerate in detail the many societies in the administration of whose affairs he took an active interest would occupy too much time to-day. To the Unitarian Christian Church at Effra-road, Brixton, he gave most generously and unwearily of his time, abilities, and means, while his constant presence at the Sunday services was an unflinching support and inspiration to his fellow-worshippers, and to every minister who occupied the pulpit. To the London District Unitarian Society, the London and South-Eastern Counties' Provincial Assembly, the National Triennial Conference, Manchester College, Dr Williams' Library, and other organisations, he rendered invaluable services extended over many years.

It is, however, no exaggeration to say that outside his own business and home no other work engaged his energies with such whole-hearted devotion and enthusiasm as the work of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. He was an active member of the committee until illness laid him aside, and during the two years he occupied the honourable position of President, he laboured with an earnestness and loyalty which were beyond praise. Only a few weeks ago, in the midst of physical suffering, he spoke to me warmly of the joy which that work had been to him, and of his unflinching conviction that the principles and faith which the Association represented were fraught with untold good to mankind. Unitarian Christianity to him was no cold, arid theology, but a religion throbbing with inspiration for life and duty, and permeated by a spirit of divine trust and love.

Mr. Harrison's devotion to music and his power of interpreting its beauty to others were always at the service of our churches. Our anniversary meetings were witness to his knowledge and skill as an organist, and it is pathetic to think that never again shall any of us listen to the lovely harmonies which he voiced for us, or join in the hymn singing which he led with such vigour and delight.

The promotion of peace and goodwill among men of all lands and races was dear to the heart of Mr. Harrison. The personal decorations he received from the rulers of France, Belgium, Austria, and other countries were an evidence of the high esteem in which he was held, and a recognition of his generous labours for the welfare of brethren living in other lands and professing varying creeds. On several interesting and important occasions he worthily represented the Unitarians of this country at meetings held in France, Germany, Switzerland, and Hungary. He had hoped to visit America in order to attend a great Peace Congress there, and also to see something of the Unitarian churches. It was his ambition on his retirement from business to devote the remaining years of his life to the work of inspiring and strengthening the moral and religious bonds which make the whole world akin.

But the call to lay down his life came before his wishes could be realised. Unforeseen difficulties and worries in his business affairs delayed his intended retirement. The labour troubles and unrest in France and England distressed and puzzled him greatly. He did not find it easy to believe that the rapid and fundamental social and industrial changes which are taking place in the world would make life any better for men than the old order to which he had himself been accustomed. The consequent anxiety and loss in connection with his business tended to wear him out. Then, again, the long and serious illness of his wife, followed by her death a year ago, further undermined his health; and his friends could see, if he did not recognise the fact himself, that the end of his active career was approaching. Recovery being hopeless, no one who loved him could have wished that his suffering should be prolonged. His peculiar place no one else can hope to fill; his genial and kindling presence will be sorely missed by many of us; his fine example of strong, unselfish service will abide as a precious memory, and an incentive to duty when we feel disposed to become slack and weary in our well-doing. Grateful for the good that was enshrined in the heart and displayed in the life of this son of the Manse, let us take courage and go forward with our several tasks until the call comes to us to lay down our lives. Would that it may be possible for the "well done, good and faithful servant," to be spoken of any of us as truthfully as it may be spoken of John Harrison.

Dr. Carpenter, the Principal of Manchester College, Oxford; the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, the late President of the National Conference; the Rev. J. J.

Wright, minister of the Chowbent Chapel, had each sent a message of appreciation and affection, and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie read what they said as follows:—

THE REV. DR. CARPENTER.

The Rev. Dr. Carpenter said:—"All who were privileged in any way to share Mr. Harrison's friendship must have felt the harmony of a noble nature. It was seen in his deep attachment to the religious faith which seemed to grow stronger as the years advanced, so that the lessons of his youth, enriched by the experience of life, upheld him through strenuous labour as well as through heavy personal trials. It was seen in his earnest devotion to the welfare of the ministry to which he was linked by beloved family ties, for which he had already given abundantly of his time, his thought, and his substance, and in the last year of his life had courageously undertaken labours which others must now carry through. No one could work with him without being impressed with his generosity in differences of view, his conciliatory temper in overcoming difficulties, his abounding personal kindness and goodwill. His modesty shone through the brief speeches, always apt and pointed, with which he adorned any public function in which he took part; while his private charities must have caused many to rise up and call him blessed. He shrank from no toil and evaded no responsibility in promoting the great religious cause to which his heart was given; and his love of the principles of Unitarian Christianity was no external attachment to a creed, it was the deep sentiment of his whole being in his daily walk with God. For this he found the fittest expression in music; and again and again in our worship, whether the gathering were large or small, he quickened our trust and awakened our thanksgiving, and opened for us springs of devotion which joined us spirit to spirit in common acts of praise and prayer. With Browning's Abt Vogler he could have said, 'The rest may reason and welcome, 'tis we musicians know.' Surely the heavenly harmonies were heard by him through the tumults and discords of earth, and they brought him a prophecy of peace and love and joy."

THE REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON.

The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson said:—"I join, with a heart deeply touched, in the tribute paid this day to our beloved and honoured friend. It has been my own inestimable privilege, during a critical time in the life of the churches which he loved with surpassing affection, to be thrown into very close and intimate relations with him. Loyal to his own convictions, with an enthusiastic devotion that was an inspiration to us all, he was the most peace-loving of men; and if he lived to see the diffusion amongst us of a spirit of harmonious co-operation that has been delightful, it has been born of his own infectious example in a degree which none know more truly than I. We are now garnering from it the abundant harvest, of which he was to have been the foremost reaper. I know, from his own lips, how he meant to have laboured in the front of those who were going forth, a united band, to do something to benefit our ministry through generations yet unborn. What is now being done with magnificent generosity by our laity will be written down by us on the tablets of our reverent memory as being the latest fruits of our dear friend's influence. It dies not with him who exerted it, and whose mortal part we commit to its last earthly resting-place in speechless affection, while we entrust his simple, earnest, Christian soul to the Eternal Father with a faith like his own that casts out fear."

THE REV. J. J. WRIGHT.

The Rev. J. J. Wright said:—"Chowbent Chapel, Lancashire, in the death of Mr. John Harrison, loses its most honoured son. Born in the old parsonage, during his father's distinguished ministry at the chapel, the influence of this place of worship upon John's early boyhood was such that, although more than sixty years of his maturer life were spent in London, it was always evident to those who knew him that he loved much the place of his birth and the chapel of his boyhood. Within the walls of this chapel, as he delighted to tell, there first awoke in him, while a child, the joy of music which he carried through life. There, too, he realised his earliest sense of public worship to which he was ever afterwards so devoted. The burial of his little brother within the chapel, in front of the pulpit, more than sixty years ago, he never forgot, and the depositing of the ashes of his eldest brother William in this same chapel some two years since was done by him as an affectionate and sacred duty. The minister and congregation of Chowbent Chapel, in united heartfelt sympathy, join to-day with the minister and congregation of Effra-road, Brixton, as well as with all our Churches and societies, in deeply mourning the death of Mr. John Harrison; yet rejoicing with him in the immortal life of love to which he has now attained—while reverently thanking God for the gift to us all of so true a friend, so good a man."

RESOLUTION OF THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY.

At a meeting of the Committee held on Tuesday afternoon the following resolution was moved by the President, the Rev. H. Gow, seconded by the Rev. F. H. Jones, and carried:—"The Committee of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South Eastern Counties wish to record their deep regret at the death of their beloved colleague and friend, Mr. John Harrison, and their great gratitude to him for all his many services to the Assembly. He was a member of the Committee for many years, President in the year 1901-2, and Treasurer from 1902 to 1908. His generosity and kindness were unbounded, his devotion to the needs of our weaker churches and his desire for fellowship and goodwill and brotherly helpfulness were prevailing motives in his life. The ministers in the Provinces found in him an especial friend. The Auxiliary Fund which he founded has been a yearly blessing to those ministers who, by its aid, have been enabled to join the Ministers' Pension Fund. His memory will be long cherished by all the societies for which he worked with such zeal to the last, but by none should it be treasured more proudly and tenderly than by our Provincial Assembly."

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire held its annual meeting at Southport on Wednesday, June 26. A service was held in the Unitarian Church, Portland-street, at 11.30 a.m., the preacher being the Rev. A. W. Fox, M.A., and the supporter the Rev. B. C. Constable. The church was filled to its utmost capacity. The sermon was from the text 1 Cor. ix. 16, "Woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel." It was an appeal for a missionary Church, covering somewhat familiar ground, but stirring the heart by its fervour of conviction and militant faith.

After luncheon in the Cambridge Hall the Business Meeting was held in the Temperance Institute at 2 p.m., the president, the Rev. R. Travers Herford, B.A., in the chair. There was a good attendance.

Before the calling of the roll, Blackpool (South Shore) and Garston were admitted to membership of the Assembly. This brings the total number of congregations on the roll to seventy-eight.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

The President delivered an exceedingly fine address which was followed with the deepest appreciation and interest. After a glance at the history and traditions of the Assembly, and the great part it had played in the development of the group of free churches of which it was the representative, came a reference to the changes in the roll of membership. They had erased from the roll of the Assembly, but not from the tablet of their memory, the names of the Rev. Silas Farrington, the Rev. Noah Green, the Rev. Edward Allen, the Rev. John Harrison, and the Rev. E. P. Barrow, names, some of which meant little perhaps to the younger generation, but which brought back many recollections of faithful service and long years of friendship to the minds of those who knew them. There had gone also from their roll the name of the Rev. William Edward Atack, no veteran of former days, but one who till a few weeks ago was spending all his powers in the strenuous duties of his ministry. At the annual meetings of the Assembly it was the custom to refer only to the ministers in noting the changes in the roll of members. He would, however, take the privilege of friendship to add to those whom he had mentioned the name of a layman, the late Mr. Thomas Harwood, of Bolton, a man who by his life and character might be called a true son of their Free Churches, and who by the work he did for them in his own neighbourhood, was looked up to as their trusted friend and counsellor. A cordial greeting was offered to those who had entered the Province during the last twelve months. They welcomed the Rev. Dr. Mellone and the Rev. H. McLachlan, of the Unitarian Home Missionary College; the Rev. N. J. H. Jones, of Ashton; the Rev. H. Chellew, of Pendleton; the Rev. W. J. Piggott, of Burnley; the Rev. A. Thornhill, of Gorton; the Rev. G. Pegler, of Crewe, and the Rev. Stanley Mellor, of Warrington. Proceeding the President made reference to the 250th anniversary of the ejection of the Two Thousand. Not in vain had they made their great sacrifice at the shrine of Faith and Freedom; and whoever else might be ignorant of them, or think lightly of what they did, they of the Provincial Assembly and of the kindred Free Churches throughout the country counted it their privilege that the tradition of the Two Thousand belonged especially to them. He would refrain from further reference because a special commemoration of the ejected ministers would take place on August 24, at the Memorial Hall, Manchester. Turning from the past to the present and future, the address made special reference to the feeling of tension between England and Germany, and to the present remarkable and even critical condition of the country. There was unrest and unsettlement in well-nigh every department of our national life. In politics, industry, art, literature, philosophy, religion, the "old order" was changing; and if it was "yielding place to new," that was as yet a hope rather than a certainty. That it was an interesting and exciting age to be living in no one would deny. It was a time full of perplexity, yet also full of promise; and if it forced upon them problems of which the solution was not yet discovered, that was not to say that they should give up the attempt to solve them. They felt the pressure of them in their own church life, when they had to cope with difficulties not felt fifty years ago; but they were not, on that account, going to despair of their church life, even if for a while they did not make the progress they should like to make. For his own part he was not afraid of the future, though he could not pretend to foresee developments. He did not believe that the ground truths of religion and morality, the facts of human nature and the principles on which all social life ultimately rested, were in any real danger of being undermined or swept away. They were very much hidden from view at the present time certainly, by reason of what might be called the cloud of dust raised by the unsettlement of thought all over the field of human life. The dust and confusion were, in themselves, by no means agreeable, but he saw no reason for supposing that it was all up with mankind in general or their own nation in particular. He thought it much more likely that their descendants, fifty years hence would wonder why they got into such a state of uneasiness, and how they could be so blind as not to see the nobler fabric of the national life which was being built, the fairer form of humanity which was being moulded into shape, and which they—their descendants—beheld. It was not impossible to get to the root of the confusion of the present time, to find the main source from which it had sprung. He should say that the leading feature of the whole was a desire to break from authority. There was heard, or believed to be heard a call to freedom; and those who heard it were trying to answer it in all sorts of ways. That which stood in the way of freedom was authority, the authority of the past, the authority of institutions, beliefs, ideas. The call to freedom set many people on breaking away from all authority, on devising wild schemes for reconstructing social life, extravagant doctrines in religion, theories of morality which had little beside the name to show that they were moral, and on doing and saying what could only shock the feelings of more sober-minded people in general. Was this not, on the whole, to be explained as the effect of the idea of freedom upon minds which were somewhat excitable and unbalanced? He was far from saying that all the new ideas which were talked of in religion, philosophy, literature, and art were freaks of a disturbed imagination. Amongst these new ideas were assuredly the ones which would become the master words of a later age; though, as yet, it would be rash to say which they were. But certainly not all the new ideas would be permanent. And it was no harsh judgment to say that some, at all events, of the extravagant notions, the extreme theories, the freaks of up-to-date poets, painters, musicians, Bible critics, philosophers, scientists and anarchists in politics, religion and morals—that some of these notions were only the effect of the idea of freedom upon unstable characters and unbalanced minds. The need of the present time was to keep hold of faith in God, and not only to keep hold of faith, but to increase and strengthen it, and that all the more because religion was one of the subjects in regard to which the breaking away from authority and traditional belief and old usage was most noticeable. He did not think that the revolt on the field of religion was a revolt against the belief in God. It was much more a revolt against churches as institutions, claiming authority as from God. The authority so claimed might go; indeed, he thought it had gone. But the church as a means of ministering to religion and helping to give expression to it had not gone, and he saw no reason to believe that it ever would go. In some form or another it would continue to provide the opportunity for public worship and the source of inspiration for men's highest life and best work. It was for them to maintain public worship not as a mere habit but as the means of refreshing and restoring the spiritual nature through real communion with God; and to come to the place of worship not as the languid pastime of an occasional Sunday when they could find nothing else to do, but as the fulfilment of a serious duty, the seeking of what should minister to a real need. The revolt against authority was in its final, deepest meaning, the revolt from the authority which was less than that of God, when that lower authority would prevent the mind from rising to the height of its calling, and from becoming what He intended it to be. His was the one final and supreme authority, and in his service there was perfect freedom. And when the confusion of this time was passed away, its errors forgotten and only its truth left standing gloriously, men would know the truth, and the truth would make them free.

After the address the business was proceeded with as expeditiously as possible. It was announced that Mr. J. Wigley was elected President for 1912-13. The treasurer, Mr. J. Dendy, and the secretaries, the Revs. H. E. Dowson and N. Anderton were re-elected. The Rev. G. Payne was elected Supporter for 1913.

MINISTERS' SALARIES.

The Committee's report on Missionary work in the Province, and on Public Questions, having been received, a resolution was moved by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson and seconded by Mr. F. Monks in support of the scheme for the increase of ministers' salaries, which had been accepted by the Committees of the National Conference, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Sustentation Fund, and the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund, and had finally received the unanimous assent of the National Conference in April last. In the course of his speech Mr. Dowson made the welcome announcement that promises had already been made of £22,500 towards the £30,000 required. It might be possible to raise £50,000, as had been suggested. The resolution was carried unanimously.

EDUCATION.

The Rev. C. Peach then moved and the Rev. Dendy Agate seconded the following resolution on Education, which was carried unanimously: "The Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire thanks the Prime Minister for his promise of legislation on the Education Question in the Session of 1913, and while reaffirming its repeated protests against the imposition of sectarian tests on teachers, or the concession of a Sectarian Right of Entry into Council Schools, urges that having regard to the state of parties in Parliament and to the congested state of public business it is desirable that the proposals to be submitted should be limited to the making of such adequate building grants as will make possible the provision of Council Schools within reach of all children of school age."

FRIENDSHIP WITH GERMANY.

The following resolution on friendship with Germany was moved and seconded by Mr. J. Wigley and Mr. A. Nicholson respectively, and carried:—

"That while heartily welcoming the sincere endeavour that is now being made to restore the traditional friendship between England and Germany, this Assembly desires to express its profound regret at the strained relations which have taken the place of that long-established amity, entailing the intolerable burden of naval armament to whose increase there appears to be no limit, while this rivalry of force threatens possibilities of international strife too awful to contemplate. That this Assembly raises its voice in solemn appeal to the two Christian nations born of a common stock, and with the unbroken record of peace and goodwill that has knit them together in the past, to banish as an evil dream the spirit of suspicion and distrust that imperils their future, and to grasp hands in friendship never to be broken."

During the afternoon the following Committees were elected:—Advisory Committee: Revs. D. Agate, H. E. Dowson, R. T. Herford, S. H. Mellone, J. J. Wright, Messrs J. R. Beard, H. Coventry, J. Dendy, G. H. Leigh, and J. Wigley.

General Committee: Revs. A. W. Fox, R. T. Herford, J. M. Mills, G. A. Payne, C. Peach, W. Short, W. A. Weatherall, J. J. Wright, Miss Dornan, Mrs. J. W. Haigh, Messrs. J. R. Beard, H. P. Greg, C. S.

Jones, A. Nicholson, P. M. Oliver, T. F. Robinson.

Tea was provided in the Cambridge Hall at 5 o'clock, and the evening meeting was held in the Temperance Institute at 6 o'clock, Mr. Arthur S. Thew, J.P., in the chair. After the opening hymn the retiring President expressed the warm thanks of the Assembly to the minister and congregation of the Portland-street Church for their generous and kindly hospitality.

The Rev. R. N. Cross and Dr. Harris made suitable acknowledgments on behalf of the Southport congregation. A letter of greeting was read from the Mayor of Southport, Mr. Councillor F. T. Reynolds.

Addresses were afterwards delivered by the Rev. H. E. Dowson on "Public Worship," Mr. A. Pilling, of Bolton, on "Church Membership," and the Rev. C. M. Wright, of Sale, on "Faith."

PRESBYTERIAN COLLEGE, CARMARTHEN.

THE session was brought to a close on Wednesday afternoon, June 26, when the prize distribution to the successful students took place in the presence of a numerous gathering. The deputation from the Presbyterian Board consisted of Dr. Dawes Hicks, Professor of Philosophy in the University of London; Mr. Harold Baily, Dr. Tudor Jones, Mr. Ronald Jones, and Mr. G. H. Clennell (secretary), who, in the work of examination, were assisted by Dr. Talfourd Ely, of Claygate; and the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, M.A., of Bolton.

Of the 34 students of the College, four were reported to be sitting for the B.D. examination of the University of Wales with every prospect of success. The others had, with a few exceptions, acquitted themselves with much credit at the College examinations.

Professor G. Dawes Hicks, who presided over the proceedings at the close of the examinations, after paying a warm tribute to the work of Principal Evans and the other members of the College staff, delivered an address, which is reported in full in our present issue. He was followed by other members of the deputation.

Mr. Harold Baily said he was sorry to say that the elocution had been in many cases a poor performance. Neither in the Nonconformist churches nor in the Established Church was there sufficient attention given to elocution.

Dr. Tudor Jones, who spoke in Welsh, said there had been excellent papers on Ecclesiastical History. This was an important subject, and he did not think anybody had a right to be a minister except he were well versed in it.

Mr. Ronald Jones said that he regretted his lack of knowledge of the Welsh language all the more because he had heard Dr. Tudor Jones mention his name. He had not conducted any examination; his duty as a member of the deputation had been to tap the walls and to be able to assure the Board that the walls were not falling down. He did not suppose there was any need to speak there against the tendency to regard ministers as priests. He thought, however, there was a danger of the opposite error—to regard ministers as only particularly zealous laymen. A minister ought not to throw himself into social service to the exclusion of his spiritual work.

Mr. Clennell, the secretary of the Board, expressed regret at the numerous breakdowns in health on the part of the students, and hoped they would pay more attention to their physical health.

Dr. Talfourd Ely, Professor Lewis (Aberystwyth), Principal Evans, Professor Moore, and Professor Morris Owen also spoke, and the Rev. J. Dyfnallt Owen concluded the meeting with prayer.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Birmingham.—The annual united service for the schools of the Midland Sunday School Association was held in the Town Hall on June 23. The service was conducted by the Rev. J. Hipperson (Oldbury), and an address on "Play" was given by the Rev. Joseph Wood. The hall was nearly full. The anthem "He Watereth the Hills" was sung by a choir from several schools and churches. On the following Saturday a teachers' ramble should have been held to Dudley Castle, but the wet weather did not allow this to be carried out. The monthly "Record" has considerably increased the interest of the teachers in the Association. This will be published for eight months during 1912, and for the remaining months the "Sunday School Quarterly" will take its place. The circulation is about 400 copies among teachers and members of congregations.

Clifton: Induction of New Minister.—The induction of Dr. G. F. Beckh as minister of Oakfield-road Church took place on Tuesday, June 25. Dr. Estlin Carpenter officiated, and the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, Mr. P. J. Worsley, and Mr. W. A. Templar Price took part in welcoming the new pastor. Dr. Estlin Carpenter, after he had conducted the introductory service, said that Dr. Beckh brought to his work many valuable gifts. In that congregation, which would soon celebrate the jubilee of its foundation, he would find a tradition of personal piety, devout, with service for the common good, which deserved honour and reverence from those who undertook the high function of speech and counsel upon Divine things. He had to unite for a little the double duties of teacher and student, and they would make great demands upon his strength. He was there as a helper, not as a ruler; he might labour long, and the results might not be as he expected or hoped. Let him accept humbly the limitations of his powers. Love which was based on understanding could sustain disappointment. Modesty would be his safeguard, and on the integrity of those around he would rest for support. To that ministry of life he commended him. The Rev. R. H. U. Bloor welcomed Dr. Beckh into the ministry on behalf of the congregation. He recollected that it was under his ministry, and through coming to his house and talking to him, that Dr. Beckh first felt a desire to become a minister. Speaking of much of the literature of the day, he said it lost sight of man as an individual with the background of God. They had men with the institutional idea, politicians and others, who said if they made an institution they had a perfect machine-made man. He protested against that; man was more than that; they had to speak of each man as an individual soul, with infinite possibilities both for heaven and hell. He knew Dr. Beckh would not regret the step he had taken in becoming their pastor. The Rev. A. N. Blatchford also extended a welcome to Dr. Beckh, and said it was his privilege to do so in the ranks of his faithful brethren in the district of the west. In the names of the ministers of the churches with which it had been his joy and pride to have been so long associated, he bade him a loving welcome, and offered him the right hand of fellowship. Mr. P. J. Worsley said that it was with a sense of renewed hope that the congregation welcomed Dr. Beckh. Mr. W. A. Templar Price (treasurer of Lewin's Mead) congratulated Oakfield-road Church on having for a minister such an earnest man as Dr. Beckh. The two congregations with their ministers might make a stand in that old city for all that was true and good for the religious and moral life of the city of Bristol. Dr. Beckh, in his reply, promised that with his heart and soul he would throw what was in him on the side of religion and God. He was pleased to have words of welcome from Mr. Blatchford, who 46 years ago was welcomed by Mr. Worsley. He thanked them for their trust and confidence in what his powers might be able to do. Among letters of regret for absence was one from Mr. Charles Hawksley, president of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, enclosing £10 towards the funds of the church.

London: Islington.—Before commencing his sermon last Sunday morning, June 30, at Unity Church, Dr. Tudor Jones gave expression to the profound regret felt by himself and the congregation at the death of Mr. John Harrison. His steadfast loyalty to the Unitarian cause, his earnest efforts to promote international peace, his unselfishness and generous help to those in need, will make the loss keenly felt, not only in England but in many countries of the world.

Lydgate Chapel.—On Wednesday, Thursday and Saturday last week, a successful bazaar was held in the recently erected "Oliver Heywood Memorial School" for the purpose of raising funds to pay off the debt remaining on the building, which was opened in September last. The bazaar was opened on Wednesday by Mrs. Anthony, of Hampstead, London; on Thursday by E. O. Dodgson, Esq., of Leeds; and on Saturday by the scholars of the Sunday school. The total proceeds amount to about £120, leaving £80 still to raise to make the building free of debt. On Sunday last the Sunday school anniversary services were held, the preacher being the Rev. Charles Hargrove, of Leeds.

Newbury.—A sale of work and garden party was opened at Newbury on Dr. Hickman's lawn, last Wednesday afternoon, by Mrs. Walter Baily, of Hampstead. The Mayor of Newbury presided; there were also present the Mayoress, Dr. and Mrs. Hickman, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Hickman, the Revs. R. Newell and J. Kinnish (Primitive Methodist), and many other prominent townspeople. The object of the effort was to clear off a debt of about £50, and to raise a sum sufficient to repair and beautify the chapel. In opening the proceedings, the Mayor mentioned that he had attended the previous Sunday evening's service, and there was no doubt in his mind that the chapel was greatly in need of beautifying within and without. He hoped the congregation would realise their purpose in this bazaar, for the old chapel, which had stood since 1664, was an ornament and historic feature of the town. He commended this object most earnestly to the inhabitants of Newbury. Mrs. Baily referred to her husband's family connections with Newbury, in the Mayor of 1773, whose house she had visited that day, and in Francis Baily, the astronomer, who was the friend of Priestley and Herschell. He published several important scientific books. One very important work he did, which was of world-wide interest, was the rectification of the Nautical Calendar. It gave her great pleasure to pay this visit to the interesting old town, and to open this sale of work, which she hoped would be very successful. The Rev. R. Newell proposed a vote of thanks to Mrs. Baily for opening the sale, which was seconded by the Rev. J. Kinnish, who expressed his pleasure at being able to take part in these proceedings, and to show his cordial goodwill towards his Unitarian friends in their work. Mr. T. H. Stillman, Dr. Hickman, Mr. Lewendon, and others also spoke. The result of the sale of work amounted to £51; there is, therefore, a considerable sum to be raised by further effort and appeals before the much desired object can be realised.

Pudsey.—It is gratifying to record that recently the Pudsey Ministers' "Fraternal" admitted the Unitarian minister, the Rev. G. A. Ferguson, as a member, and that at their last meeting they unanimously recorded their appreciation of Mr. Ferguson's services in writing his little book, "How a Modern Atheist found God." All the members were advised to read it and to recommend it to their friends.

Richmond: Memorial to the Rev. S. Farrington.—We should like to draw attention to the proposed memorial to the Rev. Silas Farrington which his various friends are anxious to place in the church at Richmond. It has not yet been decided what form the memorial shall take, but a committee has been formed for the purpose of considering the matter, and they will be glad to receive suggestions on the subject from friends interested in the scheme. If it is decided to place a window in the church, between £70 and £80 will be required. About £50 has already been received. The treasurer of the fund is Mr. L. Clennell, 42, Elm-road, East Sheen, and contributions may be sent either to him or to Mrs. G. H. Edwards, The Barns, Eastcote, Middlesex.

Sheffield and District Sunday School Union.—The Sheffield and District Unitarian and Free Christian Sunday School Union held its quarterly meeting at Stannington on June 29. The president gave a hearty welcome to the representatives from Bolton-on-Deane, who were present for the first time since they and Mexbro' Sunday schools joined the Union. After the ordinary business had been transacted Miss E. Wilson read a paper on "Personal Riches, or The Social Ideal." Miss Wilson avoided the political aspect of the question and laid emphasis on the idea of spiritual riches. These, and the personal qualities of individuals, were of much greater worth and importance to hand on to their children than worldly riches, though the latter might be looked upon as a form of strength if used in the service of mankind. A brief discussion followed.

Whitchurch, Salop: Resignation.—The Rev. W. J. Pond has tendered his resignation to the congregation of the Church of the Saviour, and will terminate his ministry on the last Sunday in August.

Yorkshire.—The annual excursion in connection with the Yorkshire Sunday School Union and Unitarian Club took place on June 22. A large number of friends assembled at Drighlington, and the party were conducted through the "Shirley" country by Mr. Porret, visiting several places of interest enumerated by Charlotte Brontë in her well-known novel. Birstal, the birthplace of Joseph Priestley, was also visited.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A SUMMER SCHOOL FOR RELIGIOUS STUDY.

A gathering of members of the Society of Friends, and others who are in general accord with its ideals, will be held under the auspices of the Woodbrooke Extension Committee at Woodbrooke, Selly Oak, near Birmingham, from August 17 to 26. For those who are not acquainted with Woodbrooke, it may be mentioned that it was founded in 1903, as a settlement for religious and social study, for Friends and others. It now accommodates about fifty students of both sexes, Dr. J. Rendel Harris being the Director of Studies. A series of lectures will be delivered at the Summer School by Miss M. Carta Sturge, Mr. Leonard Doncaster, Mr. Herbert G. Wood, Mr. G. Currie Martin (late secretary of the London Missionary Society), and Mr. Edward Grubb, the editor of the British Friend. The general subject to be considered is "Christian Faith and Modern Thought."

A SCHOOL AND HOSPITAL FOR CRIPPLED CHILDREN.

An appeal has reached us on behalf of an institution in Salford, which was opened ten years ago, for the benefit of children among the poorer residents who are threatened with permanent ill-health or physical deformity. Here, as a result of fresh air and good feeding, skilled massage and suitable physical exercises, the lame learn to walk, and a unique work is being done for which more adequate support is required. The buildings are shortly to be enlarged in consequence of the generosity of a kind donor. The large buildings will involve considerable increase in expenditure, but if every parent who reads this appeal were to send even the small sum of one penny for each child of their own endowed with health and strength, it is believed that sufficient money would be realised to place this small hospital at Salford in a position of financial security. Contributions will be gratefully received by Mrs. Read Mumford, 44, Wilmslow-road, Withington, Manchester.

A MEMORIAL OF SHELLEY AND KEATS.

The Keats-Shelley Memorial Souvenir published by the Bookman, in connection with the recent matinées at the Haymarket Theatre, is one of the most interesting special numbers which has been published by this popular literary monthly. It contains numerous portraits, a couserie on the two poets by H. Buxton Forman, an article on Shelley by William Watson, and several reprints, including "Notes on Shelley's Birthplace," written thirty-three years ago by W. Hale White (Mark Rutherford) for Macmillan's Magazine, and some extracts from an article on Keats, by Joseph Severn, which appeared in the Atlantic Monthly in 1863.

A SINGER OF THE HEIGHTS.

William Watson lays his finger on Shelley's essential characteristic when he describes him as one with "the air of being but a medium of communication, the conducting channel between his hearers and some more elemental influence, which the primitive imagination personified as the Muse." In his portraits he always appears to be listening to melodies which haunt the souls of other men without becoming audible to them, and his genius belongs to that transcendent order which has scarcely any roots in the homely earth. "It is true that he sings in an air too rarefied for ordinary lungs to breathe in," as William Watson says, "but then, we are not called upon to breathe in it as we listen; it is enough that he can sing there, and that the song is none the less melodious because it flutters down to us from where foot cannot follow . . . Wisdom is not especially the gift he has to give us, whilst he has other gifts for us in abundance. . . And song, after all, is not so much either Truth or Wisdom as the rose upon Truth's lips and the light in Wisdom's eyes."

RODIN AS A SPEECH-MAKER.

Apropos of speech-making, we are reminded of an amusing account which was given in the Manchester Guardian a short time ago by a correspondent of two speeches made by M. Rodin—one extremely long and the other distressingly short. The former was made at a dinner given in his honour about eight years ago at the Café Royal:—

"Rodin, when he rose, had of course an immense ovation, and we all expected that the dear, great old man, so nobly articulate in marble, so irresistibly eloquent in bronze, would in this other medium be (not less nobly and irresistibly) bashed—would but mutter a few broken words straight from the great heart of him, try to mutter some more, fail, beg our pardon, and sit down heavily in a scene of enthusiasm passing all bounds. That was not his way. He produced a great roll of typewritten matter, settled his pince-nez with more than its usual firmness, and proceeded to read to us very firmly, very quietly, an essay on the Ideal—an essay which might have been composed by Bulwer Lytton himself, so very facile and florid was it, or perhaps by Canova, and yet had really and truly (so I was told by a trustworthy Frenchman who sat next to me) been composed by the rugged guest of the evening."

* * *

"The other speech that I heard him deliver," the writer continues, "was of a less ambitious (and, I thought, a better) order. It was on the occasion of the opening of an exhibition of the International Society at the New Gallery. And I remember it word for word with special clearness, because I had later the privilege of reading it, in the master's own handwriting, on the back of an envelope. He had, I suppose, written it there in order that there should be no possibility of his breaking down, and he afterwards used the envelope for scribbling some instructions to a friend. The friend preserved, and reverently preserves, the envelope. The speech was as follows:—'Monsieur l'Ambassadeur, Messieurs, Mesdames, l'Exposition est ouverte.'"

HOW TO SECURE THE BEST ANNUITY TERMS.

Incomes Increased Fourfold on Gilt-Edged Security.

Does your invested capital yield an income adequate to your requirements? Thousands of men and women with a moderate capital live a pinched and monotonous existence, when they might, if they knew how, double, treble and even quadruple their incomes, rendering them absolutely fixed and certain for life, and enjoy security that is not surpassed by any in the world.

This result may be obtained by the Purchase of an Annuity from one of the old-established and enormously wealthy Life Insurance Offices.

EXAMPLE.—£2,000 invested in ordinary high-class Securities will yield only £70 to £80 a year. Invested in an Annuity by a man aged 50, it will produce as much as £150 a year—by a man aged 60, £194 a year—aged 70, £275 a year (ladies receive slightly less). If the Investor is in really bad health the Annuity would be larger.

The Purchase of an Annuity will place you in the longest lived class in the world. Statistics prove that Life Office Annuitants live longer than any other class—the result of absolute freedom from financial worry. An Annuity never fluctuates, and never depreciates; it is a sure, certain and steady INCOME FOR LIFE.

About two-and-a-half million pounds a year is invested annually in Life Insurance Annuities.

The Various Uses of Annuities:

Husbands and wives buy Joint Annuities, for the lives of both. Fathers buy Annuities, paid for by small annual deposits, for infant children, to pay for future Educational Expenses.

Husbands buy, with small yearly deposits, Annuities for Wives to live on should they die.

Saving Men buy an Annuity to commence on retirement.

Some Actual Examples of Annuities.

A retired solicitor in impaired health, aged 74, deposits £6,000, and receives an Annuity of £1,000 a year for life, thus increasing his income fourfold.

Three sisters, aged 62, 69, and 72, deposit £1,500, and receive a joint Annuity of £135, payable half-yearly until the death of the last survivor.

A husband, aged 75, and his wife, 70, whose total worldly possessions amount to £2,000, on which they were realising £80 per annum, invested the whole in an Annuity, realising at once a joint income of £239, paid half-yearly during their joint lives, to be reduced to £179 after the death of the first.

Mrs. B—R—, aged 62, had £1,000 invested in securities yielding an income of £35 a year. By transferring the capital to an Annuity her income would have been increased to £93 a year, but, being in slightly impaired health, she obtained an Annuity of £105 a year, just thrice the amount formerly received.

L—K—, aged 52, had £2,000 invested in property which gave continual trouble and necessitated continuous attention. He was averse to purchasing an ordinary Annuity owing to his being the father of a young family. The company therefore granted him an Annuity of £126 a year for life, but guaranteed that, in the event of his death, the Annuity should be continued as before until his youngest child attained 21 years of age.

Miss J—A—, a lady of independent means, bought £2,000 of Consols in 1903, for which she paid £1,800. The income derived from this investment has been £50 a year. Early in 1912 this lady needed a larger income, realised her Consols for £1,600, and, being now 50 years of age, has obtained an Annuity of £109 per annum—more than double her former income.

Sir ———, aged 68, with slightly impaired health, invested £10,000, and secured an Annuity of £1,528 per annum, payable quarterly, and is arranging for a similar amount for Lady ———, his wife.

F—M—, an accountant, age 35, single, secured an Annuity of £91 16s. payable half-yearly, beginning at age 60. In event of his not reaching that age, his deposits are all returned. The annual deposit for this is £25 3s. It is, however, provided that should he marry, he may, from that date, increase the annual deposits by £9 4s., and, in addition to the other benefits, secure for his wife £1,000 at his death if he should not reach 60.

G—H—J—, aged 37, has a baby boy and another son aged two. He foresees that when they reach 15 their education will be getting expensive. He secures an Annuity of £100 a year for five years for each, beginning at 15 and continuing until 19. For the first he pays 15 annual instalments of £28 4s. each, and for the second 13 instalments of £32 18s. In the event of the father's death no further instalments will be required, and the Annuities will be paid just as if he had lived. Moreover, the Company will at once begin to pay £32 19s. yearly to assist in the elementary education of the boys until they reach 15, when the Annuities of £100 to each begin.

How to Secure the Best Annuity Terms.

The purchaser of an Annuity has one difficulty to surmount. There are no less than sixty-six different Life Offices issuing Annuities. All of them are perfectly secure, but some of them give much higher benefits than others. For example, one office gives only £81 16s. 8d. a year for each £1,000 deposited by a man aged 60. Another, with equal security, gives £97 a year for the same sum.

Then, again, some offices pay the stamp duty on the Annuity Bond—some do not, but leave the Annuitant to pay it.

Some offices will give much better terms if the Annuitant is in bad health—some will not, and so on.

The Purchaser of an Annuity desirous of obtaining the best terms should not attempt to judge for himself which of these 66 offices is the best, but should consult an experienced Insurance Broker. It costs absolutely nothing to do so, for the Broker's remuneration is a small fee, paid him by the Insurance Office selected, if business is completed.

All interested in any Form of Annuity are invited to enquire either by letter (stating what kind of Annuity interests them, and giving their date of birth, without which it is impossible to give an exact quotation) or on the following form, which may be filled in and to ensure privacy should be inserted in an envelope addressed to Mr. W. H. AUSTIN, Insurance Broker, 4 & 5, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

All Enquiries are cheerfully and promptly answered free of all cost, whether business results or not. Exact examples are furnished with full details of security.

Enquiry Form.

I was born on the.....day of.....

in the year..... Kindly inform me which Insurance Office will give me the best terms for Annuity, supposing I invested £.....

The present state of my health is.....
(Insert here good, indifferent, bad, very bad, &c.)

NAME AND TITLE

ADDRESS.....

(Please write clearly.)

The International Visits Association

Founded for the Purpose of Studying the Customs and Institutions of Other Countries.

THE SEVENTH VISIT TO DENMARK.

August 13-23, 1912.

The arrangements include visits to Frederiksborg High School for the Danish People, Koerhave Agricultural School for Cottagers and Cottagers' Wives, a Co-operative Dairy, an Agricultural Museum, the Open-air Museum at Lyngby, a Home for Old Age Pensioners, a Labour Bureau, a Co-operative Bakery, the Training School for Domestic Servants, the Finsen Light Institute.

THE THIRD VISIT TO HOLLAND.

July 23-August 2, 1912.

The arrangements include visits to Rotterdam, Amsterdam, and the Hague, a Cheese Factory, an Automatic Auction, Small Market Gardens, "Polders," the Club of the Diamond Workers' Union, &c.

All particulars may be had from the Hon. Sec., Miss F. M. BUTLIN, Old Headington, Oxford.

The inclusive cost will not exceed Eight Guineas for the visit to Denmark, and Six Guineas for the visit to Holland.

The Inquirer.

Among recent articles are the following :—

Bicentenary of Jean Jacques Rousseau.
By FOSTER WATSON. June 29.

Types of English Piety. By Rev. E. W. LEWIS. June 29.

Church Life in Scotland. By Rev. R. NICOL CROSS. June 22 & 29.

Love among the Ruins. By Professor G. DAWES HICKS. June 22.

A Plea for Miracle. By Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS. June 22.

The Church and the Living God. By Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, D.D. June 15

This Generation. By Rev. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D. June 8.

Any of the above issues to be obtained from THE PUBLISHER, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. Post free 1½d.

TYPEWRITING.

SERMONS, ARTICLES, and MS. of every description accurately typed. 1s. per thousand words. Price List on application.—Miss KENNEDY, 21, Cheverton-road, Hornsey-lane, N.

An Ideal Holiday

can be spent at the Vegetarian Society's Summer School at Arnside, Westmoreland, from July 27 to August 31.

Illustrated Prospectus free on application to Dept. A. 257, Deansgate, Manchester.

UNIVERSITY HALL,

Gordon Square, W.C.
(Between Russell Square and Euston Square.)

Services at 11.15 and 7.

PREACHER (both Services) :

July 7.—Rev. Dr. ESTLIN CARPENTER (Principal of Manchester College, Oxford).

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,
ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—SIR ALEXANDER WALDEMAR LAWRENCE, Bart.

Deputy-Chairman—F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I.

LESLIE T. BURNETT. Miss CECIL GRADWELL.
Miss ORME. HUMPHREY G. RUSSELL.

A SAFE AND SOUND INVESTMENT
FOR LARGE OR SMALL SUMS.

Save 5/- Monthly. Subscription Preference Shares of £20 each are issued suitable for small investors. Payable 5/- monthly and they receive 4 per cent. interest.

Preference Shares of £10 each now receive 4 per cent. interest free of income tax.

Deposits received at 3 and 3½ per cent. free of income tax.

Investments are withdrawable at any time on short notice.

Repayments, Survey Fees, and Law Charges low. Prospectus free.

HENRY T. WRIGHT, Manager.

NOW READY FOR JULY.

The Sunday School Quarterly.

Edited by J. ARTHUR PEARSON.

CONTENTS.

The Power of Suggestion. Edgar Thackray, (M.A., Ph.D.)

A Bygone Village. Emma C. Drummond.
A School in Madagascar. T. F. M. Brockway.
Reading for Children. Charles Roper, B.A.
Gotama Buddha. George Burnett Stallworthy.
The Song of the Sea. Manley B. Townsend.
The Theory and Practice of Sunday School Teaching
—II. A. Stephen Noel.
Man or Priest. Rupert Holloway.
The Use of the Bible. Florence Mawson, B.A.
Notes for Teachers.—XVI.—XXX.
Arthur Brooke.
Bertram Lister, M.A.
T. M. Falconer, B.Litt.
F. J. Gould.
H. V. Mills.

Heroes of Faith.—Joseph Priestley. Albert Thornhill, Training. Alma Attwell. (M.A.)
Baptismal Hymn. R. Nicol Cross, M.A.
By the Way.—Teachers' Reference Library.

Threepence net, Postage 1d.

London :

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION,
Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

WHAT ARE WE?

A Question never yet Answered by
Christian Scientists.

PRICE 1d., Post Free.

From the Author,

EDWARD A. SUTTON, 4, South Cliff, Eastbourne.

"A Masterpiece of Brevity and Clearness."

Board and Residence, &c.

S.T. LEONARDS-ON-SEA. — "Cranstock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE and FLATS; most comfortable throughout. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard and smoke room sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCs.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Prospectus on application.

SUSSEX Lanes and Downs.—Board-Residence or Apartments in Country Cottage. Reference kindly permitted to Rev. and Mrs. HENRY GOW, Hampstead.—Z., INQUIRER OFFICE, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

LOW GREEN HOUSE, THORALBY, LAYSGARTH, S.O., YORKS.—Paying Guests received.—Particulars from Miss SMITH.

SURREY.—Home offered Child or Invalid Lady; experienced care, bracing air, good garden. Medical and other recommendations.—M. B., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex street, Strand, W.C.

LISCARD, near New Brighton.—To be Let, furnished, for six or twelve months, comfortable, well-furnished house; good garden. Three minutes from shops and Unitarian church. Penny train to beach and all ferries for Liverpool.—F. R., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED
WHITE
& BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

FREE!—Over 200 Patterns of charming Irish Linen Summer Costume Fabric "Flaxzella." Washable, wears for years. Scores of fascinating designs, beautiful shades. Sale Catalogue FREE. Write.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

SALE BARGAINS!—Genuine White Art Irish Linen Remnants, big pieces, suitable for making Teacloths, Traycloths, D'oyles, &c., 2s. 6d. per bundle; postage 4d. Catalogue FREE. Write to-day.—HUTTON'S, 5, Larne, Ireland.

OLD FALSE TEETH. — We give highest possible prices for above. Offers made; if unacceptable, teeth returned. Dealers in Old Gold or Silver in any form. Bankers' references; straightforward dealing. —WOOLFALL & Co., Southport.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS LTD. 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.4. and Published by THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd. at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, July 6, 1912.

Regarding Advertisement Rates see inside Front Cover.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.]

[REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3655.
NEW SERIES, No. 759.]

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 13, 1912.

[ONE PENNY.]

A UNIQUE SUMMER HOLIDAY AT St. Michael's Hall, Hove.

A Mansion approached by Lodge entrance and carriage drive through avenue of trees. House and lawns entirely secluded in beautiful wooded grounds near sea.

Five Tennis Courts for use of guests. Bathing, Fishing, Boating unequalled. Easy access to lovely Sussex Downs, Golf Links, etc. Lectures, Concerts, Excursions.

Prospectus from SECRETARY, Benares House, Food Reform Boarding Establishment, Norfolk Terrace, Brighton.

WHITE STAR TOURING CLUB.

(President, Mr. William Carter, Parkstone.)

- July 5. Montreux, 16 days, £8.
Hon. Conductor, Councillor ROYSTON.
- August 2. Lugano, 16 days, £9 9s.
Hon. Conductor, Mr. W. CARTER.
- August 2. Montreux, 16 days, £8.
Hon. Conductor, Rev. T. P. SPEDDING.
- August 30. Lugano, 16 days, £9 9s.
Hon. Conductor, Councillor ROYSTON.
- August 30. Interlaken, 16 days, £8 12s. 6d.
Hon. Conductor, Rev. R. B. MORRISON.
NO EXTRAS.

The above prices include full programme of Excursions.
Particulars from the White Star Touring Club, 27, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

SWISS-TYROL-ITALIAN borders.—Mr. LUMMIS' party will leave on August 1 (fortnight, 14 guineas; month, 19 guineas, cheap tickets to the Grisons also arranged).—15, Green-street, Cambridge.

Southern Unitarian Association.

ANNUAL MEETING
AT RINGWOOD,
WEDNESDAY, JULY 17.
BUSINESS MEETING, 2.30. SERVICE AT 6.
Preacher: Rev. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D.
LUNCH at 1 (1s. 6d.). Tea, 4.45 (6d.).

BRIXTON UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

THE Rev. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D., will preach at the Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, Brixton, on the evening of Sunday, July 14, 1912. Service at 7 p.m.

BOOKS

On Literary, Educational, Scientific, Technical, Medical Law, Theological, and ALL other Subjects.
Second-Hand at Half Prices.
Catalogues Free. State Wants. Books Bought.
BOOKS SENT ON APPROVAL.
W. & G. FOYLE, 135, Charing Cross Rd., London, W.C.

The Inquirer.

Among recent articles are the following:—

- The Church and Human Life. By Professor G. DAWES HICKS. July 6.
- Bicentenary of Jean Jacques Rousseau. By FOSTER WATSON. June 29.
- Types of English Piety. By Rev. E. W. LEWIS. June 29.
- Church Life in Scotland. By Rev. R. NICOL CROSS. June 22 & 29.
- Love among the Ruins. By Professor G. DAWES HICKS. June 22.
- A Plea for Miracle. By Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS. June 22.
- Any of the above issues to be obtained from THE PUBLISHER, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. Post free 1½d.

UNIVERSITY HALL, Gordon Square, W.C.

(Between Russell Square and Euston Square.)

Services at 11.15 and 7.

PREACHER (both Services):

- July 14.—Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE (Secretary, British and Foreign Unitarian Association).
- „ 21.—Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME (of Brighton).
- „ 28.—Rev. VALENTINE D. DAVIS (of Bournemouth).

After July 28, the Hall will be closed until September 22, when the services will be resumed.

PEARL ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Offices: London Bridge, E.C.

P. J. FOLEY, Esq., President.

Annual Income £2,949,000
Claims Paid exceed £12,700,000
Additional Representatives Wanted.

F. D. BOWLES, } Managing
G. SHRUBSALL, } Directors.

BAD KREUZNACH, near Wiesbaden. HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.—Domestic and scientific training. Special attention to English pupils. Excellent pronunciation. North German Head Mistresses. Highest references from pupils' parents. For prospectus and details apply to the Principals, T. KEMPER and M. A. KUNTZE, 9, Königstrasse, Bad Kreuznach. Winter term commences September 15. School fees, £60 per annum. References kindly permitted: Mrs. BLAKE, "Yeabridge," South Petherton, Somerset; Mr. W. F. PRICE, "Overdale," Letchworth-road, Leicester.

Schools.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH, CHESHIRE.

Chairman of the Governors:
REV. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A.
Headmaster:
H. LANG JONES, M.A. Oxon.
Next Entrance Examination on July 19.

Full prospectus on application to the HEADMASTER; or to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. MARSHALL, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.—An Open Scholarship of £20 is offered for Competition. Candidates must be under 14 years of age. The Examination for this Scholarship will be held on July 19.—Apply to the HEAD MASTER.

"THE BEACON," Sevenoaks, Kent. HIGH-CLASS PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.—The Sons of Gentlemen prepared for the Public Schools and the Royal Naval College. Special attention is paid to giving the boys a thorough educational grounding. Airy class rooms and dormitories, high bracing situation. Fees 30 guineas a term.—Applications to the Headmaster, Mr. A. F. GARRETT, M.A., "The Beacon," Sevenoaks, Kent.

CHANNING HOUSE HIGH SCHOOL, AND BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. Head Mistress: Miss LILLIAN TALBOT, B.A., Honours Lond. Preparation for London Inter. Arts and Matriculation, Senior Cambridge Local, and Associated Board (Music). Healthy situation, Hockey, Cricket, and Swimming. Special terms for daughters of Unitarian ministers.—Apply to the HEAD MISTRESS.

CHANNING HOUSE SCHOOL, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N. A Scholarship, value £15 per annum for two years, will be awarded on the result of an examination to be held at the School on Wednesday, July 24. Candidates must be under 14 on the day of examination. For particulars apply to the Head Mistress.

TAN - Y - BRYN, LLANDUDNO.— PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

Sound Education under best conditions of health.

For Prospectus and information apply to
C. J. MONTGOMERY, M.A., Head Master.

LETCHWORTH SCHOOL, HERTS. L.—Co-educational. Thorough all-round education, from six years upwards, preparing without break for universities and professions, &c. Special attention to physical and moral development. Handicrafts well taught. All religious opinions honourably respected. Bracing air, model buildings, efficient staff. Entire charge of pupils from abroad. Principal: J. H. N. STEPHENSON, M.A. (Oxon). Head of Junior School: Mrs. N. STEPHENSON.

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

SUNDAY, July 14.

LONDON.

Acton, Creffield-road, 11.15, Mr. J. A. BARNES; 7, Mr. E. BRIDGER ATHAWES.
 Berrymondsey, Fort-road, 7, Mr. H. N. CALEY.
 Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 and 7, Rev. J. C. BALLANTYNE.
 Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11, Rev. G. C. CRESSEY, D.D.; 7, Rev. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D.
 Child's Hill, All Souls', Weech-road, Finchley-road, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. E. DAPLYN.
 Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-road, 11 and 7, Rev. W. M. WESTON, D.D., Ph.D.
 Essex Church, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate; 11 and 3.15, Flower Service, Dr. CROTHERS, of Cambridge, Mass., U.S.A.
 Finchley, Granville-road, Ballards-lane, 11, Rev. J. A. PEARSON; 6.30, Mr. F. LAWSON DODD.
 Forest Gate, Upton-lane, 11, Rev. JOHN ELLIS; 6.30, Mr. W. T. COLLYER.
 Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11.15, Rev. C. ROPER, B.A.; 7, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, M.A.
 Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 and 6.30, Rev. E. I. FRIPP.
 Highgate-hill Unitarian Christian Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. T. DAVENPORT BACON, of Salem, U.S.A.
 Ilford, High-road, 11 and 7, Rev. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
 Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 and 7, Rev. Dr. TUDOR JONES.
 Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11 and 6.30, Rev. F. HANKINSON.
 Kilburn, Quex-road, Sunday School Sermons, 11, Rev. BERTRAM LISTER, M.A.; 7, Rev. J. A. PEARSON.
 Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 and 7, Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
 Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7, Rev. GORDON COOPER.
 Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. W. ROBSON, B.D.
 Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 and 7, Rev. F. W. G. FOAT, Litt.D., M.A.
 Stoke Newington Green, 11.15 and 7, Dr. J. LIONEL TAYLOR.
 Stratford Unitarian Church, 11, Mr. H. N. CALEY; 6.30, Rev. JOHN ELLIS.
 University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C., 11.15 and 7, Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE.
 Wandsworth Unitarian Christian Church, East Hill, 11 and 7, Rev. W. G. TARRANT.
 Wimbledon, 27b, Merton-road, 7, Mr. WM. LEE, B.A.
 Wood Green Unity Church, 11, Rev. JOSEPH WILSON.
 Woolwich, Carmel Chapel, Anglesea-road, 3 and 6.30, Rev. FRED. BROCKWAY.

ABERYSTWYTH, New-street Meeting House, 11 and 6.30. Supply.
 BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. McDOWELL.
 BIRMINGHAM, Old Meeting Church, Bristol-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. WOOD.
 BIRMINGHAM, Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. W. AUSTIN, M.A.
 BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Free Church, Lytham-road South, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. BODDILL SMITH.
 BOLTON, Halliwell-road Free Church, 10.45, Scholars' Service; 6.30, Rev. J. ISLAN JONES, M.A.
 BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West Hill-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. V. D. DAVIS.

BRIDPORT, Unitarian Chapel, East-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. LYDDON TUCKER, M.A.
 BRIGHTON, Free Christian Church, New-road, 11, Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.
 BURY ST. EDMUNDS (Free Christian), Church-gate-street, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. WARD.
 BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. STREET.
 CHELMSFORD, Unitarian Church, Legg-street, 6.30, Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND, B.A.
 CHESTER, Matthew Henry's Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. D. JENKIN EVANS.
 CLIFTON, Oakfield-road Church, 11 and 6.30, Dr. G. F. BECKH.
 (DEAN ROW, 10.45, and
 STYAL, 6.30, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS.
 DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 and 6.30, Rev. C. A. GINEVER.
 DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 and 7, Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
 EVESHAM, Oat-street Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. W. E. WILLIAMS.
 GEE CROSS, 11, Rev. H. E. DOWSON; 6.30, Rev. E. H. PICKERING.
 HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. S. BURROWS and Rev. H. W. KING.
 HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
 LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. HARGROVE, M.A.
 LEICESTER, The Great Meeting, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. KING.
 LEWES, Westgate Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. M. CONNELL.
 LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11, Rev. C. CRADDOCK.
 LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. D. ROBERTS.
 LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 and 6.30, Rev. E. STANLEY RUSSELL.
 MAIDSTONE, Unitarian Church, Earl-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. ALEXANDER FARQUHARSON.
 MANCHESTER, Cross Street Chapel, 10.30 and 6.30, Rev. E. T. LANG BUCKLAND.
 MANCHESTER, Platt Chapel, Rusholme, 11, Rev. W. WHITAKER; 6.30, Rev. A. W. TIMMIS.
 NEW BRIGHTON and LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. PARRY.
 NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, near Free Library, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. ALFRED HALL, M.A.
 NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, Unitarian Church, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. RUDDLE.
 OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30, Rev. Dr. CARPENTER.
 PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 and 6.45, Rev. G. W. THOMPSON.
 PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45, Rev. T. BOND.
 PRESTON, Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. C. TRAVERS.
 SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 and 6.30, Rev. JOSEPH WAIN.
 SHEFFIELD, Upper Chapel, 11 and 6.30, Rev. J. HARWOOD, B.A.
 SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. WILLIAM AGAR.
 SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 and 6.30, Rev. R. NICOL CROSS, M.A.
 SOUTHAMPTON, Church of the Saviour, London-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. R. ANDREAE, M.A.
 TORQUAY, Unity Hall Lower Union-street, 11 and 6.30, Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.
 TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Dudley Institute, 11 and 6.30, Rev. G. B. STALLWORTHY.
 WEST KIRBY, Meeting Room, Grange-road, 11 and 6.30, Rev. H. W. HAWKES.

CAPETOWN.

Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45, Rev. RAMSDEN BALMFOETH.

VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Unitarian Church, Eagles Hall, 1319, Government-street, Sundays, 7.30 p.m.

"THE UNITARIAN MONTHLY,"—Magazine for Unitarian Propaganda. Adopted by churches with or without local page. Issued for last Sunday in each previous month. One copy post free, 1½d.—1s. 6d. a year; 9d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100; extra charge local page.—Address to EDITOR, 36, Burlington-road, South Shore, Blackpool.

DEATH.

BULLEY.—On July 6, at her residence, 12, Bertram-road, Liverpool S., Mary Anna, elder daughter of the late Samuel Bulley, aged 77 years.

Situations

VACANT AND WANTED.

ADVERTISER seeks post as Nurse-Companion or Companion-Help. Experienced in nursing, domesticated; Unitarian references.—Biss, 5, Darlington-road, Bath.

YOUNG GERMAN LADY (speaks English), trained nurse, desires situation with delicate lady, or one child. Would travel; small salary.—Mrs. ROGERS, John Pounds House, Southsea.

WANTED.—As Lady Housekeeper to Gentleman, or Companion-Housekeeper to Lady. Thoroughly capable manager, domesticated. Excellent needlewoman, knowledge of nursing. Highest references.—Miss FOUNTAINE, 5, South Park-rd., Wimbledon, S.W.

WANTED, Holiday Engagement at seaside by young Lady who has had two years' training at a Physical Culture Training College. Care of young children 4 to 16. Instruction in swimming, games, Swedish drill, &c.—Apply, A. H. INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

THE DAUGHTER of a Unitarian Minister would be glad to hear of a situation in which she would take entire charge of infant from the month. In or near the Midlands preferred.—S. S. INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

The Inquirer.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS.

To all parts of the World:—	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken

Cheques, &c., for Subscriptions, &c., should be made payable to THE INQUIRER Publishing Company, Ltd., at 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

All communications for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W., endorsed "Inquirer."

ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

	£	s.	d.
PER PAGE	6	0	0
HALF PAGE	3	0	0
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6
FRONT PAGE—INCH IN COLUMN	0	4	6

PREPAID RATES.

All orders under this heading must be accompanied by remittance.

Charitable Appeals, 1d. per word. Second and further insertions half price. For Appeals occupying large space special quotation will be sent on application.

Calendar Notices, 10/- for entire year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths, 1d. per word. Minimum charge, 1s. 6d.

Situations Vacant and Wanted, &c., 20 words, 1s. Each additional 6 words or part of 6 words, 3d. Second and following insertions, half-price.

All communications and payments in respect of Advertisements should be made to The Manager, "Inquirer" Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

Advertisements should arrive not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week.

THE INQUIRER.

A Journal of Liberal Religion, Literature, and Social Progress.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK	467	William Watson	472	MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES:—
THE NEW UNITY	468	Morality and the Religious Life	472	Unitarian Home Missionary College	476
LIFE, RELIGION AND AFFAIRS:—		Primitive Christianity	473	British and Foreign Unitarian Association	477
Patrick MacGill	469	Publications Received	474	The Social Movement	477
Poppies in the Corn	470	FOR THE CHILDREN	474	The Women's Local Government Society	478
BOOKS AND REVIEWS:—		MEMORIAL NOTICE:—		Appeal	478
Early English Dissenters	471	The Late Mr. John Harrison	475	NEWS OF THE CHURCHES	478
				NOTES AND JOTTINGS	479

 All letters and manuscripts for the Editor should be sent to 23, Cannon-place, Hampstead, N.W.*

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THIS week THE INQUIRER has completed its three score years and ten. The first number was issued on July 9, 1842. It is thus one of the veterans in the world of English journalism, but it is still young in heart, and looks forward to a future which shall not be unworthy of its fine record. We hope to publish a special number with commemorative articles in the autumn, and for the moment we must content ourselves with a few words of grateful tribute to the remarkable band of able men who guided the fortunes of the paper in former days and made it what it is. Richard Kinder, Richard Holt Hutton, Walter Bagehot, John Lalor, J. R. Robinson and Richard Bartram are names which THE INQUIRER will always hold in special honour. Three former editors are happily still among the living, the Rev. T. L. Marshall, 1856-1888; the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, 1888-1897; and the Rev. V. D. Davis, 1898-1909.

* * *

In our Jubilee number, July 9, 1892, the late Mr. J. R. Robinson, the renowned manager of the Daily News, contributed some personal reminiscences of his connection with THE INQUIRER, which it is of special interest to recall at the present moment.

"In 1847," he writes, "when I came to London, in my teens, introduced by my kind friend and adviser, the Rev. Henry Solly, to sub-edit THE INQUIRER, the proprietor of the paper was the late Mr. Richard Kinder, and the leading articles were chiefly written by Dr. Sadler. Hampstead in those days was the Mecca whence came the prophets who enlightened the world through the columns of THE INQUIRER. Dr. Sadler was a bachelor then, and dwelt in comfortable lodgings in the centre of the village, and often have I sat in his room talking over the subject of the day and waiting for his manuscript. Hampstead was the spot from which were issued the brilliant, if somewhat uncertain outpourings of the triumvirate, Mr. Richard Hutton, Mr. W. Bagehot, and (I think, or was it Mr. Roscoe?) Mr. T. S. Osler—who for a while adopted THE INQUIRER as their channel of communication with a bustling world. Hampstead contained the home of Mr. John Lalor, who brought to the little paper the great pearl of his deep knowledge, his finished literary style, and his exquisite sympathies with all that is just and good. Mr. Lalor was compelled from ill-health to give up his post as a member of the editorial staff of the Morning Chronicle, but it was thought by a few of his friends and the friends of THE INQUIRER—conspicuous among whom was Mr. Henry Enfield—that the lesser labours of the weekly paper would not be too much for his strength. During the period of Mr. Lalor's connection with it THE INQUIRER must be regarded as highly favoured among newspapers. His contributions would have graced the very best of the journals of the time. Of the host of literary men with whom in my long career I have associated, Mr. Lalor stands out as the one to whom I am under the heaviest obligation."

* * *

"One illustration," Mr. Robinson continues, "of Mr. Lalor's success in dealing with public topics occurs to me. Mr. Carlyle's pronouncement upon West Indian slavery in the first of the Latter-Day pamphlets, published in 1850, moved Mr. Lalor to a high degree of wrath, and an article appeared in THE INQUIRER in which Mr. Carlyle's views were discussed by Mr. Lalor with remarkable eloquence, with noble feeling, and with intense dramatic force. This article was transferred to the columns of the Daily News, and then set out on a complete round of the English-speaking world. For months afterwards I saw this page from THE INQUIRER in American newspapers and in the leading papers of all our more important colonies, and everywhere men felt glad to find so faithful an interpreter of themselves at their best."

* * *

THE group of men who founded THE INQUIRER and dedicated it to Truth, Freedom, and Charity, had two great interests in view. They desired to provide a record and an organ of opinion for the group of free religious communities to which they themselves belonged, and for the type of progressive theology which commended itself to their judgment. But they were anxious to do this in no narrow or sectarian spirit, and with due regard to the wider manifestations of religion in politics and social life, in literature, science, and art. What has been described as its "Broad Church tone" has not been so much a matter of editorial temperament as of deliberate policy; and for the same reason it has been happy to number among its contributors thinkers and writers in the Church of England and the various Nonconformist bodies, who felt themselves in accord with the breadth of its sympathies and the largeness of its ideal. To this twofold interest THE INQUIRER still seeks to be faithful, and it does so untrammelled by official ties, and in the consciousness that a large charity, a wise understanding of the varieties of religious thought and experience, and a distrust of partisanship, are among the primary virtues of religious journalism which is to serve the deepest needs of the hour.

* * *

IN his recent Charge to his diocese, the Bishop of Hereford deplored the bad tone of some ecclesiastical newspapers, and their unhappy influence over many of the clergy. "It is, indeed, one of the present misfortunes of our Church," he said, "that these prints, so charged with odium theologicum, so ready to vilify those who differ from them, so active in fomenting ecclesiastical party spirit, so essentially irreligious in their tone, should be the chief weekly reading of so many of our clergy and their families, and should exercise so wide an influence over clerical sentiment and opinion." These are strong words, and recall the scorn of Frederick Denison Maurice for the religious press of his day; but they were spoken deliberately, and we cannot plead that they are undeserved.

* * *

PROBABLY Dr. Percival would be willing to admit that, in spite of some glaring exceptions, his strictures are less generally true than they used to be. The narrow mind darkened by prejudice, and the bitter word, are less effective weapons in controversy than they were formerly. But we fear that it is still the case that men regard bad lapses from just judgment and generous feeling as quite venial in religious argument. In so far as the religious press has any direct influence in moulding the clerical mind, and, through it, the average tone and temper of religious teaching, it should regard itself as pledged to noble manners and a rigid censorship of the bickerings and cavillings of anonymous correspondents, if, indeed, it is foolish enough to publish their letters at all. Corruptio optimi pessima, and nothing suffers so severely at the hands of false friends as religion.

* * *

IT is said that the London season has seldom been so brilliant. The hotels are crowded with pleasure seekers, and day by day the social columns of the newspapers bear witness to the prodigal expenditure of money on all the refinements of a luxurious civilisation. In the East End and along the line of docks thousands of women and children are on the brink of starvation. In face of this appalling misery attempts at an equitable distribution of blame for the continuance of the present deadlock are quite futile. Some may think that the Port of London Authority is standing firm for a principle; others that the men are fighting for their rights; many more, that punctilios of pride are being allowed to frustrate a settlement. But the spectre of hunger stalking through the streets only throws the grim determination of the men into stronger relief, and no words seem to fit the situation so well as those used by Burke on a memorable occasion: "The question is not whether their spirit deserves blame or praise, but what, in the name of God, shall we do with it?"

* * *

THE Bishops of London, St. Albans and Southwark have issued an urgent appeal for a settlement of the strike, the continuance of which they describe as "a national calamity, and a reproach to our common Christianity." They plead that the slender margin of difference between the men and their employers does not justify the continuance of the misery to individuals, and loss to the community, which the strike entails, and that any real investigation of alleged grievances must involve some consultation with the men. We may add that in our judgment nothing could justify a settlement which would throw back a mass of labour into the casual class. It might be a temporary convenience to the employer, but at the cost of severe injury to the whole body politic. The course of industrial evolution must be in the direction of decasualisation, and not the reverse. Here prudential considerations of social safety and the idealism of Christian ethics are at one.

* * *

A CHARACTER study of the Rev. A. L. Lilley appeared in the Daily News and Leader last Saturday, written by the editor, Mr. A. G. Gardiner. It combines with a beautiful and sympathetic account of Canon Lilley's distinguished gifts as a preacher and religious thinker a strong plea for the recognition of spiritual idealism in the Church of England. "Why," Mr. Gardiner asks, "has a man of this stature reached middle life without recognition in a church so poor in the qualities of greatness as the Church of England to-day? Why has it been left to the Bishop of Hereford to give him some belated and trivial acknowledgment of his worth, and in doing so, unhappily to withdraw him from the great field of his true labour?" We believe that these questions represent the deep misgivings of some of the most religious minds in the Church to-day; who view with growing concern how the skilful organiser or the correct mediævalist is preferred to the man of original gift for positions of influence and distinction. Is it too much to hope that a Liberal Prime Minister will some day assert his independence of official ecclesiastical advisers and bring Canon Lilley back from Hereford to Westminster?

THE NEW UNITY.

THE Reunion of the Churches, long prayed for, is coming sooner than expected and by ways other than we dreamed. I have set my hopes on a Free Catholic Church, and I still believe in a closer co-operation in worship and in Church-life than any yet realised. But the Free Catholic Church will be for a long time to come the church of the pioneers and the dreamers and the visionaries of God who are willing to be, with the Apostle, "fools for CHRIST'S sake." In the meantime, the Reunion is coming along other paths, and chief of all by the path of denominational self-forgetfulness; that is, through a common social enthusiasm and social service. When our own denominational Social Service Union met a few years ago, in Manchester College, Oxford, under my presidency, a little group of us—Anglican, Wesleyans, Primitive Methodists, Quakers and others—met casually in the Residence and brooded on things to come. We meditatively smoked our pipes and chatted with irresponsible ease until the small hours of the morning, and the idea occurred to someone—"Why not link up all the Social Service Unions of all the denominations and have a joint summer school?" Already there at Manchester College, under the auspices of our own denominational summer school, we had managed to have present, as our guests, representatives of most of the other Social Service Unions. Why not now put the reunion on a proper basis, and organise a joint summer school? No sooner said than—criticised! Was ever scheme mooted by any of us that was not at once smothered with criticism? This idea, however, managed to survive. With characteristic self-effacement our own people said, "We'll do all you wish us to do, but to avoid theological prejudice we'll keep in the background; let the Quakers and the Wesleyans take it up, they are not suspect." They did: and, to their honour be it said, they did it in a right catholic spirit. A little group met first of all privately and unofficially at Woodbrooke, Birmingham, under the chairmanship of Mr. Seebohm Rowntree. We found that the dream had "caught on." We thereupon summoned formally all the Social Service Unions to send representatives to another meeting—the first official meeting—at Woodbrooke, this time under the chairmanship of that champion of Social Reform, Bishop GORE, then of Birmingham, now of Oxford. Would the Roman Catholics come in? Would the fearful Protestants work with them? Yes, we were all there, and in a mood of mutual confidence and friendship. That was the beginning, and two weeks ago we saw the dream come gloriously true. It is now a commonplace of the daily and religious newspapers. It is true that the Roman Catholics could not, as such, worship formally with Protestants. Rooms were therefore set apart for "Mass" and for other group-worship—but we could not escape the feeling of being yet one family.

During these wonderful days at the "Hayes," Swanwick, even the Roman Catholics felt that they were socially and morally united to their Protestant brethren. As I wished "Good-bye" to a Jesuit priest at the railway station, he said, "It only shows how united we really are." "Yes," I said, "in social enthusiasm, at any rate." "Ah," he added earnestly, "in other things too, if only we knew—if only we knew."

In the mornings we could see Unitarians (there were over forty of our own people) worshipping with the Quakers at their "meeting," and actually speaking and taking part in it, really moved by the Spirit. One day, the Evangelicals, who joined together in their own common worship, asked me to conduct their service, which I felt it a great and happy privilege to do. And how long ago is it since my poor misguided countryman, HUGH PRICE HUGHES (he knows better now), said, "I cannot pray with a Unitarian"!

What worked the miracle was nominally not religion at all but social aspiration, social study, social service. A rose by any other name will smell as sweet. We called it an Interdenominational Summer School for Social Service. But in the sight of all hearts it was a school of religious charity and reunion. This, then, is the new line of approach, not theology, not (nominally) religion, not denunciation of creeds, not elimination of dogma, nor yet insistence on it—but simply taking all these differences for granted, and then ignoring them by going ahead with the work of social redemption in which we are in earnest. We were Tories and Liberals, Individualists, and Socialists. We were Tariff Reformers and Free Traders. We were Militant Suffragists, Non-Militant and even Anti-Suffragists—and yet party politics were wiped out, and we were all, for a week at any rate, one man in CHRIST JESUS.

And this is not to be the end of the matter. So high did the tide of feeling run, that we clamoured for another Joint School of Social Service next year, and resolved on it. When a financial deficit was announced, "the hat" was sent round at the close of one of the lectures and £40 raised then and there—though most of us were not of the millionaire class. (If anyone wishes to contribute to this movement I should be very glad to receive contributions and forward them to the treasurer.)

The end of the school came with dramatic surprise. We could not, owing to the presence of Roman Catholics, join in worship together. Mr. PHILIP WICKSTEED, who closed the gathering, said that though we could not all formally join in prayer, yet, as a matter of fact, we had really been praying together all through the week. In a few deeply moving sentences he described the spiritual unity we had realised, and as he spoke we wondered how he could end without at least the Lord's Prayer or a benediction. In a dead hush he said quietly that we should all remain for a few moments during some music and we could still silently pray together. A lady softly played some bars of CHOPIN'S Prelude, and there we all waited in a thrilling intensity of emotion, feeling a deeper union of spirit than any words could tell, and the descent of a benediction tenderer than man could utter. As we scattered, someone came up to me with glistening eyes muttering, "That is something to remember for life."

J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

PATRICK MacGILL.

POET: SOMETIME NAVVY.*

THERE is very little doubt that "the pen is mightier than the sword," though Lytton said it, who perhaps shouldn't; but whether the pen is mightier than the pick and the shovel remains for Mr. Patrick MacGill to prove. The glorification of the pick and the shovel by one who either owes everything to those, his first literary tools—or nothing, makes one doubt which will prove the mightier. Mr. Patrick MacGill is a born poet, with Apollo's shafts fardarting and lyre complete. But he has not always bent the bow. If he is also a born navvy, the toilers of Grub-street and of the Chattertonian garrets will be breathless in the race with the men of the shanty and the hut. When he is weary of the pen he may remember what he said of the shovel:—

"Wonderful, ancient shovel, tool of the labour slave!
To you the sparkle of silver the hammer and furnace gave.
For you the virginal forest was stripped of its stateliest trees,
And you have the temper that flame has,
and you have the graces of these.
Athens and Rome have known you, London and Paris know,
You'll raise the towns of the future when the towns of the present go.
A race will esteem and praise you in the days that are to be,
When I am silent and songless and the headstone crumbles on me!
*Wonderful navvy shovel, the days are near at hand
When you'll rise o'er sword and sceptre a mighty power in the land.*"

* Songs of a Navvy. Published by P. MacGill, 4, Cloisters, Windsor. Gleanings from a Navvy's Scrap Book.

But we remember, as Stella said, "that the Dean can write very beautifully on a broomstick," and Mr. Patrick MacGill has tried his 'prentice hand on many humble but significant things, including the "far-flung" cigarette, and found none of them wanting. They are now famed in story, not only with buttercups and daisies, but with the celandine and daffodils. The sweat-drops on his brow in the fifteen and ten hour shifts have been the dew of his consecration. He has extracted from hardship sweetness and light, honey from the rock and oil from the flinty rock, wild honey as yet and petrol. His honey has just a suspicion of tartaric acid about it, as becomes an Ishmaelite with something of tartar, or of the Tartar in his poetical make-up. He uses his petrol more as a marvellous driving power than as an illuminant. His universe is yet geocentric, and not heliocentric. At any rate, the Sun of Righteousness with healing in his wings seems not to have arisen with the light that never was on sea or shore. When he does we feel he, too, will drive the chariot of the Sun, as one to the manner born. He will not "scorch" in any sense, nor bake another Africa. Some are asking if he is a genius. For a man who puts the name of Asquith like a fly in the amber of a fable of Lafontaine's, the question can be deferred awhile. We must "wait and see." But there is the promise of the greatness which arises in the man who does not despise the day of small things, and for whom the obvious is an unexplored country. Like Naaman the Syrian we could all do great things if we were bidden; but that is what neither the prophet, nor the prophet's God ever bids us do—they know their men—hence the dearth of greatness. We are bidden to do the obvious, and so some few only achieve greatness, and effect the miraculous. Genius proves itself largely independent of environment.

If Mr. Patrick MacGill can shed his "many fathers" and "ten thousand instructors," his genius will assert itself and proclaim its own "self-existence." The fatal facility, even when felicitous, of a Kipling is a dangerous thing to be seen too early by a poet who reverences, like a sane man and a wise, the strenuousness and simplicity of the pick and the shovel. It is a style as easy to set going as to set an egg on end. But nobody could do it until the first explorer showed the way. Many a man could set an egg on end more neatly than Columbus. We think Mr. MacGill betters his instruction. But it was far easier than to discover America, which was a work of "longue haleine." Many a man could have discovered the egg trick, who could never have discovered America. And one begins to think that though Mr. Kipling was the first to write Kiplingese easily, he could not do the other thing. But we shall forgive much and forget more of what Mr. Kipling has done, if he has in any way contributed by his own peculiar genius to the kindling of genius in another. If Mr. MacGill could throw up the egg he might navigate another Atlantic and discover a new world; even a new planet might swim into his ken.

But Mr. Kipling has not been "the only begetter" of these verses, for—tunately. Bret Harte, Sims, and others might claim to be, if not among "the many fathers," yet among "the ten thousand instructors." Yet we none of us can have read everything, even at twenty-one—the ripe age when we pass to the majority—Milton perhaps excepted. There are realms of gold, and more worlds than Alexander found, or failed to find. And if Dan Chaucer ever beguiled the navy "at a shift," we doubt whether the "poet's poet" has yet come along his way. When he gazes through Spenser's "magic casements," a light above the brightness of the sun at noonday may send him to Arabia and "faery-lands forlorn" for a season, and some scales that now obstruct his vision will fall away at the word of an Ananias who had no faith in "the art that lies in lies," as his unhappy namesake seemed to have. But perhaps it is only in the mighty company of Plato that Mr. MacGill so defines poetry, and in his way, and may be, for his reasons. Poetry, like life, may be a combination of Wahrheit und Dichtung, but Dichtung is not lies—not necessarily.

There are a few translations from Lafontaine, "the fabulous Frenchmen," as Mr. MacGill all too facetiously calls him. The best advice to any one about to translate Lafontaine would be Punch's advice to those about to undertake an equally hazardous venture, "Don't." The mild heretic who found the New Testament "a very good book, upon my word, a very good book," but for the incomprehensible doctrine of the eternal torments, and "whom" his nurse (at his latter end) said, "le bon Dieu could not find in his heart to damn," can only be assimilated, he cannot be translated. There are also a few translations from Victor Hugo, and from some German poets. As five-finger exercises they are well performed, but such exercises are better adapted for one's "private devotions" than for "public worship." Art is to conceal—translation-work. And, had it not been for our Salvation, the Bible itself would have been better left untranslated. The apple of our "fall" would not have become the "apple of discord," and the Book itself we should have guarded as the apple of our eye, and used for the same purpose, for receiving and perceiving Light. But fortunately for the Bible as for Omar Khayam, the Holy Ghost appointed the translators, and even their mistranslation, as a Bishop of Peterborough once said, was "inspired." But such "favours are divine," as the hymn says, and more jealously select in distribution than even the human favours of the "Garter" and the "O.M."

We fain would quote from the "Songs of a Navvy," but to quote would largely be to mislead. He was building his city in clay, and has taken to marble. But a brick from each would tell nothing of the increasing power and grace of his work. Of some few things one might well say with a lofty "Edinburgh Reviewer," "this will never do." Our task, however, was to find merits, not faults; an easy task. But when Mr. MacGill crosses Lethe in the long hereafter, we trust the gods will help him to forget that he ever (more than once) rhymed "death" with "Leth." Still, such a poet needs must show some credential, however slight, of his late navyship, and that he was once "of the earth, earthy." The little book "Songs of a Navvy," dedicated to his "Pick and Shovel," is a great advance on the "Gleanings from a Navvy's Scrap Book," dedicated to the "Members of the Ludicrous Club," which nevertheless seems to have cantered into and through a second edition. But to be twenty-one with such a pen as Mr. Patrick MacGill wields! The prospect for him and for us is poetically entrancing. We stand upon a peak in Darien, and stare at the untravelled future with a wild surmise. He sings:—

"On my hangings of arras

Dewdrop and sunlight commingle,
The music of woods that are endless,
And infinite seas

That come with the voices

Of storm or of calm to the shingle

In the lilac gray blush of the dawn,

On the sensuous breeze.

So full of promise is earth.

As a child's gentle laughter.

The sapphire tints of the water

Are fair to the eyes—

The present is only,

I know not a past nor hereafter,
And forth from my covering
Of saffron and ermine I rise."

E. L. H. T.

POPPIES IN THE CORN.

POPPIES—the artist's flower; corn—emblem of the fruit of labour; they grow together.

They grow together to indicate the marriage on the wastes of God, of beauty and use; of that which nourishes the soul, and that which sustains the body; and the equal sacredness of both.

Both have an extraordinary antiquity. Wheat was cultivated in continents that have disappeared. Five varieties were grown in the Stone Age of Europe, as impressions on the rock still testify.

In the ancient Greek religion, the poppy was sacred to Demeter, whose name signifies Mother-Earth, in whom the productive nature of the land was personified. In Christian hands the Greek goddess was transformed to Saint Margaret of Antioch, the sanguine colour of the scarlet poppy being held to show forth the blood of her martyrdom. It was the Arabs who discovered a more prosaic use, and from its medicinal properties named it the "father of sleep"; and from one of the species opium is still made.

Thus poets and artists grew to regard it as the emblem of sleep, and of sleep's twin-brother, death. So does Clement Scott weave it into his song of the "Garden of Sleep." So does Rossetti employ it in several of his pictures. A crimson dove brings in its beak the gift of kindly death to the "Beata Beatrix," in the form of an anodyne-poppy; and the floor of the chamber whither love leads the poet in "Dante's Dream" is also with poppies bestrewn. For poppy-land is that other condition of the consciousness, that serene and blessed mood

"In which . . . the breath of this corporeal frame

And even the motion of our human blood
Almost suspended, we are laid asleep
In body, and become a living soul:

While with an eye made quiet by the power

Of harmony, and the deep power of joy,
We see into the life of things."

This is the sleep which is higher than waking, the silence diviner than music, the darkness diviner than light, known to every mystic. This is the state of "Samadhi" of the Hindus in which the gates of the senses close, and the voice of the silence grows audible, and with the loss of the consciousness of self, the dawn breaks of that cosmic consciousness which pervades the world.

But if that is what the poppies symbolise—the trance illumined by the gleam, the consecration and the poet's dream—what relationship bear they to the field of labour and the open life of nature and the robust sanities of the healthy practical life? Where would the vivid emerald of a myriad leaves be without the hidden growth of the myriad roots, distilling, absorbing in the dark beneath? Where would the blush of beauty be without the filtering of iron in the chemical laboratories of the body? Where would be the work of the world without the invisible range of mind in plan and potent purpose? Where the justice and equity and love of the world, apart from the vision without which the people perish?

Once upon a time the truth was borne in upon me in this wise. It was in Cornwall, under an unforgettable summer day. Before my gaze stretched an undulating sweep of land covered with ripening wheat, over which a light sea-breeze passed caressingly, the surface gently waving as though swayed by a responsive emotion. Just beyond the edge of the golden grain dark-seamed cliffs fell precipitously into a sea which blinked with countless sapphires, the blue waters stretching far away into silver distances, until ocean and sky dissolved into a shimmering dreamy haze. The white and red-sailed boats became wings of fancy; the corn whispered secrets which only the heart may receive, and the red poppies in its depths communicated a strange spell which released the mind on a tide of longing that snapped the moorings of the ship of the soul.

One great pang of ineffable rapture with the act of self-surrender, and I was disengaged from the thrall of personality. An expansive gladness diffused my spirit until I became one with the brooding sky and one with the waving wheat; the throb of the sea was felt as my own pulse; the waters washed over my breast as the rock subdues itself to the kisses of the waves; the life in the fields was my own; "I began thro' the grass once again to be bound to the Lord." I felt the mother-love of the quail as it fed its young; the playfulness of the dormice awoke in me the lilt and the rhythm of life. My roots sucked the moisture in a thousand humid places; my leaves felt the flutter of the breeze with which I also fanned them into motion. I was the rock that basked in the sun for ten thousand summers. I was that sea that wears but an ell in an æon of time; and time was not, nor space, but just life passed in an eternal now.

Then I knew. Then I knew with a conviction which no doubt will ever diminish that all is well with the world. Then I knew that necessary as is the struggle for existence in nature, beneath it is a deep content. Then I accepted, acquiesced in, and loved all things. Then I saw that he comes nearest to the heart of the world who is tolerant and full of goodwill toward all creatures. Then, in sooth, it seemed quite as sweet to have suffered as to have enjoyed; that pain is a kiss of God; that sin carries its own corrective, and beneath the impregnable foundations of the world flows the invincible stream of divine forgiveness. But more than all I saw the necessity for the strifes and antagonisms of human life and the great good that reconciles them all in itself. Not in opposition but in harmonious purpose appeared the useful and the fair, the real and the ideal; and Martha served her Lord, unheeding his wisdom, but tending to his needs, as Mary who sat reverently listening at his feet.

And when I came to myself and looked out again through the windows of the eyes, it was to see the beams of benediction lie across the broad bosom of the earth, turning the tragedy of nature into the glory and splendour of the plains of God.

Return to me, thou hour of beatitude; allure me to that same utter surrender; yet not unless thou sendest me back to the ugly streets of the sweltering city and the grimy grapple with daily drudgery, with the song of the grassy, dewy places in my heart, and the vision and dream of beauty before my eyes, that I may unite the ideal to the practical, as the crimson poppies burn in the depths of the ripening wheat on the dreamy downs.

J. T. D.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE EARLY ENGLISH DISSENTERS.

The Early English Dissenters in the Light of recent Research (1550-1641). By Champlin Burrage. 2 vols. Cambridge University Press, 1912.

MR. BURRAGE'S book is the production of a skilful researcher. It is extremely business-like; there is hardly a superfluous word. There is no attempt at a continuous history. The first volume deals with a series of particular questions; the second is a collection of documents—the very incunabula of Nonconformist origins. The whole work hardly moves away from the region of literary evidence, i.e., the evidence of books and tracts, many of extreme rarity, and that of manuscripts, in the Record Office, or in our great libraries, many of which have been hitherto unrevealed. In connection with such evidence, a kind of “higher criticism” is naturally evolved, and applied to previous historians. “If Mr. A. had seen document X, could he have said so and so?” “Was it on the authority of X that Mr.

B. controverted the statement of Mr. A.?” It is obvious that the right policy for a reviewer who wishes to indicate the importance of Mr. Burrage's book is to confine himself to the broader issues, and the questions which have been argued before, rather than plunge into details which present mere novelty. And Mr. Burrage has furnished a useful help to his reader, and his reviewer, by appending to his Introduction a series of concise paragraphs, setting forth precisely what he claims to have done in the way of settling vexed questions, or, if they cannot yet be settled, in the production of fresh information that may tend to their solution, and establish order where confusion reigned before.

The reader naturally wants to know what Mr. Burrage has to say about the “Privy Church,” of which Richard Fitz was minister; and he finds at once that in our author's opinion it was not a “regularly constituted Congregational church,” and that it is not to be identified with the Plumbers' Hall congregation. This latter judgment is against that of Mr. Shakespeare and Mr. Burgess, and of many Congregational historians. The initial difficulty is that so little is known of Richard Fitz; his name is not mentioned by Strype, and he finds no place in the Dictionary of National Biography. He is not mentioned by the bishops who, in their letters to their foreign friends, complain alike of the hardship of being obliged to enforce uniformity, and of the difficulties that are thrown in their way by Puritan sects and conventicles. Troubles as to strict conformity, which had been present ever since the accession of Queen Elizabeth, came to a head in 1567. All clerical licences were called in, and reissued only to those who would promise to conform in all respects, especially as to wearing the surplice. Thirty-seven of the London clergy refused “the conjuring garments of the Pope's Church,” were deprived, and imprisoned. The like-minded members of their congregations would attend the parish churches no more. They met in private houses, but, having engaged Plumbers' Hall for a larger gathering than usual (they said, for a wedding), a large number of them were arrested there on June 19, of whom seven were examined before the Court of High Commission. The account they gave of themselves is quite plain: as long as they could have the word preached and the Sacraments administered without “idolatrous gear” they went to church, and never assembled in houses; but when they could no longer have their own ministers, they bethought them what were best to do, and remembered that there was “a congregation of some of us” in Queen Mary's days, which used a Genevan book of order and discipline, approved by Calvin, “which book and order we now hold.” Refusing to go back to church, the accused were sent to Bridewell. They cannot have been long in prison, for in the following March seventy-two persons were captured while meeting in the house of James Tynne, goldsmith, and among them were six of the seven leading men who had been examined before the High Commission.

In April, 1569, twenty-four men and seven women were, through the intercession of Bishop Grindal, discharged from Bridewell. Only the names of the men are given; ten of them were among those arrested at Tynne's house, and five of these were of the seven Plumbers' Hall leaders. At the same time, William Bonham, a minister, was discharged upon his written promise not to exercise any private ministry and not to be present at any assemblies of prayer, and not to “invaie” against any rites or ceremonies of the Church. The same undertaking was given by another minister, Nicholas Crane, and both were licensed by Grindal. Both Bonham and Crane were concerned in the attempt to set up a parochial Presbytery at Wandsworth in 1572; and both were again imprisoned for breach of conformity in using the Geneva service book for marriages and baptisms. This seems to be the last of the Plumbers' Hall tradition. It looks as if the congregation had never had time and opportunity to organise itself, or to grow into a separate existence; its leaders, constantly in prison, formulated nothing, and it has left us no documents. There is no evidence of anything but Nonconforming Puritanism. As to Fitz's church, the case is different. Its origin is quite obscure, but it has left two printed papers. The first is “The order of the privye church in London,” and bears at foot the name of Richard Fytz, minister. It briefly sets forth “the mynde of them that . . . have set their hands and hartes to the pure, unmingled, and sincere worshippinge of God . . . only abolishinge and abhorringe all tradicions and inventions of man.”

These intentions are stated under three heads—first, to have the word preached freely, not in bondage and subjection; second, to have the sacraments administered purely, according to the institution of the Lord Jesus, and without any invention of man; third, to have “not the fylthye Cannon lawe, but discipline only.” The second document may be called a covenant, but it is rather a form of personal testimony. Mr. Burrage dates it between 1567 and 1571, but one is inclined to put it pretty close to the earlier date on account of its strong denunciation of “Popish garments,” “filthy ragges,” and “idolatrous trash.” In fact, the whole paper turns on the one point that the testifier declares that in spite of the danger of not attending his parish church—“I come not back again to the preachynges, &c., of those who have received these markes of the Romysh beast.” He says he has joined in prayer with others who will not conform; but there is no indication of a church constitution or organisation among them. And there is nothing yet to indicate the formation of a church of the Separatist order—in the sense of a Brownist or, as Mr. Burrage would have us say, a Barrowist independency.

A third document, a manuscript dating from 1571, is a testimony of the same sort as the last mentioned, concluding with a prayer that the Queen would follow the example of Jehoshaphat and cast down all high places of idolatry within her land. The subscribers call themselves “a poor congregation whom God hath separated from the Church of England and from the mingled and false worshipping therein used," and mention, among those who have been killed by long imprisonment, "our minister Rycherd fitz thomas bowlande deacon, one partryge." The mention of a deacon looks like evidence of a church organisation. Thomas Bowland was an original Plumbers' Hall prisoner, and so was Randall Partryge, and so were seven or eight of the twenty-seven prisoners who signed this document—evidently very humble people, eighteen signing with a mark. It seems impossible to resist Mr. Burrage's inference that the old stalwarts of the Plumbers' Hall meeting may have met in prison many members of Fitz's church, "the earliest Separatist congregation of which any considerable historical record has been preserved"; but Mr. Burrage regards the appeal to Queen Elizabeth as proof that there was as yet no intention of establishing a permanent Separatist congregationalism as against the idea of a National Church. That is to say, as we understand it, that Fitz's church having absorbed a number of Plumbers' Hall adherents, was still in their position of demanding further reformation, but had not given up the notion that the first thing to do was to purge and rectify the Church as it was. Bishop Grindal speaks of "those who have openly separated from us . . . have held their own meetings and ordained ministers, elders, and deacons after their own way." He quite understood the position of another "Privy Church," that of which Scambler was minister, which persisted in holding Protestant services in secret throughout the reign of Mary. This knot of Protestants gained great credit. Scambler, and a subsequent minister, Bentham, became bishops; but people who would not go back to their parish churches when they might find no indulgence. Yet they seemed to themselves to be as consistent in denouncing "rags of Popery" in the Elizabethan Church as they had been in revolting from established Romanism in the days of Mary. We owe to Mr. Burrage the plainest story of these Elizabethan Nonconformists that has been put before us, and we think it will not soon be superseded by another.

Mr. Burrage's book, not professing to be a continuous narrative, has the charm of dropping the reader into the midst of unexpected details. We have, for instance, very interesting particulars of a congregation at Bocking, in Essex, in the early days of Edward VI., which was strengthened by the addition of a number of like-minded people who migrated from Faversham, in Kent, to join them. These people have been called Anabaptists, and claimed as the first English Separatists; but "they were merely Nonconformists of a rather peculiar type . . ." It is probable that they were revolvers against the Act for Uniformity of Service (1549); and that they represent the persistent Lollardism of which our historians take too little account. But the most interesting thing about them is that they reject entirely the doctrine of Predestination (which seems to be elsewhere inseparable from early Protestantism) and all its implications. Two at least of the members of this congregation are in the list of Marian martyrs.

Mr. Burrage identifies the home of a little congregation mentioned by Francis Johnson (1606) as "a church in the West parts of England professing the same faith with us," as Slaughterford on the Somerset border of Wilts. Twelve or thirteen of its members migrated to Holland, but apparently failed in their endeavour to establish themselves as an independent Church. It would be an interesting study for a man of leisure to work out the English homes of the refugees in Holland, whose names occur in the rare, but by no means scanty, literature connected with the Amsterdam churches and their controversies.

Mr. Burrage incidentally throws a good deal of light upon the history of congregational covenants, a subject which he has treated in a separate work. One is glad to note how much simpler were the earliest mutual pledges of members of gathered churches than the elaborate dogmatic covenants of later days. Perhaps at the beginning they "gave their hands together that they would not hear Mass at all." A little later, they pledge themselves in an excellent form which long persists "to walk together in all the ways of God so far as He has made known to us, or shall make known to us, and to forsake all false ways." It is to be noticed that the fifteen articles of the detailed covenant enforced by Hugh Peters at Rotterdam (1633) as a condition of admission to the Lord's Supper, deal entirely with conduct, and not at all with doctrine.

Mr. Burrage's book opens a good many doors which have hitherto been closed, takes many questions further on their way towards solution, and sets an example at once of accuracy in record and judgment kept tentative and carefully limited to data before it, in a region where the absence of such modesty has sometimes been conspicuous. It may be added that some good reproductions of documents and title-pages of rare books enhance the interest of these volumes.

J. EDWIN ODGERS.

WILLIAM WATSON.

The Heralds of the Dawn. A Play in Eight Scenes. By William Watson. London: John Lane. 4s. 6d. net.

THOSE of our readers who have formed a standard by which to judge the poet from the merits of "Wordsworth's Grave," "In Laleham Churchyard," the "Hymn to the Sea," or the "Unknown God," are likely to be disappointed in William Watson's last poem. The interest aroused by an admired poet's excursion into a new territory is not warranted by the issue. Mr. Watson is too fond of phrase-making, too contemplative, too detached from his subject to surrender himself to the influences that create effective characterisation. The dramatis personæ are not concrete enough, are not flesh and blood, but lay figures or symbols of the morality-play. The scene is chiefly laid at "Phantasmopol," in the country of Ideonia; and the time, "the morrow of antiquity." Among the characters are a king who represents the past, with its superstitions and cruelties. The better time coming is heralded by the Prince, his son, named "Hesperus," who has seen through the delusive glory of war, who places mercy on an equal seat beside justice, and is a new theologian to boot.

"God is more just than thou dost picture Him.
Dost thou suppose He is a bartering God,
That makes a profit out of our poor folly,
Alert to seize on our unwariness,
To catch us tripping and stickle for a price?
And should'st thou dare to do a worthy thing,
Dost thou imagine that the august Begetter
Of all this world shall then fall short of thee
In righteous dealing?"

One feels that by adhering to his desire to try the experiment of poetic drama, the poet has hampered his muse. Honest craftsmanship, the maintenance of lofty diction, do not and cannot make up for lack of fire, and of the pulse of heroic feeling directly transferred from human life. Still Mr. Watson is too much of an artist, of too fastidious a taste, to be guilty of producing any work which is not profitable and pleasant reading.

Incidentally, the story of the Hunter of the Woods, who steals into the city to slay the successful Commander at the moment when a nation's laurels crown him, may be intended for a contribution to the present agitation against the white slave traffic. The Commander has dishonoured the Hunter's daughter, and later falls a victim to the distracted father's vengeance. To the King the crime is the "light handling of a country wench" which is not to be set above a mourning realm. But the Prince apportions the punishment of the avenger to the measure of the wrong he has suffered.

"Take then from me forgiveness,
And go thou back to thine own land in peace."

Here is the voice of the poet who has wept over Armenia's wrongs, who has espoused unpopular truth, and who has made us expect ever in him an ally of truth against expediency, of freedom against tyranny, and love against hate. As the prophetess Zoraya says:—

"Slowly the spirit of the world itself
Is bringing to the birth all thou did'st dream,
And with thee or without thee shall thy cause Prevail."

MORALITY AND THE RELIGIOUS LIFE.

The Kingdom of God, a Course of Four Lectures delivered at Cambridge during the Lent Term, 1912, by William Temple, Headmaster of Repton. London: Macmillan & Co., 2s. 6d. net.

It is significant that these lectures were delivered under the auspices of the Cambridge Christian Evidence Society, for their professed aim is not to solve problems, but to stimulate thought. It is the more significant when we discover the eminently practical nature of the questions with which Mr. Temple deals. The foundation of the Christian faith and life is presented to us, not as the acceptance of statements about Christ bearing the impress of an age very different from our own, but as the membership of the Kingdom of God; and membership of the Kingdom involves the acknowledgment of Christ as "its King, and the spirit of His life as the law that governs alike the individuals who are to be its citizens and the nations which are to be its provinces."

Mr. Temple is singularly broadminded, and his broadmindedness is not that of the man who cares little for his convictions, but that of one who desires to enter really sympathetically into the point of view of those who differ from him. He addresses himself to the question whether there is any reason for saying that religion is necessary for goodness. "Why drag in religion at all?" And he clears the ground by an outspoken discussion of the relation of the moral judgment to religion. The former is in its nature, though probably not in its history, absolutely independent of the latter. The right judgment for each individual man is determined by the precise place which he holds in the general structure of society. The principle of society is frankly admitted to be involved in any philosophy of value. It is when this principle of society becomes predominant that my judgment as to what is good for me becomes a moral judgment. While granting that the growth of morality, both in extent and in content, has been accompanied, and, as a rule, conditioned, by a parallel development in religious conviction, Mr. Temple declares that it does not necessarily follow that the process need continue, "for the value of the moral law when reached does not depend on the way in which it has been found." The place of religion in relation to morality is to be found rather in the motive than in the content of morality. What we want, says Mr. Temple, is a change of will. The mere recognition of duty is no great assistance towards its performance. We must begin to feel the evil of the frame of mind that sent Christ to the Cross and to realise that it is to a very large extent our own frame of mind, we must feel "that the great Power which rules the world is submitting to suffer at our hands, in a way which can only be represented by the agony of Christ. . . . When He is reviled He reviles not again. . . . 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do.' . . . That is why the religious life can make all the difference to morality, because, to the religious man, all his faults, which he will now call his sins, are no longer merely a breach of law; they are the betrayal of a friend." "How are we to obey laws which our consciences make known to us?—we find that we need new power; and religion may supply that power in very many ways, not least in the way that I am now suggesting, by awaking in us horror of our own present condition. I do not mean horror of some extraordinarily sinful acts; it was not crime or vice that sent Christ to the Cross;

it was respectability and religious stagnation and compromise."

The rest of the book is chiefly occupied by the question what a Christian society would look like, and how we ought to live in the world of our own day. The ideals of the economic structure of society, of criminal administration, of charity, and of international relationships are indicated, and then the attempt is made to show that we are to-day necessarily involved in compromise of a legitimate kind. Mr. Temple admits that any one who likes can say that his views are due to his "having been born and bred in the Anglican tradition, which is compromise from beginning to end." His argument here is ingenious, even brilliant, but not quite convincing. We must compromise with the world on those points where we may be assisting the development of what is best in the actual circumstances of the society in which we live, is his conclusion, and it will be received differently by his different readers according to their temperament. True, the Kingdom of God is like unto a man that bringeth out of his treasury things new and old, a saying that Mr. Temple strangely enough does not make use of, but the difficulty for most of us is to know how much of the old to retain along with the new, or in other words how much retention of the heritage of the past is consistent with organic continuity with the past, and how much is illegitimate compromise.

Enough has been said to testify to the virility and frankness of Mr. Temple's lectures, and to their interest for all those who are genuinely anxious to hasten the day when English Christians of different communions shall find that their common ground of positive agreement lies in unity of spirit, not in uniformity of letter. Mr. Temple is as anxious for that day as are those of us who cannot apply his principle of compromise to the matter of creed-tests.

H. E. B. SPEIGHT.

PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY.

PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY: Its Writings and Teachings in their Historical Connections. By Otto Pfeiderer, D.D. Translated by W. Montgomery, B.D. Vol. 4. London: Williams & Norgate. 10s. 6d. net.

It is four years this month since Professor Pfeiderer passed away, after more than thirty years' service to New Testament scholarship in the University of Berlin; and now we have, completed in four volumes, the English translation of his final work on Primitive Christianity, a monument of the patient labours of a mind ever alert and sensitive to the progressive movements of thought, and fearless in the pursuit of truth. To the fourth and concluding volume of the translation an index of citations is added, which shows how broad is the conception of this study of Primitive Christianity during the first century and a half of its growth. The literature considered is by no means confined to the books of the New Testament Canon, but in addition to illustrative matter derived from the Jewish Apocrypha, and especially the "Wisdom of Solomon," the apocalypse of Baruch and Enoch, a large number of extra-canonical writings, which belong to the latter half of the period, receive substantive treatment. It is an indication of how Pfeiderer's work grew, that in the first edition of the Urchristentum (1887) there is only slight reference to the "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," which was then a recent discovery, and only beginning to be thoroughly examined by scholars, whereas in the second edition (1902), from which this translation is made, a full section is devoted to its exposition. A good half of this concluding volume is occupied with the writings of the Apostolic Fathers and the Apologists, following the sections on the Johannine Writings and Theology. The Fourth Gospel Pfeiderer dates about 135 A.D., and the Appendix to the Gospel and the First Epistle about 150 A.D.; the Apocalypse much earlier, at the turn of the century, and the two shorter Epistles also before the Gospel; these "Johannine" writings, as a whole, are in his view to be attributed to four several authors. And, broadly speaking, contemporary with this group we have such writings as the Epistle of Barnabas, the "Shepherd" of Hermas, the Apologies of Aristides, Justin Martyr, and others, and the Epistle to Diognetus. Pfeiderer's account of these works makes one realise how imperfect was the judgment of values, which finally determined the limits and the inclusions of the ecclesiastical canon of the Scriptures, shutting out, e.g., that "pearl of early Christianity," the Epistle to Diognetus. "It cannot be denied," says Pfeiderer, "that the specifically Christian view of the world and temper of mind comes to stronger and clearer expression here than in the Apocalypse of John, or the Epistle of James. The apocalyptic enthusiasm of the victory over the world is here purified from its sensuous Chiliastic dross, and exalted into the spiritual freedom and inwardness of a Christian heart which is blessed in God and overcomes the world by love and faith; on the other hand, the jejune Puritanism of the morality of James is vivified and exalted by the enthusiasm of the Pauline and Johannine religious mysticism" (p. 489).

